PREFACE.

ON completing this portion of their great national work the proprietors consider it necessary to state, particularly for the information of such subscribers as have not seen the preface to their "TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF ENGLAND," that, in order to give a correct description of each place, every parish in the Principality has been visited by competent individuals, for the purpose of procuring the necessary local information by observation and personal enquiry; and, with a view to direct their researches, and secure uniformity in the design, each gentleman was furnished with a printed list of queries, embracing every subject requisite for a comprehensive account of the different places.

During the progress of the survey, several other gentlemen were diligently engaged in compiling, from the most approved ancient and modern historical works, manuscripts, and public records deposited in the British Museum and other public libraries, a succinct historical description of the most important events that have occurred in relation to each place. The matter thus obtained was incorporated with the local information procured by personal enquiry on the spot, and, after an attentive and careful revision, was printed; and proofs of every place of importance were forwarded by post for the perusal of those resident gentlemen who had previously contributed information respecting their several parishes, with a request that any omission or inaccuracy might be rectified, which request has been attended to with the most gratifying kindness and promptitude; and the proprietors feel much pleasure in availing themselves of this opportunity of expressing their grateful acknowledgments for the courteous aid they have uniformly received, insomuch as to preclude the possibility of particularizing each individual whose kind assistance facilitated the researches of their agents, and has contributed materially to the accuracy and consequent value of the work.

The work will be found to comprehend, under distinct heads, the several counties, cities, boroughs and parishes;—also every hamlet or township separately maintaining its own poor, according to the latest official reports;—and all places that have made a separate return of inhabitants. No township has been mentioned as situated in any parish, in the heading of the article, except such as maintain their own poor, and are separately inserted in the work.

With a view to facility of reference, the different subjects are arranged as follows. With respect to COUNTIES:—the name, and whether an inland or maritime county,—its relative situation, superficial extent in square miles and statute acres, and the amount of population;—historical summary;—ecclesiastical and civil divisions;—parliamentary representation;—assizes and sessions;—gaols;—amount of rates;—general appearance of the surface and scenery;—climate, soil, and agriculture;—extent of woods and waste lands;—geology;—manufactures;—principal rivers;—canals and rail-roads;—turnpike roads;—remains of antiquity;—Roman stations and roads;—religious houses and their remains;—churches remarkable for their architecture;—ancient castles and fortresses;—principal modern mansions;—mineral springs and natural curiosities.

The articles on CITIES, BOROUGHs, and SEA-PORT and MARKET TOWNS, comprehend a description of their name and situation;—distance and bearing from the county town, and from London;—population;—origin and etymology of name;—historical summary;—local character and general appearance;—scientific and literary institutions;—places and sources of amusement;—manufactures and commerce;—facilities of navigation;—rail-roads;—public edifices connected with commerce;—markets and fairs;—municipal government;—charters, how and when obtained;—general privileges and immunities;—corporation, of what officers composed, and when and how chosen;—parliamentary representation, including the nature of the elective franchise both prior and subsequently to the passing of the Reform Act, and the returning officer;—ecclesiastical and religious establishments;—nature of the livings;—in what archdeaconry and diocese;—amount at which the living is rated in the king's books;—patron;—tutelar saint and architectural description of the churches, places of worship for dissenters, schools, hospitals, and other charitable and benevolent institutions;—ancient monastic establishments;—ruins of castles, encampments, and other remains of antiquity;—mineral springs;—natural phenomena;—modern residences;—eminent natives and residents;—title, if any, which the place confers, and on what family;—average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor.

IN PARISHES, CHAPELRIES, and TOWNSHIPS, the prevailing order of subjects is, as far as the nature and limited number of them will allow, the same as in the Cities and Towns. The distance of each Parish, &c., is given from the nearest post town, by referring to which the distance from London may be easily ascertained.

To the inhabitants of the Principality it is well known that there exists a difference of opinion respecting the orthography of proper names, and the proprietors candidly confess their inability to decide upon a matter in which even those best informed upon the subject do not agree. As a book of reference, it has been considered desirable to adopt the modern prevailing style of spelling; and, in order to preserve the ancient correct appellation, the same is given, as accurately as it can be ascertained, in a parenthesis immediately following. In this department of their labours they have been aided by a gentleman, a native and resident of the Principality, whose researches into Welsh literature have procured for him deserved celebrity, and who with much care and attention has perused every page of the work. It will be observed that the plan has been adopted of substituting V for F in all words in which the latter has the sound of the former, and, in consequence, F for Ff; so as the more readily to impart to an English reader the true sound and property of these letters. And again, in accordance with modern usage, K has been used instead of C, in names wherein it is followed by the vowel I.

It may be necessary to state, with regard to archdeaconries, that there are few to which any ecclesiastical jurisdiction is now attached, many of them having been annexed to their respective bishopricks, probably on account of the small value of the latter; and the authority of the archidiaconal court has mainly merged in that of the consistorial court of the

ABB

ABBEY CWM HIR, a parish, comprising the hamlet of Cevnpawl, in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, and the hamlet of Gollon, in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 481 inhabitants. This place derives its name, which signifies "the abbey in the long dingle," from the erection of an ancient Cistercian monastery in this sequestered spot. The two hamlets of which the parish now consists, and which unitedly maintain their poor, constituted, till within a very recent period, the upper division of the parish of Llanbister, to which the church of Cwm Hir was a chapel of ease. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Thomas Wilson, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain edifice of moderate dimensions, with a small belfry at the west end, under which a gallery was erected in 1830, at the expense of Mr. Wilson, who also presented an organ; in the chancel are two mural tablets to the memory of Sir Hans Fowler and another member of the same family. A tenement called the Vron, in the parish of Llanbister, is charged with the annual payment of ten shillings to the poor of this parish. The ancient abbey, which was dedicated to St. Mary, was founded in 1143, by Cadwallon ab Madoc, and was originally designed for sixty brethren of the Cistercian order, but never completed upon so extensive a scale. It occupied a secluded situation in a romantic valley, deeply embosomed among lofty hills and abrupt precipices, once covered with forests of oak, but now almost denuded, affording only pasturage for mountain sheep, and exhibiting some stunted trees, the roots of which have penetrated between the interstices of the slate rock which composes the substratum of these hills. In the year 1231, a friar of this house having occasioned the defeat of the garrison of Montgomery, by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, by conveying to it false intelligence of the position of the latter, King Henry II., on approaching with the English army, set fire to the grange of the monastery, in revenge for the friar's treachery, and was proceeding to burn the abbey itself, which was only saved from destruction by the payment of three hundred marks by the abbot. It suffered considerable injury, in 1401, from the furious resentment of Owain Glyndwr; and the society, at the dissolution, consisted only of three monks, the revenue being estimated at £28. 17. 4. In the 37th of Henry VIII., the site was granted to Walter Henley and John Williams, and afterwards passed into the family of the Fowlers: the estate is now the property, by purchase, of Thomas Wilson, Esq., who is building, with materials brought from the ruins of the abbey, a small but elegant house upon it, in the Elizabethan style of architecture. The venerable ruins, which have recently been rendered more interesting and conspicuous, by clearing the ground, consist principally of portions of the four walls of a spacious building, two hundred and thirty-eight feet in length, and sixty-four in breadth, which was probably the church, varying in height from four to twelve feet above the ground. The pedestals, with part of the shafts, of a beautiful range of twelve clustered columns, of peculiar elegance, still decorate the walls; and within the area there was probably a double range of massive pillars, separating the nave from the aisles, of which the bases of three are remaining, from which it appears that they were square, with flutings for a cluster of three columns at each angle of the pillar, with a single lateral shaft intervening: at the east end are the remains of two doorways, with triple clustered columns at the angles of each, and between them a series of four columns; and on the north-east side of this extensive building are appearances of a similar arrangement. The ground about this interesting ruin is filled with fragments of richly carved freestone, of which the ornamental parts of the building were constructed, and in many of these the details are as perfect as when first sculptured: a gravestone was lately found among the ruins, bearing an ancient inscription in rude characters. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of this parish amounts to £233. 18.

ABENBURY-VAWR, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Wrexham, containing 214 inhabitants. It separately supports its own poor, according to an arrangement made in March 1830.

ABENBURY-VECHAN, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.N.W.) from Wrexham, containing 113 inhabitants. On the river Clywedog, which is here crossed by a bridge, there are some iron-foundries. This township is assessed separately for the support of its poor, the average expenditure being £34. 10. per annum, and is the only one of the parish in the county of Flint, all the others being in that of Denbigh.

ABER, or ABER-GWYNREGYN, a parish in the hundred of LLECHWEDD UCHAF, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E.N.E.) from Bangor, containing 552 inhabitants. This place was anciently the residence of the native princes of North Wales, of whom Llewelyn the Great erected, on an artificial mount near the village, a strong castle, to defend the pass, of which, except the site, there are no vestiges; neither can any traces be discovered of the palace in which he resided. When King John, with a numerous army, attempted the subjugation of North Wales, the same Llewelyn ordered all his men of Denbigh to retire within the fastnesses among the mountains of Snowdon, and from this place despatched his princess, who was the daughter of that monarch, to Aberconway, the head-quarters of the English forces, to intercede with her father, in which she succeeded, and obtained for Llewelyn a treaty of peace, but upon very unfavourable terms. In this castle Llewelyn, in the reign of Henry III., entertained William de Breos, whom he had inveigled into his power, under pretence of celebrating the festival of Easter, and whom, after a sumptuous banquet, he hanged upon one of the adjacent hills, for the supposed corruption of his wife's fidelity, during his previous confinement in the castle as a prisoner of war. In the reign of Edward I., Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last of the British princes, made this his principal residence, while struggling against the power of that monarch for the independence of his country. The situation of Aber was highly favourable to the prosecution of his desultory mode of warfare, as, in case of emergency, he could either retire into his strong holds in the mountains, or take shipping in the fine bay adjoining the town. It was at this place he received the summons of Edward I., to surrender his principality to the English crown, and entered into a treaty with that monarch to hold this mountainous district, together with Mona, or the Isle of Anglesey, in vassalage; and hence, after having broken that treaty, he led his forces, in a final effort for the recovery of his dominions, in which he was slain near Builth. His brother Davydd, together with his wife, two sons, and seven daughters, is said to have been taken in a morass near the mountain of Bere, in this parish, and delivered a captive to the English monarch, then at the castle of Rhuddlan.

The village is small, but is very pleasantly situated near the Lavan sands, at the extremity of a fine vale, or glen, watered by the river Gwynnregyn, which here falls into the Irish sea, and on the road from London to Holyhead, through Chester: it overlooks the beautiful and extensive bay of Beaumaris, and commands a view of the elevated portions of Anglesey, covered with well-grown oaks, and of the wide expanse of waters between that bay and Great Orme's Head, comprehending in the distance the island of Priestholme, which has been made a telegraphic station. The glen extends for a mile and a half between its environing mountains, and on one side is bounded by a majestic rock, called Maes y Gaer, thinly overspread in one part, and richly covered in the other, with trees of stately growth: at its extremity is a mountain of concave form in front, from the centre of which a magnificent cataract descends, forming two successive falls; the upper is broken into several torrents by projecting masses of rock, and the lower precipitates itself in one broad sheet from an elevation of more than sixty feet. Situated at the termination of the Menai straits, Aber possesses every facility of commercial intercourse, but no trade or manufacture is carried on in the parish. The ferry to Beaumaris is seven miles across, of which four miles are fine sands, that may be walked over at low water; passengers cross this ferry to Beaumaris, but, since the construction of the suspension bridge at Bangor, few carriages are conveyed over it. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 3½., and in the patronage of Sir R. Bulkeley Williams Bulkeley, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Bodvan, is an ancient and spacious structure, with a good square tower, having been greatly improved by the late Viscount Warren Bulkeley: the interior, which is neatly fitted up, consists of a nave and chancel of equal length, the latter lighted with a series of low windows, differing in their style, and probably inserted at various times. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, in 1719, by deed to the rector and churchwardens, gave £100, to be laid out in the purchase of land, and the produce to be appropriated to teaching ten poor children of this parish to read Welsh. There are also several small charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £144. 4.

ABERAËRON, or ABERAYRON, (ABER-AËRON), a sea-port, partly in the parish of HENVYNYW, but principally in that of LLANDDEWI-ABERARTH, lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (S.W. by S.) from Aberystwith, and 23 (E.N.E.) from Cardigan. The population is returned with Llanddewi-Aberarth. The village is agreeably situated on the road from Cardigan to Aberystwith, at the lower extremity of the Vale of Aëron, the sides of which are here abrupt and clothed with wood, and on the shore of Cardigan bay, at the influx of the river Aëron, which here separates the parishes of Henvynyw and Llanddewi-Aberarth, and, together with some springs in the neighbourhood, affords the inhabitants an ample supply of water: this river is noted for trout and salmon, and there are several corn-mills on its banks. Aberaëron is indebted for its origin to the late Rev. Alban Thomas Jones Gwynne, of Ty-Glyn, who, in 1807, obtained an act of parliament, under the authority of which he built two piers at the mouth of the river Aëron, with convenient wharfs, cranes, and storehouses, at an expense of about £6000: that on the west is one hundred yards in length, and the other ninety, and both are built of stone; but, from the very exposed situation of the place, they are insufficient to afford adequate protection to vessels from the violence of north-westerly winds. To remove this inconvenience, it is the intention of the present proprietor, A. T. J. Gwynne, Esq., to extend the western pier about one hundred yards, inclining in a northerly direction. The scenery of the Vale of Aëron is particularly beautiful, which, together with its marine atmosphere, retired situation, and improving condition, may render this, at no distant period, a place of considerable resort during summer. Upwards of thirty new leases have been lately granted, pursuant to which several houses have been already built, and others are in progress: a general post-office, and an excellent posting-house and hotel, have been established, the latter affording to families an equal degree of comfort and privacy to any in the principality. The port is a member of that of Cardigan, and is one of the most thriving within its jurisdiction: there are from thirty to forty sloops belonging to it, of from seventeen to one hundred tons' burden, which are navigated by about one hundred and twenty seamen of this place: they are chiefly employed in the importation of coal and culm, and two of them trade regularly with Bristol. The principal articles of importation, in addition, are grocery and timber; and of exportation, butter and oats: there is also a lucrative herring fishery, in which about thirty boats, with seven men to each, are engaged. Near the entrance into the harbour there is a bar, which is dry at low water. The merchants' stores are open weekly, on Wednesday, for the reception of corn; and it is intended to establish a weekly market for provisions, &c., under the auspices of Colonel Gwynne, the present proprietor of the manor: a fair for the hiring of servants is held on November 13th. The magistrates for the division hold petty sessions once a month; and courts leet for the manor are held in May and October. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A school on the late Dr. Bell's plan is supported partly by subscription. Mynach-dy, the property and residence of Col. Gwynne, situated at a short distance from the town, is supposed, from its name (which signifies "monastery"), to have been anciently a small ecclesiastical establishment: in the grounds are some tumuli, called Hên Gastell, of obscure origin. On the sea-shore, near the town, there is a small circular encampment, designated Castell Cadwgan, and supposed to have been constructed by Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, about the year 1148.

is of considerable antiquity, and was formerly invested with various privileges, which, however, have fallen into disuse. In the division of the county, which took place on its subjugation by Fitz-Hamon, the Norman adventurer, it formed part of the territories conferred by that chieftain upon Caradoc, son of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, the dethroned prince, who made it the place of his residence, and is supposed to have erected the ancient castle, the foundations of which are still discernible in a field adjoining the churchyard. This castle, though of no great extent, was commodiously situated for defending the pass of the river, and sufficiently formidable to become an object of importance in the various wars which at that time disturbed the peace of the principality. Caradoc was succeeded in his lordship by his son Morgan, who is regarded by some writers as the founder of the stately abbey of Margam, of which there are still considerable remains. About the year 1150, Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, making an irruption into the county of Glamorgan, at the head of a powerful army, laid waste the territories of Morgan ab Caradoc ab Iestyn, and took and demolished the castle of Aberavon. Upon this occasion, Morgan, unable to resist the force which was opposed to him, fled with his followers, and, taking sanctuary in the churches and monasteries, placed himself under the protection of William, Earl of Gloucester and Lord of Glamorgan. In 1349, Thomas, son of Sir John de Avon, Knt., having succeeded to the lordship of Avon, granted to the abbey of Margam a charter, confirming all former grants, and to the inhabitants of the borough the free exercise of all the privileges which they had previously enjoyed. During the usurpation of Cromwell, the portreeve, being apprised of the approach of the protector's emissaries, contrived to secure the charter and other documents relating to the borough, by concealing them in a rough piece of oak, in which he had formed a cavity for that purpose, and on which, upon the arrival of the officers, he was found chopping sticks, as upon a common block. By this artifice the papers were preserved, and the piece of oak, upon which the marks of the hatchet are still visible, is now carefully preserved as the corporation chest.

The town is situated at a short distance from the eastern shore of Swansea bay, under a lofty ridge of hills, by which it is sheltered from the north winds; but, from its proximity to a marsh, it is much exposed to damps, and the inhabitants are consequently subject to ague and other complaints: it is neither paved nor lighted, and consists almost entirely of mean and ill-built houses, affording but little accommodation to the inhabitants, and fewer attractions to strangers. The land in the vicinity is subject to frequent inundations of the river Avon, which flows on the eastern side of the town. The most alarming and destructive of these occurred on July 25th, 1768, when the water flowed into the church and every house in the town, in most places to the height of five feet, to the great danger of the lives of the inhabitants. Entire fields of corn upon its banks were laid waste by the flood, which swept away Aberavon bridge and others, and a great quantity of hay, trees, &c.; and, on its subsiding, the town was left covered with mud and slime, which wholly destroyed the provisions in it, so that the poorer inhabitants were reduced to great distress, being almost perishing from want and hunger, but were seasonably and plentifully relieved by the bountiful humanity of Thomas Mansel Talbot, Esq. A handsome and substantial stone bridge of one arch has been erected, by William Edwards, the celebrated self-taught architect, over the Avon, to which river alone the town is indebted for the small degree of importance it has acquired. Aberavon is a creek to the port of Swansea: the harbour is small, but sufficiently commodious. The imports are copper and iron ores, for the supply of the extensive works at Cwm Bychan, in the adjoining parish of Michaelston, from which a tram-road passes through the town to the shipping-place near the mouth of the river, for the more easy conveyance of copper, iron, and tin plates, which are manufactured at those works, and, with pyroligneous acid, form the principal exports. The other works in this neighbourhood, consisting of tin, iron, and copper, are in the parish of Margam, and their shipping-place is at Tae Bâch, a short distance to the eastward. There is no chartered market, but meat and other provisions are constantly exposed for sale: an annual fair is held on the 30th of April.

Aberavon is a borough by prescription: the government is vested in a portreeve, a recorder, two aldermen, and an unlimited number of burgesses, assisted by a "common attorney," two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The portreeve is annually appointed by the constable of the castle, who, from three of the burgesses, put in nomination for that purpose by ballot, selects one to fill the office. This was one of the boroughs contributory to Cardif in returning one member to parliament; but by the new reform bill, recently passed, the towns of Swansea, Loughor, Neath, Aberavon, and Kenwig, have been constituted one borough, with the privilege of returning a representative to parliament: the right of election is in the resident burgesses, and in every male person of full age, occupying any house, or other premises, either as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, of the clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering his name as the act demands: the portreeve of Swansea is the returning officer. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of burgesses, on their coming of age, and may be acquired by purchase, though the burgesses recognize no other claim than that of birth: on a recent occasion the sum of £200 was accepted for it by the burgesses at large. The corporation formerly were in possession of considerable property, which, from the encroachment of the sand and other causes, has become of very little value. Twenty-five of the senior burgesses still enjoy each the exclusive right of three acres of enclosed land, and the rental of the remaining borough property is about £50 per annum. A town-hall was begun in the year 1826, and upwards of £300 has been expended upon its erection, but it is still unfinished, owing to the want of adequate funds. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Baglan annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated conjointly in the king's books at £9. 4. 9½., endowed with the great tithes, and in the patronage of the Rev. Edward Thomas. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was rebuilt about sixty years ago, and is appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the inhabitants. There are places of worship for Particular Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. A National school is about to be established, in connexion with the Central School Society in London, which has contributed £50 towards the erection of a building for that purpose. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £63. 8.

ABERBAIDON (ABER-BAIDEN), a hamlet, in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (W. by N.) from Abergavenny. The population is returned with the parish. This place derives its name from being situated at the junction of a small river, called the Baiden, with the Usk. It is intersected by the river Clydach, which passes through a deep valley to its confluence with the Usk, and in its course forms several cascades, the most remarkable of which was called Pwll y Cwn, or "The Dog's Pool," now converted to manufacturing purposes. The Brecknock canal is carried over this river by means of an embanked aqueduct, eighty-four feet above the bed of the river, and communicates with different rail-roads, formed in connexion with some lime and coal works situated within the limits of the hamlet, which, together with the Clydach iron-works, afford employment to a large proportion of the inhabitants, and the produce of which is distributed, by means of the canal, throughout the adjacent district. On the south side of a hill, at the base of which flows the Clydach, there are the remains of an ancient British fortress, called the Gaer. This hamlet supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £199. 17.

ABERCONWAY (ABER-CONWAY), a sea-port, borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of LLECHWEDD ISAV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 24 miles (E. N. E.) from Carnarvon, and 236 (N. W. by W.) from London, on the road to Holyhead, containing 1245 inhabitants. This place, which was anciently called Caer Gyfin, is supposed to have arisen from the ruins of the Roman station Conovium, in the neighbouring parish of Caerhên, and derives its name from its situation near the mouth of the river Conway, which falls into the Irish sea about four miles from the town. Of its earlier history few particulars are recorded, and very little authentic information can be traced prior to the year 1185, when Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of Wales, founded a monastery here, for brethren of the Cistercian order, which he endowed with ample possessions and with numerous valuable and important privileges. The abbey continued to flourish unmolested till the reign of Henry III., during whose efforts to repair the fortifications of Deganwy, on the opposite side of the river, to facilitate the subjugation of the principality, it was plundered and some of the conventual buildings were burnt, about the year 1245, by a party of three hundred of his Welsh vassals in the marches, whom that monarch had despatched to the rescue of a vessel from Ireland, laden with provisions, which was stranded on the coast, and had been attacked by the people of this neighbourhood, who had previously reduced the English soldiers to great distress, by cutting off their supplies. Exasperated at the outrage done to their stately monastery, now become one of the primary objects of their religious veneration, the Welsh rushed down from the mountains, whither they had been driven by the detachment from Henry's army, and suddenly fell upon their assailants, whom they found heavily laden with spoil, slew many of them, forced others into the Conway, where they perished, and took several prisoners, whom they afterwards barbarously put to death, cutting off their heads, tearing their limbs, and throwing the mangled corpses and members into the Conway. They then again furiously attacked the vessel, which was defended with great bravery and spirit by Sir Walter Bisset, until midnight, when, on the influx of the tide, the Welsh were obliged to withdraw, and Sir Walter and his force, abandoning their dangerous situation, retired to the English camp. In the morning the Welsh returned, and, finding the vessel deserted, took possession of the cargo, almost wholly consisting of wine, and set fire to the ship; so that the English only obtained seven tuns of wine, which they took out of that portion of the vessel not consumed by fire. In 1277, Edward I. advanced with his army through the level parts of North Wales to Aberconway; and Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the reigning prince, was compelled to retire among the mountains of Snowdon, and soon after agreed to a humiliating treaty of peace, which was concluded at this place. On the next invasion of Wales by Edward, in 1282, he again led his army hither, and stationed it with great advantage in the vicinity, the cavalry being encamped on the plains at the foot of the Snowdon mountains, and the infantry posted on the sides of the hills, under cover of the woods. Having finally reduced Wales under his dominion, the same monarch, in 1283, erected here, as at Carnarvon, a strong and stately castle, on the site of the ancient monastery, the inmates of which he removed to an abbey which he had founded for them at Maenan, on the Denbighshire side of the Conway, but still in Carnarvonshire, and ultimately transferred them, according to some writers, to the celebrated abbey of Vale Royal, in Cheshire, also of his foundation; though it is the opinion of others that they continued at Maenan till the dissolution. He then fortified the town with walls, twelve feet in thickness, defended by twenty-four towers, and having six principal gates, enclosing an irregular triangular area, and communicating at the south-east angle with the castle, which occupies the summit of an immense isolated rock of compact schistus, on the western shore of the river Conway. After the completion of these splendid fortifications, Edward, in 1284, incorporated the town, together with others in the principality, granting the inhabitants a charter of privileges, equal to those which he had previously bestowed on the inhabitants of Hereford, and appointed a constable of the castle, whom he also made mayor of the borough. In 1290, this sovereign again came in person into North Wales, at the head of an army, to repress the insurrection under Madoc, an illegitimate son of the late Llewelyn, and, having crossed the Conway with a part of his forces, awaited at the castle the arrival of the remainder. In executing this movement, Edward lost several waggons and other carriages, laden with provisions, which were intercepted by the Welsh, who suddenly came down in great multitudes from the mountains, and invested the castle on the land side. The rear of the English army being unable to join the king, in consequence of a sudden rise of the Conway, the latter, hemmed in by a vindictive enemy and an impassable river, was placed in a situation of considerable embarrassment, and the garrison was reduced to great distress for want of provisions, which the king voluntarily shared with his soldiers. The Conway at last suddenly subsiding, the remainder of Edward's army crossed to his relief; and the Welsh, abandoning the siege, retired to the mountains of Snowdon. On the departure of the enemy, the English monarch kept his Christmas here with great splendour and without molestation; and the insurgents were shortly after defeated with great slaughter by the Earl of Warwick.

Richard II., whilst in Ireland, appointed this place the rendezvous of his forces destined to oppose the usurpation of Bolingbroke, afterwards Henry IV.; and forty thousand loyal vassals out of Cheshire and Wales are said to have assembled here, under the command of the Earl of Salisbury, awaiting his arrival. But, wearied by broken promises and protracted delays, many of them retired to their homes: still a sufficient number remained to assert, with promise of success, the rights of Richard, had not that prince, on his arrival, been persuaded to retire from this place, under a specious proposal of accommodation with Bolingbroke, by the Earl of Northumberland, who conducted him to Flint castle, and there treacherously abandoned him to the power of his rival. From this time Aberconway continued uninterruptedly in the possession of the reigning monarch, and, during the contentions of the houses of York and Lancaster, sustained but little injury. It was repaired by Henry VII., who restored that part of the fortifications which had fallen into decay; and it remained in an entire state until the civil war of the seventeenth century. In 1643, the castle was garrisoned for the king by Dr. John Williams, Archbishop of York, who was appointed governor; and, having made his nephew, William Hookes, deputy-governor of the town and castle, was afterwards invested by the king with the office of commander-in-chief of the royalists in North Wales. At this critical period, the castle, from its impregnable strength, was made the depository of the writings, plate, and valuables of the neighbouring gentry, to whom the archbishop gave receipts for their deposits, thus making himself responsible for their security. But, in 1645, Prince Rupert, taking upon himself the command of the royalists in North Wales, superseded the archbishop in his office of commander-in-chief, and displaced his nephew from the governorship of the castle, which he entrusted to Sir John Owen. Deeply offended at this, and apprehending ruin to himself, from his receiving no security for the treasure which had been committed to his custody, the archbishop listened to overtures made to him by some of the opposite party, and, joining with General Mytton, assisted him in the reduction of the town, which was taken by storm on the 15th of August, in that year. The castle held out till the 10th of November following, when, after a valiant and resolute defence, it finally surrendered to the parliamentary forces. The archbishop, who, during the action, was wounded in the neck, was, in consideration of his services, absolved by the parliament from all his sequestrations; and Mytton, with a degree of generosity unusual in those times, restored to every individual the property which he had placed for security in the castle. That general, however, seized on all the Irish whom he found among the garrison, and, causing them to be tied back to back, ordered them to be thrown into the Conway. The grandeur and beauty of the castle obtained for it a due consideration from the captors, no order, as was usual upon those occasions, being issued for its demolition; and at the Restoration it was given up to Charles II., as the only perfect fortified place which had escaped the violence of the parliamentarians. That monarch granted it to Edward Earl of Conway, by whose order the iron, timber, and lead were taken down and transported to Ireland, in 1665, notwithstanding the zealous remonstrances of the deputy-lieutenants and gentry of North Wales, who were anxious to preserve from premature dilapidation an edifice which for four hundred years had attracted the admiration of the country: the order, however, was carried into effect, and this magnificent structure was reduced nearly to the state in which it at present appears.

The town is pleasantly and advantageously situated on the western shore of the river Conway, and consists of one principal street leading to the castle, intersected at right angles by a spacious street extending from the east gate to the market-place, and by a narrower street of greater length, leading from the continuation of Castle-street, on the north, to the west gate. The ancient walls, with their towers, are still in good preservation, and the principal gates are remaining: a very considerable proportion of the area within the walls is occupied as garden ground, and the houses are comparatively few and in detached situations. Among the recent improvements which have taken place in the immediate vicinity of the town, on the line of the great Holyhead road, and in which a vast sum has been expended by government, the principal is the construction of a suspension bridge over the river Conway, in lieu of the ancient ferry, which was commenced on the 3rd of April, 1822, and completed on the 1st of July, 1826. The chains are fastened, on the east side of the river, in a solid rock, which, before the construction of the bridge, was insulated, and on the west side, after passing under the walls of the castle to a distance of fifty-four feet, are securely bolted into the rock on which that fortress is built. From the eastern extremity an embankment, six hundred and seventy-one yards in length, and thirty feet in breadth at the top, has been raised on the sands between the island and the shore; and from the western extremity a road has been cut through the solid rock, under the north-east side of the castle, to the distance of one hundred and seventy-five yards, to unite with Castle-street; thus making the whole extent of the bridge and its approaches more than nine hundred yards. On this road a very handsome lodge of two towers, corresponding in design with the venerable remains of the castle, has been erected, forming an elegant arched entrance from the town to the bridge, through a pair of massive iron gates of noble appearance; and on the rock on the eastern side a very pretty lodge has been built for the bridge-surveyor, the stone for the whole having been procured from the neighbouring quarries. The length of the bridge, between the centres of the supporting towers, is three hundred and twenty-seven feet; its height, above high water mark, eighteen feet; and the height of the pillars, over which the chains pass, forty-two feet from the platform. Owing to the construction of the embankment, the velocity of the current between the castle rock and that which was formerly insulated was so much increased, that it was found extremely difficult to manage and moor the raft upon which the main chains of the Menai suspension bridge had been erected and floated to their positions, and which had been towed round the coast to Aberconway, for a similar purpose. A platform was therefore constructed on ropes extending from the tops of the supporting towers, on which the chains were put together in the places they were intended permanently to occupy, and, the ropes having been afterwards slackened, were brought to their bearings and adjusted. The principal chains, from which the roadway is suspended, are eight in number, and are formed of links, each consisting of five bars of iron, three inches and a half wide, and one inch thick. Connected with the suspension bridge, a very important improvement has been effected in the road leading from the town through the north-west wall, where a noble gateway has been erected, and proceeding round the immense mountain of Penmaen Bâch, along the northern precipitous declivity of which it is carried by an excavation in the solid rock, in some places eighty feet high, and extending more than a mile in length. The new line of road is more than four miles and a half in length, from Aberconway to Bryn y Môn, where it joins the old road: this undertaking, which is one of the most extensive and important in this part of the kingdom, was completed under the direction of Mr. Telford. A new line of road has also been projected, to the north-west of the castle, from this town to Llanrwst, and a bridge has here been built over the river Gyfin.

Aberconway is a creek to the port of Beaumaris; but, notwithstanding the natural advantages of its situation, and the important improvements in its immediate vicinity, there is neither any trade of importance, nor any manufacture whatever carried on in the town. The river Conway, which, considering the shortness of its course, not exceeding twenty-four miles, is perhaps one of the noblest to be found in any country, is here navigable for vessels of two hundred tons' burden, and forms under the town wall an excellent harbour, accessible at all times, in which ships may ride in safety. There is also an extensive and commodious quay, lately much improved by the corporation, affording great facility for loading and unloading goods; but, notwithstanding the existence of every local advantage, the commerce of the port is chiefly confined to the importation of coal and groceries, and to the exportation of timber, corn, slates, copper-ore, &c., principally to Liverpool. The Conway is celebrated for the pearl muscle, which it produces in great abundance; and formerly the pearl fishery was carried on here to a very great extent: at present about forty persons are employed in the fishery, which produces, on an average, about one hundred and sixty ounces per week: the pearls are equal to those found on any part of the British coast, and are generally sold at the rate of two shillings and sixpence per ounce.

The market, which, prior to the construction of the suspension bridge, was very small and badly attended, is on Friday, and is now, owing to the facility of attending it afforded by that structure, greatly improved; and the fairs, which are on March 26th, April 30th, June 20th, August 10th, September 16th, October 20th, and November 15th, are almost entirely neglected: that in September is commonly called Honey Fair, being supplied with a considerable quantity of that article, of a superior quality, from the glens of the adjoining mountains. The borough received its first charter of incorporation from Edward I., in 1281; or, as some think, in 1284, in which latter year the castle was built: by this charter, confirmed by Edward III., Richard II., Edward IV., Richard III., Henry VII., Henry VIII., and Elizabeth, the government is vested in a mayor, appointed by letters patent, as governor of the castle, two bailiffs, a recorder, a water-bailiff, a coroner, two serjeants at mace, and other officers, who, with the exception of the mayor, are elected annually on the 29th of September, from among the burgesses at large. This is one of the six contributory boroughs within the county, which unite in returning one member to parliament: the right of election, which was formerly vested in the burgesses at large, in number fifty-eight, of whom only fifteen were resident, is now vested in the resident burgesses only, and in such other male persons of full age as occupy any house, or other premises, either as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, of the clear annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering his name as the act requires: the bailiffs of Carnarvon are the returning officers. The freedom of the borough is obtained only by gift of the burgesses at large, who generally present it to persons living out of the borough, and mostly at a considerable distance. The corporation have power by their charter to hold courts of session for the trial of all offenders not accused of capital crimes, but they have not for many years exercised it. A court of requests, the jurisdiction of which is co-extensive with the borough, and at which the recorder presides, is held every third week, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings; and courts leet and baron are also held. The general quarter sessions for the county were formerly held here by adjournment, but for many years past they have been held at Carnarvon: the county magistrates hold a petty session for the division in the town-hall, on the first Friday in every month.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7.7.6., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir David Erskine, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious structure, and contains some good monuments, among which are, one to the memory of Nicholas Hookes, of Aberconway, Gent., whose epitaph represents him to have been the forty-first child of his father, William Hookes, Esq., by Alice his wife, and the father of twenty-seven children; and a rude effigy of Mary, the mother of Archbishop Williams. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. About one hundred and forty children of the parish are gratuitously instructed in a temporary building, but there is no appropriate school-house, or permanent endowment. Lewis Owen, in 1623, bequeathed in trust half the rectorial tithes of Aberconway, producing at present £148 per annum, to be expended annually in clothing the poor of the parishes of Aberconway, Eglwys-Rhôs, Llangwstenyn, and Llandudno; the other half is given to the vicar of Aberconway, and £16 per annum to each of the parishes above named. Of the monastery founded by Prince Llewelyn there are no remains: the founder was interred within it, in 1240, but on its dissolution, after Edward I. had removed the monks to Maenan, a few miles higher up the river, Llewelyn's remains were conveyed first to Maenan, and thence, after the dissolution of that abbey, to Llanrwst, and the stone coffin in which they were deposited is now preserved in the Gwydir chapel there. In the conventual church was also interred Cynan ab Owain Gwynedd, in the year 1200, in a monk's cowl, from a superstitious belief that by such means the soul would be preserved from punishment. It was also the burial-place of Davydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, son of the founder, who died in 1246; and of his brother Gruffydd, who died a prisoner in the hands of Henry III., and whose body was given up, about the year 1248, at the urgent solicitations of the abbots of Aberconway and Strata Florida, for interment in this abbey, which was then considered the mausoleum for the princes of North Wales. The extensive ruins of the magnificent castle of Aberconway comprise an irregular parallelogram, divided into two wards, of which the smaller is square: the walls, which are sixteen feet in thickness, are defended by eight circular embattled towers, nearly equidistant, and of prodigious strength: from the summits of four of them, which overlook the river, rise circular embattled turrets, of slender proportions and of great beauty. The principal entrances were from the river and the town: the former consisted of a narrow winding ascent up the steep rock, terminating in an advanced work fronting the gate of the castle, and protected by small round towers; and the latter, which was similarly defended, was approached by a drawbridge over a large fosse. The keep and other fortifications are massive and of considerable dimensions, and the state apartments exhibit good specimens in the decorated style of English architecture, of which the details are peculiarly fine: among these, an oriel window in one of the great towers appears to have been a beautiful composition. The great hall is one hundred and thirty feet long, and thirty-two feet wide: the roof, which is proportionably lofty, was supported by a series of noble arches, of which part still remains; and the whole apartment was lighted by a fine range of six large windows on the one side, commanding a view of the country, and of three on the other, looking into the court. Both as a royal castle and a fortress, this interesting and extensive pile was equally conspicuous for its beauty and its strength; and the ruins, which convey an impressive idea of its former importance, are among the most magnificent and picturesque in the kingdom. The inhabitants, some years ago, by imprudently getting stones from the rock beneath one of the great towers, undermined it, and brought down the lower portion, the fragments of which form a vast heap of ruins on the shore; the upper part of the tower is left entire, suspended from a great height, and exhibits in the breach such a degree of strength and solidity as might almost have defied the ravages of time. In the vicinity of the town are numerous and extensive encampments, but none within the limits of the parish, which comprises comparatively a small area. Archbishop Williams was a native of this place, and the apartment in which he was born is still shewn: when governor of the castle, he built a house here, in 1642, in one of the apartments of which his arms, impaling those of York, are yet preserved. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £351.

ABERDARE (ABER-DÂR), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, and 21 (N. W. by N.) from Cardif (which is the post town), on the road from Cardif to Neath, over Hîrwaun common, containing 3961 inhabitants. This parish is celebrated as having been the scene of a sanguinary battle, in the reign of William Rufus, which is said to have taken place on Hîrwaun common, about two miles to the north of the village, between the forces of Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, and those of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, aided by a body of Norman adventurers, under the command of Robert Fitz-Hamon, who, after having gained a signal victory over Rhys, who was slain in the contest, turned his arms against Iestyn, and dispossessed him of his territories, the most valuable of which he reserved to himself, and partitioned the remainder among the knights who had attended him in the expedition.

The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Dâr, and near its confluence with the Cynon, in the delightful mountain vale of Cynon, which is remarkable for picturesque and romantic scenery, and is equally characterised by features of beauty and of grandeur. Its majestic groves of oak and fir, alternating with fruitful corn-fields and luxuriant meadows, are finely contrasted with precipitous and barren rocks, and enlivened by the bold sweep of the river, which in some of its windings appears to be hemmed in on every side by lofty and sterile mountains. The parish abounds with coal and iron-ore, the working of which, though it has materially defaced the beauty of the neighbourhood, which was previously distinguished as a place of enviable retirement, has added greatly to its wealth and the number of its inhabitants. Three iron-works are conducted upon a very extensive scale, of which those at Llwydcoed and Abernant are capable, when in full operation, of producing annually more than eleven thousand tons of iron; the works at Gadlys are at present discontinued. The Aberdare canal, which is seven miles in length, communicates with the Glamorganshire canal, and, by means of a tram-road, with the extensive works at Hîrwaun, in the county of Brecknock, affording a facility of conveyance by which the whole produce of this mineral district is sent to the port of Cardif, where it is shipped to various parts of the kingdom: this canal passes within half a mile of the village, from which a rail-road, two miles in length, extends to the works at Llwydcoed and Abernant. This parish is included within the borough of Merthyr-Tydvil, to which, by the act for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, recently passed, the privilege of returning one member to parliament has been granted: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the clear yearly value of ten pounds, if duly registered as the act directs. It is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held at Merthyr-Tydvil, on the second Thursday in every month, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llantrisant, who receives the vicarial tithes of this parish; but at present a negotiation is pending between the Marquis of Bute and the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, in whose gift is the vicarage of Llantrisant, pursuant to which, should the latter accede to his lordship's proposal for further endowing the incumbency, the patronage of Aberdare will be transferred into his lordship's hands. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a small ancient building without a tower or steeple, remarkable only for its rustic simplicity of character, which is in perfect harmony with the surrounding scenery. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic Methodists, English and Welsh Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. A National school, capable of accommodating one hundred boys and fifty girls, has been built by subscription, on ground given for that purpose by the Marquis of Bute, and is partly supported by subscription, in addition to small weekly payments from the parents of the scholars. Four houses in the parish, belonging to the poor, were endowed in 1724, by Mrs. Elinor Matthews, with a rent-charge of £5 on the farm of Pen Caradoc, in the parish of Llanwonno, now the property of J. B. Bruce, Esq. There are remains of two ancient blomeries in this parish, by some writers attributed to the Romans, and by others, with greater probability, to the Britons, before the use of blast furnaces was known; and vestiges of a circular British encampment may be distinctly traced. Aberamman, the seat of the late Anthony Bacon, Esq., of Benham, in the county of Berks, was for centuries the residence of the family of Matthews; and Dyfryn is the birthplace, and was anciently the residence of Ieuan ddu ab Davydd ab Owain, an eminent poet, who flourished about the middle of the fifteenth century, and was a munificent patron of the bards: the estate came to his descendants, who, by the usual transition of names, were called Jones, from whom it was purchased by William Bruce, Esq., in 1748, and is now the property of his grandson, J. Bruce Bruce, Esq., who, under a recent act of parliament, has been appointed stipendiary police magistrate of Merthyr-Tydvil, Aberdare, and Gellygaer. Edward Evan, for many years minister of an Independent congregation in the neighbourhood, an eminent poet and philosopher, to whose efforts for the preservation of the bardic institutions the principality is greatly indebted, was also a native of this parish; he died in 1798, on the day appointed for a meeting of the bards of Glamorgan, which he was to have attended. The inhabitants of this parish complain, as a singular hardship, that, although the Hîrwaun furnaces of Mr. Crawshay contribute largely to the poor's rate of the parish of Penderrin, in the county of Brecknock, in which they are situated, the burden of the removals and accidents of a large portion of the workmen falls upon the parish of Aberdare, just within the limits of which their cottages are situated. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £605. 2.

ABERDARON (ABER-DARON), a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Llein division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 18 miles (W.S.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 1389 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the extreme point of the peninsula of Llein, the Promontorium Langanum of Ptolemy, derives its name from the small river Daron, which here falls into the sea, off Bardsey Race. In 1115, Gruffydd ab Rhys, Prince of South Wales, took sanctuary in the church of this place, from the treachery of Gruffydd ab Cynan, sovereign of North Wales, who intended to deliver him into the hands of the English monarch, Henry I. Gruffydd ab Cynan commanded the fugitive prince to be dragged from his asylum by force; but his soldiers were unable to execute his orders, from the strenuous resistance opposed to them by the clergy of the neighbourhood, who successfully exerted themselves in defence of the privileges of the church; and the young prince, with his partisans, escaped by night, and set forward on his journey to the deep forest of Strath Towy, in South Wales, where, having collected the adherents of his family, he commenced hostilities against the Norman and Flemish settlers. Aberdaron was anciently much resorted to by devotees, as a place of embarkation for Bardsey Island, on their pilgrimage to the celebrated monastery established there; and on the summit of the promontory are the remains of the ancient Capel Vair, or Chapel of Our Lady, erected for the use of the mariners, who, previously to their entering upon the dangerous navigation of the sound, were accustomed to invoke the protection of its tutelar saint. At a small distance from it, and near the shore, are the remains of another chapel, called Capel Anhaelog, which, like the former, has been suffered, since the dissolution of Bardsey monastery, to fall into decay. The village, which is small and chiefly inhabited by fishermen, is, by its isolated situation, and the want of good roads and other facilities of communication, precluded from all intercourse, except on market days during the summer with Pwllheli, from which place the inhabitants are supplied with necessaries, and by sea with Liverpool, to which port vessels sail regularly every week with pigs, poultry, and eggs, and from which they return laden with coal, for the supply of the neighbourhood. A stratum of excellent limestone has recently been discovered in this parish, which, from its scarcity in this part of the country, promises to be of great benefit to the farmers: lead-ore has also been found in small quantities. A fair is held here annually on the 26th of June.

The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvaelrhys annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £3. 9. 4½, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor: there is also a sinecure rectory, rated at £10. 9. 4½, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge, who usually present a fellow of that college. The church, dedicated to St. Hyrwyn, a saint of the island of Bardsey, was formerly collegiate, and had the privilege of sanctuary: it is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, and, though at present in a greatly dilapidated state, appears to have been an elegant and highly finished building, in the ancient style of English architecture: some trifling remains of stalls are visible in the chancel. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A school for the education of poor children of Aberdaron is held here every fourth year, in turn with Llanvaelrhys, Bryncroes, and Rhiw; the income of the master arises from the rental of a teneement in the parish of Bryncroes. Dr. Henry Rowland, Bishop of Bangor, founded an almshouse in that city, in 1616, for six single men, of whom two are to be of Aberdaron. The courts for the manor of Bardsey were formerly held at a house in this parish, which still bears the name of "Court;" and on an eminence near it, called Brynn y Crogbren, or the "Gallows' Hill," criminals were probably executed: another house in the neighbourhood is called Secar, signifying the Exchequer. Below the cliff occupied by the ruins of Capel Vair is the cave of Ogo Vair, in which there is a well, formerly much frequented by devotees, who superstitiously believed that, by carrying a mouthful of the water up a circuitous and dangerous path to the summit of the hill, whatever wish they might entertain would be accomplished. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £494.

ABERDOVEY (ABER-DYVI), a sea-port and bathing-place, in the parish of TOWYN, hundred of ESTIMANOR, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Towyn. The population is returned with the parish. This place is pleasantly situated on the northern side of the mouth of the river Dovey, which here empties itself into Cardigan bay, and from which it derives its name, on the road from Machynlleth to Towyn, and is rapidly rising into estimation as a bathing-place: the beach is highly favourable for bathing, being composed of hard firm sand, and several respectable houses and a commodious hotel have been erected of late years, for the accommodation of visitors. In the year 1827, a new line of road was opened between Pennal and Towyn, which, proceeding along the northern bank of the Dovey, among scenery beautifully picturesque, and embracing a fine view of the opposite coast of Cardiganshire, and the æstuary of the river, passes through Aberdovey, and is continued along the shore to Towyn. For nearly the whole of its extent from Pennal to Aberdovey, it is cut through the solid rock, which, in many places, presents its naked side, of different elevations, forming a pleasing contrast to the wooded declivity of the hill, which, from the base to the summit, is thickly clothed with trees and shrubs of various kinds, presenting, in conjunction with the broad æstuary of the river, and aided by the vernal blossoms of the mountain heath, a pleasing scene of picturesque beauty. The ride from Aberdovey to Towyn, along the sands, at low water, is extremely delightful. The road from Pennal to Machynlleth has also been much improved, thereby increasing the facility of access to this rising place, which, for these and other advantages, is greatly indebted to the exertions of A. Corbett, Esq., of Ynysymaengwyn, in this parish. A subscription has been entered into for the erection of a chapel of ease, which will afford great convenience to the inhabitants, who are four miles distant from the parochial church. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with Sunday schools attached. Petty sessions for the hundred are held here, alternately with Pennal, once in two months.

The port, which is a member of that of Aberystwith, possesses a considerable share of coasting trade: the imports are coal, culm, grocery, limestone, bricks, timber, &c., and the exports, timber poles for the collieries, bark, lead ore, and slates. The harbour is excellent, but there is a bar on the north side of the entrance to it, which is said to have assumed its present position in consequence of the wind blowing so frequently from the south: two buoys, the outer black and the inner red, were fixed upon this bar by the Corporation of the Trinity House, in March 1831. The river, which is here crossed by a ferry to the opposite shore of Cardiganshire, is navigable up to Derwenlâs, within two miles of Machynlleth. There are extensive slate quarries in the neighbourhood, and mines of lead and copper, but the latter are only worked in proportion to the demand for those articles. In making the new road, a vessel, containing a considerable number of early English coins, was found; and a vase of the Tuscan shape, capable of holding about two quarts, and now in the possession of the Rev. Isaac Bonsall, rector of Llanwrin, was picked up on the sands opposite to the port, in 1824: it is composed of burnt clay, and is nearly covered with an incrustation of oyster and other marine shells. Ieuan Dyvi, a celebrated bard, who flourished about the close of the fifteenth century, was a native of this place. The district called Cantrev Gwaelod, or the Lowland Hundred, traditionally reported to have been inundated by the sea, which event is also commemorated in some of the Welsh poems, is said to have been situated between this place and Harlech: it was a tract of great fertility and beauty, containing sixteen fortified towns and cities, subject to a petty prince, called Gwyddno Goronhîr, and is stated to have been swallowed up about the year 500.

ABEREDW (ABER-EDWY), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Builth, containing 344 inhabitants. It derives its name from being situated at the mouth of the river Edwy, which, after flowing through the parish, empties itself into the Wye, the latter river here forming the line of boundary between the counties of Radnor and Brecknock: the Edwy is only a small stream, famous for its trout and eels. The surface of the parish is rocky and uneven, and the scenery pleasing and frequently picturesque: the view from the churchyard is extremely beautiful. The petty sessions for the hundred are occasionally held here. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Cewydd, is a plain building, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by an oak screen, in the later style of English architecture, with a square tower at the west end, and, if not rebuilt, appears to have undergone thorough repair in the time of the Tudors. A small plot of land was given by Lewis Lloyd, and, in 1746, the sum of £20 by Elizabeth Price, for the benefit of decayed housekeepers: the sum of £12 per annum is paid out of the proceeds of a farm called Vronoleu, in the parish of Llanbadarn y Garreg, the bequest of Mrs. Gwynne of that place, for distribution, in equal proportions, among decayed housekeepers of the parishes of Aberedw, Llanbadarn y Garreg, and Llanvarredd. The profits of this manor are under the superintendence of seven trustees, and are applied in apprenticing the poor children of several parishes. Within the short distance of a quarter of a mile from this place are divers objects of great interest and attraction. The churchyard is bounded on one side by a steep precipice, at the base of which flows the Edwy, which from this point winds through a narrow defile of rocks, rising on one side to a height of nearly three hundred feet, and romantically varied by alternate stratifications of naked rock and green sward, partially concealed by hanging woods; on the other side, the rocks, though their elevation is less, have a more striking character. Here a boldly projecting rock threatens with immediate destruction the traveller passing beneath it; there a perpendicular wall of solid rock, extending one hundred feet in height, presents its bold and unbroken front, richly mantled with mosses, ivy, and other parasitical plants, and in the clefts of which the larger birds build their nests. Among these rocks a rude cave, about six feet square, called Llewelyn's Cave, is said to have been occasionally used as an asylum by that brave, but unfortunate, prince Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last royal defender of Welsh liberty and independence, against the overpowering army of Edward I. A short distance north-westward from the church, and at the head of this beautiful and romantic dingle, Llewelyn had a castle, the ruins of which are yet standing, on the banks of the Wye, and consist only of the fragment of a tower, or bastion, and part of a wall. During the defensive war which he waged against the English monarch, the Welsh prince summoned his adherents to a private conference at this castle; but of the disastrous result of this movement a variety of accounts has been given, some of which cannot be reconciled with the localities of this district. Mr. Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, who took great pains to reconcile the conflicting statements, says that, having marched to Aberedw, he was there surprised by a superior force of the enemy from Herefordshire, under the command of Edmund Mortimer and John Giffard, to whom intelligence of his arrival had been treacherously communicated by some of the inhabitants of this place. Thus unexpectedly attacked, Llewelyn fled with his men towards Builth, taking the precaution of ordering the shoes of his horse to be reversed, there being snow on the ground, which stratagem, however, was made known to the enemy by a blacksmith at Aberedw. Having arrived at the bridge over the Wye, he crossed it, and issued orders for its immediate demolition, before his pursuers arrived. Thus checked in their progress, the English returned to a ford, eight miles lower down on the river, which was known to some of the party, and thus effected a passage. Meanwhile, Llewelyn had proceeded to Builth, from which, failing in his attempts to procure aid from the garrison, he advanced westward, up the Vale of Irvon, on the south side, for about three miles, where he crossed the river, a little above Llanynis church, over a bridge called Pont y Coed, or "the bridge of the wood," and stationed the few troops who had accompanied him in an advantageous position on the north side of that river, with a view to defend the bridge. The English, on coming up, made an attempt to obtain possession of it, but failing, they discovered a ford at a short distance, which a detachment of their troops secretly crossed, and coming behind the Welsh unawares, attacked them in the rear, and routed them; and Llewelyn himself was slain in a small dell, since called Cwm Llewelyn, or "Llewelyn's dingle," about two hundred yards from the scene of action, by one Adam de Francton, or de Framp-ton, who plunged his spear into his body without knowing the rank of his victim, and immediately joined his party in pursuit of the fleeing foe. Returning after the engagement, probably in search of plunder, de Francton discovered that he had slain the Welsh prince, whose head he immediately cut off, and sent it to the king of England. The body was dragged a short distance, to a place where the road from Builth branches off in two directions, one leading to Llanavon-Vawr, and the other to Llangammarch, where it was interred, the spot being still called Cevn y bedd, or Cevn bedd Llewelyn, "the ridge of Llewelyn's grave." From their infidelity on this occasion, the opprobrious designation of "Traitors of Aberedw," is said to have been given by Llewelyn to the inhabitants of this place. About three hundred yards to the east of the castle of Aberedw, on the summit of an eminence, is a large tumulus, directly above the river Edwy, on the side of which is that most awful precipice before described, so beautifully mantled, and forming an object so truly picturesque from every point of view but this, where it cannot be observed without indescribable sensations of awe. Thomas Jones, a landscape painter of distinguished repute, and best known by his two pieces of the "Campi Phlægræi," was born at Pen Careg, in the vicinity of this place, where, having succeeded to the family estate, he resided upon it until his death in 1803. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £246. 4.

ABEREIRCH (ABER-ERCH), a parish partly in the hundred of DINLLAEN, and partly in the hundred of EIVIONEDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E.N.E.) from Pwllheli, on the road to Criccieth, containing 1365 inhabitants. This small parish is pleasantly situated on the sea-shore, near the mouth of the river Eirch, from which it has received its name, and contains some agreeable scenery, interspersed with several well-built genteel houses, the principal of which is Hendrev, the property and residence of the Rev. T. Roberts. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Penrhôs annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cawrdav, is an ancient and spacious building, in the later style of English architecture, and consists of a nave, north aisle, and chancel; the two eastern windows, which are enriched with elegant tracery, have been ornamented with stained glass. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A teneement in the parish was bequeathed for the use of the poor, by the late Rev. Mr. Conway, the incumbent, and is now let for £6 per annum, which, with £4 per annum, arising from other charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed on St. Thomas' day. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £460. 13.

ABER-FRAW (ABER FRAW), a parish (formerly a market town), partly in the hundred of MENAI, but principally in that of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 13 miles (S.E. by S.) from Holyhead, containing 1367 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from its situation at the mouth of the small river Fraw, was distinguished at a very early period as the principal residence of the ancient princes of North Wales, by one of whom, Caswallon Law Hir, a palace was built, about the middle of the fifth century. Caswallon's successors having removed the seat of government to Caer Seiont, now Carnarvon, it was re-established at Aberfraw, in the year 870, by Roderic the Great, after his defeat of Burhred, the Mercian prince, who had invaded his dominions. Roderic fixed his supreme court of judicature at this place, which, until the death of Llewelyn, in 1282, continued to be the ordinary residence of the Welsh sovereigns. During that period, one of the three copies of the celebrated code of laws compiled, about the year 940, under the auspices of Hywel Dda, was deposited here. In 966, the palace was destroyed by the Irish, in one of their descents upon Anglesey, but was subsequently rebuilt; and soon after the commencement of the twelfth century, during the sovereignty of Gruffydd ab Cynan, it afforded an asylum to Gruffydd, son of Rhys ab Tewdwr, late prince of South Wales. The Welsh sovereign, shortly after paying a visit to Henry I., at London, was prevailed upon to promise that, on his return, he would deliver up the fugitive to the English monarch; but the young prince, fearing this treachery, withdrew from the palace with his brother Hywel; and Gruffydd ab Cynan, determined to perform his promise to Henry, having discovered the place of his retreat, despatched a body of horsemen to arrest him, in which attempt however, they did not succeed; for the young prince, being timely apprised of their design, again had recourse to flight, and, although closely pursued, effected his escape. Aberfraw has since this period dwindled into a mere village, and exhibits no remains of its former importance: it is pleasantly situated on the shore of St. George's channel, at the influx of the river Fraw, which has its source in two fine lakes just above the village, and, after flowing through the parish, falls into the sea, about three miles from one of the lakes, called Llŷn Coron, forming at its mouth a small harbour, capable of receiving vessels of forty tons' burden, which, at a very moderate expense, might be rendered highly commodious, having anciently been an excellent haven. The parish comprises about six thousand two hundred acres of land, which with the exception of five hundred acres of common, are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the soil is sandy, and well adapted to the production of grain, of which great quantities, especially of oats and barley, raised in the parish and in the surrounding country, are annually shipped from this small port, which is considered a creek within the limits of the port of Beaumaris: the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture and in fishing. The market, formerly held on Thursday, has been discontinued for several years: fairs are appointed to be held on the 7th of March, the Tuesday after Palm-Sunday, Wednesday after Trinity-Sunday, August 15th, October 23rd, and December 11th.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £20. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is an ancient and spacious structure, in the decorated style of English architecture, consisting of two spacious parallel aisles, separated by lofty pillars and finely pointed arches: the tower was demolished many years ago, but there is a handsome pointed arch, formerly leading into it from the church, still in a very perfect state of preservation. In the tything of Dindryval anciently stood a chapel, called Capel Mair, or "St. Mary's chapel." There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A ruined church, called Eglwys y Beili, was rebuilt for a school, in 1729, by Sir Arthur Owen, Bart., who endowed it with £4 per annum for the instruction of six poor children in the Welsh language. A National school has been recently built, and is supported by subscription, in which about one hundred children of both sexes receive gratuitous instruction. Mr. John Pugh Gwilym, in 1633, bequeathed £53. 6. 8., and the Rev. John Thomas, in 1642, bequeathed a portion of land, to the poor; and various other sums by different benefactors, amounting nearly to £70, secured formerly on the turnpike trust of the county, were appropriated to the same purpose, but they are either lost, or, by misapplication, are not now available for the uses to which they were originally given. At present there are no remains of the ancient palace, nor of any of the buildings connected with it, although some of the oldest inhabitants remember slight vestiges of it in the walls of a barn; and at the south-western extremity of the village there is an enclosure, called Gardd y Llŷs, or "the Palace Garden." In this parish are frequently found the amulets called Gleiniau Nadroedd, or "snake gems," supposed to have been made by the Romans, and bartered with the ancient Britons for the produce of their country: they are composed of glass, and are of a rich blue colour, some streaked, and others plain, and are now superstitiously used by the vulgar as charms for certain disorders, and in assisting children to cut their teeth. The Eisteddvodau, or triennial assemblies of the bards of this district, were held at Aberfraw, so long as it continued to be a royal residence. According to Mr. Rowlands, the historian of Anglesey, this is the birthplace of Walter, afterwards named Steward, or Stuart, who, going into Scotland, there founded the powerful family of that name, which afterwards enjoyed the sovereignty both of England and Scotland. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor amounts to £583. 19.

ABERGELE (ABER-GELAU), a market town and parish, in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (N. W.) from Denbigh, 20 (N. W.) from Ruthin, and 224 (N. W.) from London, on the great road to Holyhead, from Chester, containing 2506 inhabitants. This parish takes its name from its situation near the mouth of the river Geley, which here falls into the Irish sea, and is celebrated as the scene of several military exploits in the earlier period of the wars between England and Wales, and of various transactions of great historical interest. Prior to the Norman Conquest, Harold, in his attempt to subjugate this part of the principality, was encountered by Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, on the plain near Cevn Ogo, in this parish, and, after a sanguinary battle, in which he was defeated, and a considerable number of his men slain, was driven back to Rhuddlan. In the reign of William the Conqueror, Hugh Lupus, on his march to invade the Isle of Anglesey, passing through the defile of Cevn Ogo, which is the narrowest pass on this part of the coast, was attacked by an armed band of Welshmen, which had been posted there to intercept his progress, and of which, after an obstinate and protracted battle, eleven hundred were left dead on the spot. In the reign of Henry II., Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, on his retreat from Flintshire, fortified himself in this pass, where he gave battle to the forces of that monarch, and repulsed them with great slaughter: after having secured this important post, he retreated to Pen y parc, in the adjoining parish, where he made a stand against the English forces, and effectually checked the further invasion of his dominions. Near this same pass, Richard II., whom Percy, Earl of Northumberland, under pretence of an amicable interview with Bolingbroke, had inveigled from Aberconway castle, after his return from Ireland, was surrounded by a military band, bearing the Northumberland banner, and conducted to Flint castle, where he was treacherously betrayed by the earl into the power of the usurper. From these circumstances it has been justly remarked, that on no spot in the principality has more blood been shed than in the defile of Cevn Ogo.

The town is delightfully situated in a pleasant valley, watered by the river Geley, and within half a mile of the Irish sea, which forms the northern boundary of the parish. The coast, in some parts, is terminated by sandy cliffs, impending over the sea, which, according to tradition, has made considerable encroachment upon the land; and a stone tablet, in the north wall of the churchyard, records in Welsh, but without either name or date, that a man was buried there who lived three miles to the north, to which distance the coast previously extended. The testimony of this epitaph is corroborated by the appearance, at low water, of a large tract of hard loam, in which oak trees, in an almost entire state, but softened to the consistency of wax, have been found. The salubrity of the air, the pleasantness of its situation, and the decided superiority of its shore for sea-bathing, have rendered Abergele a favourite resort for invalids, and made it the most fashionable watering-place in North Wales: during the summer season it is frequented by numerous families, for whose accommodation every requisite arrangement has been made. The environs abound with picturesque and with strikingly bold scenery, and afford various pleasing and interesting excursions. Lead and copper ores, tin, and manganese, are occasionally found in the parish, and many spirited attempts have been made, but without proportionate success, to discover mines of sufficient extent to remunerate the adventurers for working them: lead-ore only is obtained at present, and that but in small quantities. The fine range of mountains on the south of the town abounds with limestone, of which great quantities are procured, and shipped off weekly for Liverpool: in these works, which are conducted upon a large scale, two hundred men are constantly employed in quarrying, and fifty horses in conveying the produce to the coast. The market, which is on Saturday, is well supplied with corn and provisions; and fairs, which were formerly noted for the sale of cattle, are held annually on the 12th of February, 2nd of April, the day before Holy Thursday, June 18th, August 20th, October 9th, and December 6th.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 9. 9½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the rectory is an impropriation held in commendam by the archdeacon, since the time of Henry VIII. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a low edifice of great length, and of unpretending character, with a lofty square tower at the west end. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Some charitable donations and bequests have been made for the gratuitous instruction of children, and for distribution among the poor. About halfway between the pass of Cevn Ogo and the town is Gwrych castle, now being built by Lloyd H. Bamford Hesketh, Esq., and occupying the summit of a rocky eminence: the front of this extensive structure already exceeds four hundred and eighty yards, on each side of which a noble terrace, four hundred and twenty yards in length, has been raised, which extends to the east and west entrances, the latter of which is through a high arch, flanked by two lofty embattled towers: the building comprises eighteen lofty embattled towers, of which the principal, called Hesketh Tower, is ninety-three feet high: the whole, when completed, will be one of the largest structures of the kind in Great Britain. On the summit of one of the limestone hills, about a mile north of the church, there is a very large and perfect camp, called Castell Mawr; and near it, on a hill called Coppa yr Wylva, or "the mount of the watch-tower," there are some remains of an ancient British fortress of great strength, of which the north front is defended by an almost perpendicular precipice, one hundred and ninety-six feet in height, and on the east and south are walls of stone and a deep fosse; on the west is a large opening between two mounds of earth and stone, beyond which is another deeper and broader fosse, called Fôs y Rhueiniaid, or "the Roman Fosse." About two miles to the west of the town is Cevn Ogo, a lofty and precipitous rock of limestone, in which, among others of minor extent, there is one of the most spacious and magnificent natural caverns in Europe: it has a bold front towards the sea, considerably elevated, and the entrance, which is many feet above the road, is under a lofty arch of comparatively fine proportions, forty-eight feet in height, within a very short distance of which, proceeding inward, rises a tall columnar rock, presenting the appearance of a rudely sculptured massive pillar, which divides the cavern into two apartments: the recess to the left soon terminates, but that to the right spreads into a spacious chamber, thirty feet in height, and extending to an unexplored depth into the interior of the mountain. The sides and roof of this surprising cavern are studded with beautiful pendant stalactites, many feet in length, ranged on each side with an appearance of perfect order, resembling the pipes of an organ, and reflecting the most brilliant diamond-like hues; and the floor is strewn with immense masses of stalagmite, uniformly of a deep orange colour, and of the most grotesque and fanciful forms. Brÿnfanigl, in this parish, was the residence of Marchudd ab Cynan, one of the fifteen ennobled tribes of North Wales, who was cotemporary with Roderick the Great, and subsequently that of his descendant, the brave Ednyved Vychan. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1136. 11.

ABERGUILLY (ABER-GWILI), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Carmarthen, on the road from that town to Llan dilo Vawr, containing 2675 inhabitants. This place, which is principally distinguished for an ancient collegiate church, and for its palace, which is the residence of the diocesan, derives its name from its situation on the river Guilly, near its junction with the Towy. About the year 1020, a desperate battle was fought near the village, between Llewelyn ab Seisyllt, Prince of Wales, and Rhûn, a Scottish adventurer, who, pretending to be the son of Meredydd ab Owen, obtained the assistance of several powerful chieftains of South Wales, the disaffected subjects of Llewelyn, and assembled an army sufficiently strong to hazard an engagement. Llewelyn, returning from North Wales, at the head of his own forces, hastened to attack the adventurer, and, after a long and obstinate conflict, obtained a complete victory over the rebels, and slew their leader in the pursuit.

The village is pleasantly situated, and the meadows in the neighbourhood are watered by the rivers Towy and Guilly, over which last is a neat substantial stone bridge of three arches. The parish abounds with roofing slate of excellent quality, of which there are two quarries at present open, affording employment to about fifty persons, and furnishing an abundant supply of that material for the use of the surrounding neighbourhood. Petty sessions for the division are held here once a month. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor, but, from his residence in the parish, the Bishop of St. David's is by courtesy allowed to present. The church, dedicated to St. Maurice, and situated near the bank of the Towy, was made collegiate by Dr. Beck, Bishop of St. David's, in 1287, for twenty-two prebendaries, four priests, four choristers, and two clerks. In 1334, some alterations were made by Bishop Gower, who added a precentor, chancellor, and treasurer; and the establishment, the revenue of which was £42 per annum, was finally removed by Henry VIII. to his newly-erected college at Brecknock. The church is a neat plain building, consisting of two aisles, without either tower or steeple, having a small belfry placed over the west end for the reception of two bells: it is divided internally by a range of pointed arches and massive octagonal columns. In the churchyard, which is finely planted with evergreens, and is preserved in excellent order, is a monumental stone to the memory of Dr. Adam Ottley, bishop of the diocese, who died on the 4th of October, 1723. At Llanvihangel-uwch-Guilly is a chapel, formerly a chapel of ease, but recently endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and erected into a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Aberguilly. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Methodists. An endowment of £6 per annum has been made by some unknown benefactor, for the instruction of twelve poor children of the parish.

The episcopal palace is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Towy, the meanderings of which through the grounds impart to it considerable beauty and interest, but, from the lowness of its site, it commands no extensive prospects: the scenery immediately surrounding it is cheerful and pleasingly varied, and the mansion, which had been suffered to fall into decay, has been almost entirely rebuilt, in the Elizabethan style, at the expense of the present bishop, and is now one of the most complete episcopal palaces in the kingdom. Cwm Guilly, the seat of Grismond Philipps, Esq., whose father represented the borough of Carmarthen in several parliaments; and Gallt y Gôg, the property of George Morgan, Esq., are pleasantly situated in the neighbourhood; in which also are the ruins of Castel Piggin, formerly the residence of the late Capt. Bloom. Within a short distance of the village, and about four miles from Carmarthen, at a place called White Mill, is Merlin's Grove, a thick wood rising abruptly from the turnpike-road, celebrated as the place of residence of that renowned sage, and also as the place of his interment; the name is now usually applied to a neat family residence situated near it. In a sequestered spot on this farm, near the extremity of the wood, the prophet is said to have been interred, and to have resided in a cavern situated nearly in the centre of the wood, the supposed scene of his incantations, to which allusion is made by Spencer, in his "Faery Queene." In this parish is the lordship of Vynne, belonging to the Bishop of St. David's, and possessing some peculiar privileges, among which are those of holding a court leet, choosing a portreeve and appointing constables, and collecting tolls for the repair of its roads, which are kept in order independently of the parish rate; but it does not maintain its own poor, as an independent township, nor does it differ in any other respect, from the rest of the parish. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor amounts to £1231. 16.

ABERHAVESP (ABER-HAVESP), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Newtown, on the road to Machynlleth, comprising the upper and lower divisions, and containing 535 inhabitants. This place takes its name from its situation near the confluence of the river Havesp with the Severn, and is distinguished chiefly by its proximity to the Roman road from Caer-Sws to Mediolanum, which passed through the parish, and of which vestiges may still be traced on a farm called Llwyd Coed. From the rectory-house there is a fine view of the surrounding country, the scenery of which is agreeably and richly diversified, extending over the beautiful Vale of the Severn, and embracing the numerous windings of that noble river, the prospect being bounded in the distance by the Plinlimmon and other mountains. The weaving of flannel is carried on to a moderate extent, affording employment to such of the inhabitants as are not occupied in agriculture. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Gwyn-nog, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, appropriately accommodated to the use of the inhabitants, and pleasantly situated near the river. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents: a parochial and a Sunday school are supported by subscription. In the south-eastern part of the parish there is a medicinal spring, called the Black Well, which is considered highly efficacious in scrofulous diseases, and is much resorted to by the inhabitants of the parish and neighbourhood. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £427. 13.

ABERLLYVNI, or ABERLLYNVY (ABER-LLYFNI, or LLYNFI), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Hay, containing 125 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated at the junction of the river Llyvni with the Wye, on the southern bank of the latter, amid the most luxuriant and richly diversified scenery. It has long since ceased to exercise the ecclesiastical rights of a parish, though they have not been transferred to any adjoining parish. The inhabitants marry and bury their dead at Glâsbury, from which circumstance Aberllyvni is commonly considered a chapelry or hamlet to that parish; but they do not contribute to the church rate of Glâsbury, which is the usual mark of dependence. From the will of William Vaughan, of Maeslwch, dated 1582, the advowson appears to have been the property of that gentleman, who bequeathed it to his daughter, Catherine Vaughan, together with that of Llŷswen: it is also noticed in Pope Nicholas' Valuation, separate from Glâsbury, at £4. 6. 8. The benefice appears to have ceased to exist about the middle of the last century, when the church fell into ruins, and the patronage has not since been exercised: no tithes have been paid here within the memory of man. Prior to that period the church, it is presumed, was regularly served; and there are persons still living who recollect the existence of tombstones: an aged yew tree indicates the site of the building, but the whole is now covered by a small plantation of fir trees. At an adjoining farm-house there is an octagonal stone font, ornamented in its different compartments with mullets and crosses, and bearing the date 1635. Aberllyvni, with the hamlet of Velindre, receives £6. 8. 3. per annum, arising from a bequest by Sir David Williams, Knt., for the benefit of the poor: it is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £90. 12.

ABERNANT (ABER-NANT), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Carmarthen, containing 664 inhabitants. The village, which is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Cowin, about two miles westward from the road leading from Carmarthen to Newcastle and Cardigan, was formerly much frequented at the time of the Carmarthen races, which for many years took place within this parish, on a course held by lease under Lewis Evans, Esq., of Pant y Kendy, but are now held on the other side of the river Towy. Petty sessions for the division are held here every month; and a court leet for the hundred is held alternately here and at Bwlch Newydd, in the parish of Newcastle. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Convil in Elvet annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the joint patronage of Edward Lawrence St. Loe, Esq., and Mr. Parr: the glebe land attached to the living is one of the most extensive in the principality. The church, dedicated to St. Lucia, is a small neat building, pleasingly situated in a quiet and retired spot. There is a place of worship for Independents. Pant y Kendy, a substantial brick mansion, not yet finished, was commenced by the father of the present proprietor, L. Evans, Esq., and, from the local advantages which it possesses, and the improvements now in progress in the completion of the building and the disposition of the grounds, promises to be one of the most agreeable residences in the vicinity of Carmarthen. About ten years ago, sixty silver coins, of the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., were found by some children at the vicarage-house; and in repairing the road near Pant y Kendy, not long since, a Roman urn was discovered, at the depth of a few feet below the surface of the ground, containing ashes, with which also the place where it was found was discoloured to a considerable extent: the urn, immediately on its being removed, fell in pieces. Though no account of any Roman settlement at this place is on record, nor can any vestige of an encampment be traced, yet, from its vicinity to Newchurch, about a mile and a half distant, where a battle between the Romans and the Britons is said to have taken place (in commemoration of which a stone, erected to the memory of Severinus, the Roman general, still exists), it is not improbable that the spot may have been the place of interment of some who fell in the battle, and more especially, as it is not far from the Roman road leading from Maridunum (Carmarthen) to the town of Fishguard. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £185. 2.

ABERPERGWYM (ABER-PERGWM), county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES. — See NEATH (MIDDLE).

ABERPORTH (ABER-PORTH), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E.) from Cardigan, containing 485 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, St. George's channel, and in a small cove near the mouth of the river Howny, forming a commodious, though small port, which is a creek to the port of Cardigan. Several small craft belong to it, which are chiefly employed in carrying limestone from Carmarthenshire and Pembrokeshire, and coal from Glamorganshire and Liverpool. It also participates to a limited extent in the fishery in the bay of Cardigan, in which a few boats and men are employed. In the vicinity is Cribach Road, which affords good shelter for vessels, and has been much frequented by the French, during former wars with that people. The parish consists of two hamlets, the rectorial hamlet and that of Llanannerch, of which latter the tithes are inappropriate in the family of Currie, who pay annually to the rector one mark at Easter; and it includes the manors of Mortimer is Syrwen and Mortimer is Coed, both the property of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Coedmore. In the hamlet of Llanannerch, according to tradition, there was anciently a chapel; but there are not the slightest vestiges of it at present. The parish contains one thousand three hundred and seventy-five acres of land, of which about one hundred are uncultivated, being a cold swampy soil: the remainder consists partly of loam and clay, and partly of gravel and peat, which, when manured with lime, sea-sand, and dung, yields barley inferior to none on the coast. It is also tolerably productive of oats, but the wheat crops are very indifferent. The ground for the most part is hilly, with a few vales intersected by rapid streams, the principal of which is called Howny. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. There is neither parsonage-house nor glebe attached to the living. The church, dedicated to St. Cynwyl, is a small plain structure of great antiquity, situated on an eminence about one mile from the village, and commanding a beautiful view of the sea: it consists of a nave and chancel, communicating by means of a pointed arch, and measures in length forty-five feet, in breadth twenty-two, and in height thirty, exclusively of the steeple, which is fifteen feet higher: the font is a square bason, placed on a round pillar; and the sacramental cup is highly ornamented, but has neither date nor inscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £95. 10.

ABERTHAW (EAST), (ABER-DDAW), a small sea-port and hamlet in the parish of PENMARK, hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.S.E.) from Cowbridge. The population is returned with the parish. This place is situated on the east bank and near the mouth of the river Ddaw, from which it derives its name, and had formerly a chapel, which has fallen to ruins. The harbour is small, and is only resorted to by a few coasting vessels of inferior burden, for the purpose of conveying the produce of the district to other places, especially lias limestone, called Aberthaw tarras, which is much used in making cement for works under water, canal locks, &c.

ABERTHAW (WEST), (ABER-DDAW), a small port and hamlet, in the parish of ST. ATHAN, hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S.S.E.) from Cowbridge. The population is returned with the parish. This place is situated on the western bank of the river Ddaw, opposite the small port of East Aberthaw: near it is Seabreak Point, a promontory which protects the mouth of that river. Lime of excellent quality is procured in the vicinity.

ABER-WHIELOR (ABER-CHWILER), a township in that part of the parish of BÔDVARI which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E.) from Denbigh, containing 486 inhabitants. It is situated at the junction of the Chwiler with the river Clwyd, the former flowing here through a narrow, luxuriant, and well-wooded vale, between two high mountains. The neighbourhood of Maes Mynan, where the last prince of Wales, Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, had a house, the foundations of which were discernible in a meadow some years since, abounds with highly diversified scenery. The tithes belong to the Bishop of Bangor. This township is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure being £383. 12.

ABERYSCIR, or ABERESCIR (ABER-ESGAIR), a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.N.W.) from Brecknock, containing 110 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated on the river Yscir, near its confluence with the Usk, and from that circumstance derives its name. The former of these rivers is crossed by two bridges in the vicinity, namely, Pont ar Yscir, to the west of the parish of Battle, and Pont ar Vran, on the road to Trallong; and the latter by Aberbran bridge, which is now undergoing repair, and by a handsome stone bridge from the grounds of Penpont, another of the same material in the grounds of Abercamlais, and a small suspension bridge near the latter residence. The mesne lordship of Aberyscir, formerly held under the lords of Cantref-Selyf, and separated only by the Yscir from the ruined town of Caer-Bannau, once the capital of the county, was given by Bernard Newmarch to Sir Hugh Surdwal, or Sir Hugh of the Solitary Vale, whose residence is stated by tradition to have occupied the site of a more modern house, near the junction of the rivers, now occupied by a farmer. The soil, which is chiefly arable, consists of light loam mixed with gravel, well adapted for the production of turnips, barley, and clover: the ground on the south is of easy ascent, and on the west and east it is rather steep, terminating in a hill. The living, which was formerly a discharged vicarage, is now a rectory, having been endowed with the great tithes, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated as a vicarage in the king's books at £3. 6. 3., and in the patronage and incumbency of the Rev. David Jones. The church, which formerly belonged to the priory of Malvern, is dedicated, according to some authorities, to St. Mary, and according to others to St. Cynidr: it is beautifully situated on the western bank of the river Yscir, in the angle between that river and the Usk, but is only a mean-looking building, possessing no claim to architectural notice. There is neither parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to the living, though close to the church is a small farm of about thirty-five acres, with a house, barn, and out-buildings, now in a dilapidated state, called "The Parsonage;" but whether or not it ever did belong to the church, at any period, has not been ascertained; if so, it may probably have been alienated during the protectorate of Cromwell. This parish participates in a donation of land by the Rev. Mr. Powell, vicar of Boughrood, in 1686, for apprenticing poor children. Nearly opposite the church, on the eastern bank of the Yscir, is the Roman station called the Gaer, or Caer Bannau, whence the Sarn Helen, in its course to Neath, the Nidum of the Romans, joined the Via Julia Maritima at some distance from this place: it crossed the Yscir a little above the church, and proceeded through this parish nearly in the direction of the present turnpike road to Aberbran. Near the margin of the Usk is an artificial mount surrounded by a moat, which was probably the site of the keep belonging to the ancient mansion of the Surdwals. Of this family was Hywel Surdwal, one of the heraldic bards of Wales, who flourished towards the close of the fifteenth century: he was employed by Edward IV. to certify the pedigree of the first Earl of Pembroke of the Herbert family. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £82. 4.

ABERYSTWITH (ABERYSTWYTH), a sea-port, borough, market town, and chapelry, in the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR, locally in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 38 miles (N.E.) from Cardigan, and 208 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 4128 inhabitants. This place, from its having been fortified at a very early period, and also forming part of the ancient parish of Llanbadarn Vawr, was originally called Llan-Badarn Gaerog; whilst the small ancient village of Aberystwith was situated to the west of it, on ground now covered by the sea, and on the bank of the Ystwyth, into which river the Rheidol probably emptied itself, at some distance from the ocean. These rivers now unite at the town, and form at their mouth the modern harbour of Aberystwith: the courses of both have been changed, the Ystwyth having flowed by the base of Pendinas hill, directly into the sea, prior to the diversion of its channel, which was done in order to strengthen the current of the Rheidol in clearing away the bar at the entrance to the harbour. On the death of Richard de Clare, the Norman lord of the province of Ceredigion, or Cardigan, who was slain in a wood called Coed Grono, in the county of Monmouth, by a party of Welsh lying in ambuscade, his son, Gilbert de Strongbow, erected a castle here, in 1109, in defence of the possessions which, by permission of Henry I., he had recently wrested from Cadwgan ab Bleddyn. In 1114, Grufydd ab Rhys, a Welsh prince, who had for some time carried on with considerable success, in the county of Carmarthen, a desultory warfare with the Norman invaders of South Wales, being invited by the inhabitants of the province of Cardigan to assist them in throwing off the Norman yoke, attacked the castle of Ystradpeithill, near Aberystwith, according to Caradoc of Llancarvan's History of the Princes of Wales, which he reduced, and then encamped at Glâscrûg, about a mile to the east of the church of Llanbadarn-Vawr, intending to attack the castle of Aberystwith on the following morning. The governor, apprised of his design, had sent to the neighbouring castle of Ystrad-Meirig for a reinforcement, which arrived during the night; and in the morning Grufydd, ignorant of the circumstance, and confident of success, advanced to a place called Ystrad Antaron, opposite Aberystwith castle, where he encamped, and held a council of war. But preserving no discipline among his troops, the Normans took advantage of their disorder, and sent out some archers, to tempt them into a skirmish, and to draw them by a feigned retreat towards the bridge over the Rheidol; at the same time placing a party of their best cavalry in ambuscade behind the castle hill. The Welsh eagerly pursued these archers to the bridge, over which they were allured by a fresh device of the enemy, and continued their pursuit almost to the gates of the castle, when the horse which had been posted behind the hill attacked them in the flank, while those whom they had pursued made a stand, and assaulted them in front, by which means all the Welsh that had crossed the bridge were cut to pieces, and Grufydd was compelled to retreat with the remainder of his forces, and to abandon his enterprise. In 1135, Owain Gwynedd and Cadwalader, sons of Gruffydd ab Cynan, with a large body of Welsh, made a more successful attempt on the castle, which they took and utterly demolished, putting to the sword all the Normans and Saxons who had settled in this part of the principality, with the exception only of a small number, who escaped by sea into England. Cadwalader, however, soon afterwards marrying Alice, daughter of Richard, Earl of Clare and Lord of Cardigan, rebuilt the castle, and made it his chief place of residence; but Owain Gwynedd, after his accession to the sovereignty of North Wales, in revenge for his brother's contumacy, besieged it and burned it to the ground, in 1142. This place continued for many years to experience all the disasters arising from predatory and intestine warfare, and was frequently destroyed and rebuilt in the continued struggles for dominion which occurred, not only between the English and the Welsh, but also among the rival princes of the country. During this period, mention occurs of the castle of Aber Rheidol having been destroyed, in 1164, by Rhys ab Gruffydd, on his invasion of the territories of the Earl of Gloucester; which circumstance has led to a supposition that there was another castle on the sea-shore, near this place, but it is not at all improbable that the castle of Aberystwith was occasionally designated by that name.

After rising from some of its frequent demolitions it was again destroyed, in 1207, by Maelgwyn, an usurping chieftain of South Wales, who had previously restored and fortified it, in order to maintain his power in this part of the principality, but who felt himself unable to hold it against Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, who was advancing to attack him. Llewelyn, on his arrival at Aberystwith, rebuilt and garrisoned the castle, and seized the whole of the extensive territory lying between the rivers Aeron and Dyvi, which he afterwards surrendered to Rhys and Owain, the sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, and nephews of Maelgwyn. King John, wishing to add the province of Cardigan to his other conquests in Wales, sent Foulke, Viscount Cardiff, warden of the marches, to compel the sons of Gruffydd to acknowledge him as their sovereign, in which he was joined by Maelgwyn and his brother Rhys Vychan. The two nephews, unable to withstand such a powerful force, made the required submission, and agreed to relinquish all right to the territories which had been ceded to them by Llewelyn; and Foulke, having repaired and strengthened the fortifications of the castle, placed in it a strong garrison, to defend it for the king. Maelgwyn and Rhys Vychan, disappointed in their hope of obtaining for themselves the territories of which Rhys and Owain had been dispossessed, laid siege to the castle of Aberystwith, which they succeeded in taking, after an obstinate defence, and razed it to the ground. It appears, notwithstanding, to have been almost immediately rebuilt; for in 1214, Rhys Vychan, being defeated by Foulke, in Carmarthenshire, took refuge in it with Maelgwyn, and brought with him also his wife and children. In the reign of Henry III., the castle was in the possession of Rhys ab Gruffydd, who, about the year 1223, joined the party of the Earl of Pembroke, in consequence of which, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, seized it, with all its dependencies; but Rhys complaining to the king, and requesting his protection from this violence, Henry commanded Llewelyn to appear before him at Shrewsbury, and the prince obeying the summons, the quarrel was amicably adjusted. In the reign of Edward I., Gruffydd ab Meredydd and Rhys ab Maelgwyn besieged and took the castle of Aberystwith, then held by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, and which soon after fell into the hands of the English; and Edward, in order to secure the fulfilment of the conditions of the peace which he had concluded with Llewelyn, rebuilt it in 1277, and, placing in it a strong garrison, returned to England. The oppressive conduct of Edward's lieutenants, in this part of the country, soon led to an infraction of the peace lately concluded, and among the principal exploits of the insurgent Welsh was the capture of this castle by Rhys ab Maelgwyn and Gruffydd ab Meredydd; but it was soon afterwards delivered up to the English forces, and from this period nothing of importance peculiarly relating to it appears to have occurred till the reign of Henry IV., when it was assaulted and taken, in 1404, by Owain Glyndwr, in whose possession it remained for three years, till it was surrendered on terms to Prince Henry. Owain soon after regained possession of it by stratagem; but it was finally reduced in the year 1408, by the English, who appear to have retained it without further molestation; and, in the 35th of Henry VIII., William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, was by that monarch appointed captain of the castle and town of Aberystwith. In 1631, Mr. Bushel, who succeeded Sir Hugh Myddelton in the possession of the mines royal of Cardiganshire, having obtained permission from Charles I., established a mint in the castle, for the convenience of paying the men employed in the mines; and several of the silver coins then struck in it, bearing the crest of the Prince of Wales, have been discovered, which were probably concealed during the troubles of that reign. At the commencement of these commotions the castle was strengthened with additional fortifications, and strongly garrisoned for the king: the royalists kept possession of it till the year 1647, when it was besieged and taken by the parliamentarians, and soon afterwards dismantled.

The town, which owes its origin to the erection of the castle, is described by Leland as having been encompassed by walls, the last remains of which were removed some years since, and as being, in his time, a better market than Cardigan; and Camden, who ascribes the building of its walls to Gilbert de Clare, commonly called Strongbow, states that it then was the most populous town in the county. Since that period it has materially increased, both in extent and importance, and may be still regarded as the most flourishing place in this part of South Wales. It is pleasantly situated at the lower extremity of the valley of the Rheidol, amid lofty hills, and on a bold eminence overlooking the bay of Cardigan, by which it is bounded on one side, while on the other it is environed by the Rheidol, over which is a stone bridge of five arches, forming an entrance to it from the south: it consists principally of two long streets, from which others, branching off nearly at right angles, lead down to the sea-shore. The houses are in general well built, and of respectable appearance, several of them being large and handsome, especially such as are of modern erection, which are principally of stone: the streets are disposed with considerable regularity, and are paved with stones supplied in abundance from the shore, but are not lighted; and the turnpike roads leading to the town rank among the best in the principality: the inhabitants are supplied with water from the rivers Ystwyth and Rheidol, which is brought into the town in barrels, on sledges drawn by one horse, and sold at a low rate. The advantages of its situation on a fine open bay, the purity of its air, and the efficacy of some mineral springs adjacent, have contributed to render it a place of resort for invalids. About the commencement of the last century, it began to rise into notice as a fashionable bathing-place, and, from a series of progressive improvements, is now one of the most frequented places of fashionable resort on this part of the coast. The beach, though composed of pebbles, affords a pleasant and interesting walk; and the shore, consisting of lofty and precipitous rocks of dark-coloured slate, is worn by the action of the waves into caverns of picturesque and romantic appearance. Hot sea-water baths are provided, with every requisite accommodation; several bathing machines are in attendance; and, from the convenient sloping of the beach, a facility of bathing is afforded, at almost any state of the tide, within a very short distance of the shore. For the accommodation of the increasing number of visitors, who annually resort to this place, many additional lodging-houses have been built, of which the Marine Terrace, a handsome range of modern buildings, affording every accommodation for private families, is situated on the margin of the bay, commanding a fine marine view, enlivened by the frequent arrival and departure of vessels trading to these coasts: in this range is the Belle Vue, a spacious and commodious hotel; and in front, where the beach is level, is a fine promenade. On the south-west of the Marine Terrace is a gateway leading to a spacious castellated mansion, of unique appearance, called the Castle House, commanding an extensive view across the bay: it was originally built as a private mansion by the late Sir Uvedale Price, Bart., of Foxley Hall, in the county of Hereford, and consists of three octagonal towers, connected by ranges of apartments, and having a light and elegant balcony on the side towards the sea. Beyond this, on one side, is the Castle hill, crowned with the venerable ruins of that ancient fortress, and forming another favourite promenade, affording, from different points, various extensive, romantic, and interesting views of the sea, the neighbouring hills, and the surrounding country. On the other side of the Castle hill, separated only by the churchyard, are the new public rooms, handsomely built in the Grecian style of architecture, on ground given by W. E. Powell, Esq., of Nant Eôs, lord-lieutenant of the county, from a design by Mr. Repton, and at an expense of £2000, raised by subscription on shares of £10 each, and opened to the public in 1820. The suite consists of a very handsome assembly and promenade room, forty-five feet long, and twenty-five feet broad; a card-room, twenty-five feet long, and eighteen feet wide, opening into the assembly-room by folding doors; and a billiard-room, of the same dimensions as the card-room. The assembly-room and card-room are similarly ornamented, and handsomely fitted up in a corresponding style, and under the same roof is a dwelling-house, with a bar, for providing the visitors with refreshments. The assembly-room is opened generally in July, and closed in October: the meetings are under the superintendence of a master of the ceremonies; and when the room is not wanted for balls, it is used as a reading-room. There is a good library in the new market-place; and towards the east end of the town the erection of a theatre was begun some years ago, which, from want of funds to complete it, was converted into a place of worship, but is not now used as such. Races are annually held, generally in August, and continue for two days, which at present are not permanently fixed: a field, near Gogerdan, the seat of Pryse Pryse, Esq., about three miles distant from the town, is, by the courtesy of that gentleman, used as a race-course.

The harbour is small, and the approach to it is obstructed in some degree by a bar, which prevents the entrance of ships of any considerable burden, except at high water of spring tides. An attempt was made some time since to remedy this inconvenience, by constructing a pier on one of the ridges of rock which stretch from the shore into the bay; but it was designed upon too small a scale to be efficient, and though several other plans have been subsequently proposed for the improvement of the harbour, not one of them has been yet carried into effect. The trade is considerable, and, if not obstructed by the insufficiency of the port, would doubtless be much more extensive: it consists principally in the importation of timber, hemp, tar, tallow, wine, spirits, and grocery; and in the exportation of bark and the agricultural produce of the neighbouring country. The number of ships belonging to the port is one hundred and twenty-two, averaging a burden of fifty-three tons each; and during the summer months nearly one hundred vessels are employed in the coasting trade. The herring fishery was formerly carried on to a great extent, and herrings and cod are still taken occasionally. The custom-house, built at the expense of government, in 1828, is a small, but neat and commodious, edifice, commanding a good view of the harbour. Lead mines were formerly worked upon an extensive scale in the vicinity; but they have been abandoned for many years. There are two weekly markets, held on Monday and Saturday; the former is for corn, butter, cheese, fruit, fish, and poultry, and is held in the area under the town-hall; and the latter for butcher's meat, for which a new market-place, one hundred and four feet long, and thirty-one feet wide, was erected in 1822, in the street leading to the castle hill, by a tontine subscription. Fairs are held on the Monday before January 5th, Monday next before Easter, Whit-Monday, May 14th, June 24th, September 16th, and the Monday before November 11th: the first Mondays after the 12th of November and the 12th of May are called, by the natives of the surrounding country, Dyddllun Cyvlogi, or "Hiring Mondays;" and on these days a great number of the farmers and others meet here, for the purpose of hiring servants.

Aberystwith is a borough by prescription, under the title of "the Town, Burgh, and Liberty," and the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, chamberlain, and an indefinite number of common burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk and subordinate officers: the mayor is annually elected by a jury at the court leet, and is a justice of the peace within the borough, the limits of which are co-extensive with the chapelry. It is one of the contributory boroughs in this county which unite in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly vested in the burgesses generally, but is now in the resident burgesses, and in all persons occupying, either as landlord or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the clear annual value of at least ten pounds, if duly registered according to the provisions of the late act: the present number of houses within the borough worth ten pounds a year and upwards is three hundred and twenty-four: the mayor of Cardigan is the returning officer. The freedom is obtained only by presentation at the courts leet, which are held by the corporation at Easter and Michaelmas. The county magistrates have concurrent jurisdiction, and hold their meetings in the town-hall, a building in an ancient style of architecture, situated in the principal street, and erected in 1770, in which the Midsummer, and sometimes the Spring or Autumn quarter, sessions for the county are held. The prison, which is also one of the houses of correction for the county, is a small building, adapted to the reception of eight prisoners, in three separate classes.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llanbadarn-Vawr. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, was built by subscription, in the year 1787: it is a neat plain structure, situated within the precincts of the castle, and separated from the walks around the ruins of that edifice by a stone wall, erected at the expense of the inhabitants: it measures sixty feet in length, and twenty-six in breadth, and is capable of accommodating from seven to eight hundred persons. A gallery was erected at its western end in the year 1790, at an expense of £104. 14., which was defrayed by Mrs. Margaret Pryse. The service is performed in the morning and evening in the English language, and in the afternoon in the Welsh. The augmented population of this place, and the increased number of visitors, during the season, having rendered the erection of another place of worship necessary, a church, or chapel, has been recently built upon a larger scale by subscription, aided by a grant of £1000 from the parliamentary commissioners for building new churches, and £400 from the society for the enlargement of churches and chapels: these funds, amounting to £3500, were sufficient for completing the body of the building, which is in the later style of English architecture, and it is proposed to add a tower of corresponding character at some future time. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for boys and girls was established in 1819, and is supported by subscription, by which means also a suitable building was erected for its use. There are now no remains either of the town walls or their gates: of the latter, one, called the Great Dark Gate, was situated in the street leading to Llanbadarn-Vawr; another, called the Little Dark Gate, in the street which now leads to the Baptist meeting-house; and a third, opposite to the bridge. The remains of the castle, which occupy the summit of a rock projecting into the bay of Cardigan, consist chiefly of portions of the towers, the principal gateway, and some fragments of walls, forming a picturesque heap of ruins: the area, which was originally of very considerable extent, though at present greatly diminished by the action of the waves, which have undermined the rock, was in the form of an irregular pentagon, and has been laid out in walks and pleasure grounds, with great taste, by the late Mr. Probart of Shrewsbury, to whom the site was granted on lease by the late Col. Johnes, of Havôd. On Pendinas hill, adjoining the town, an ancient British celt has been found; and on the same hill, in 1802, a golden angel of the reign of Henry VII. was turned up by the spade. There are several traces of encampments in the immediate neighbourhood of the town; and adjoining Craig Glais is a small rock, called Bryn Dioddau, or "the suffering mount," from its having been formerly a place of execution. A chalybeate spring, which is in great estimation for the medicinal property of its waters, was discovered about the year 1779, at a short distance from the eastern extremity of the town, on the road to Llanbadarn-Vawr, and near Plâs Crûg: the well is covered with a small square building, from one side of which the water issues by a spout. There are various other springs in the neighbourhood having a ferruginous impregnation, and traces of sulphur have been lately discovered at Penglais. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £691. 14.

ABOVE-SAWDDY, a hamlet in the parish of LLANGADOCK, lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, containing, with the market town of Langadock, which is situated within its limits, 803 inhabitants. This hamlet, which is situated between the rivers Sawddy and Sevin, near the western declivity of the Black Mountains, contains some thriving plantations, and a few respectable residences. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £353. 6.

ACTON, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N.) from Wrexham, containing 215 inhabitants. Acton Park was formerly the property and residence of the family of Jeffreys, from which sprang the notorious judge of that name, in the reign of James II. It is at present the seat of Sir Foster Cunliffe, Bart., by purchase, in 1785, from the trustees of Ellis Yonge, Esq., by whom the mansion has been modernised and enlarged, and the grounds tastefully embellished: the site is a little elevated, and embraces a pleasing view of the town of Wrexham and the adjacent country. That ancient boundary line, Wat's Dyke, passed through this township, which supports its own poor according to an arrangement entered into in March, 1830.

ALLINGTON (TRÊV-ALUN), a township in the parish of GRESFORD, partly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and partly in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Wrexham, containing 812 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel of ease to the parish church, but there are no vestiges of it, except the cemetery which marks the site. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. In this township stands the ancient and venerable family mansion of the Trevors, of whom Sir Richard, whose monument is in the parish church, greatly distinguished himself in the wars in Ireland, towards the close of the sixteenth century, in which he held the governorship of Newry, and of the counties of Armagh and Down: in the hall is his portrait, representing him with his prayer-book in his hand, in a meditative attitude, having his helmet and armour behind him, with mottoes alluding to the former and latter periods of his life, and uttering an ejaculation of gratitude to God for his goodness to his children's children.

ALLTMAWR (ALLT-VAWR), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.E. by S.) from Builth, containing 43 inhabitants. This parish, which is very small, and the name of which signifies the great woody mount, is bounded on the north by the river Wye, and is crossed by the turnpike road from Builth to Hay: the scenery on the banks of the river, and in its immediate vicinity, is exceedingly picturesque and romantic, and the view from Alltmawr House, a pretty villa, the residence of George Holford, Esq., is one of the most delightful in this part of the principality. Its surface is, for the most part, undulating: in the low lands the soil is generally clayey, on which, or the shallow bed of loam by which it is overspread, the oak appears to thrive. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanavan-Vawr, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Mauritius, consists of a nave and chancel, both lately ceiled, and is remarkable for its diminutive size, being less than thirty-five feet in length: it stands just above the road side, and differs in its appearance from a neat cottage in no other respect than in having a small belfry near the west end of the roof. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £14. 5.

AMBLESTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 574 inhabitants. This place has, within the last thirty years, been identified as the site of the long sought for Roman station Ad Vigesium, noticed in the Itineraries, as the first from Maridunum, or Carmarthen, from which the distance corresponds exactly with that mentioned in the Itinerary. This discovery, which, from a variety of concurrent testimony, appears to be founded in truth, was made in the year 1805, by Mr. Fenton, author of the "Historical Tour through Pembrokeshire," accompanied by Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart., while collecting materials for that work. The form of the station, which is situated about a mile to the north-east of the church, is nearly a perfect square, having the angles rounded off, and comprehends an area two hundred and sixty feet in dimensions: the agger by which it was enclosed, though nearly effaced by tillage, may still be accurately traced; and the Via Julia, leading from Maridunum to Menapia, passes through the centre of the area. The camp is called by the inhabitants Castel Flemish, from having been subsequently occupied by the Flemings, who first settled in this part of the principality, in order to assist in subjugating the natives; and another Roman road, more to the north, and afterwards uniting with the Via Julia near St. David's, is from the same source designated Via Flandrica, or "the Flemish way." Within the area of the station have been found Roman bricks and cement, part of a stuccoed floor, a large flagstone bearing an inscription, now lost, and other Roman relics. At a short distance to the west, near the village of Ford, are the remains of a smaller camp, evidently of Roman construction, and probably the Campus Æstivus of the station; and in the same neighbourhood were discovered, in 1806, the remains of a Roman hypocaust, six feet in depth, and eight feet long, lined on each side with stone and cement, from which two flues of one foot four inches in the aperture, and widening towards the upper extremity, rose in an angular direction to the surface; they were formed of fluted Roman bricks. The lands in this parish are, with a very trifling exception, all enclosed, and the soil is in general fertile. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 19. 4½., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a chapel of ease in this parish, called Rinaston chapel. The Calvinistic Methodists have a place of worship here. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor is £163. 9.

AMLWCH, a borough, sea-port, and parish, in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (N. W.) from Beaumaris, and 266 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 6285 inhabitants. This place, formerly an inconsiderable hamlet inhabited only by fishermen, has, from the variety and abundance of the mineral treasures contained in the mountainous districts of the parish, become a populous and flourishing town. It derived its name from its situation on a sandy beach, and its importance from the discovery of the copper mines in its vicinity, aided by a small cove between the rocks on the coast, which afforded a facility of shipping their produce, and has been subsequently improved into a safe and commodious harbour. The high table land of Tryslwyn, otherwise called Parys mountain, rises at a short distance from the town into enormous rugged masses of coarse aluminous shale and whitish quartz, naturally assuming a very rude and striking appearance; while the rugged grandeur of its exterior is further heightened by the mining operations to which it has been subjected. This mountain is stated to have derived its latter name from Robert Paris, the younger, who is named as one of the commissioners on an inquisition, in the reign of Henry IV., to fine the Anglesey insurgents in the cause of Owain Glyndwr. From the discovery of certain works formed by the ancient process of mining, previously to the invention of gunpowder, it is evident that copper-ore has been worked here at a very early period; and as the ancient Britons were known to import all their brass utensils, it is equally probable that that period was during the occupation of their country by the Romans. Traces of the ancient mode of operation, by heating the rock to an intense degree, and pouring water on the surface, in order to make it split, are discernible in several places; and at Llanvaethlu, a few miles from this place, a cake of copper was found, weighing fifty lb., and bearing a mark resembling the Roman letter L; from which circumstance it is more than probable that that people had smelting-works in the neighbourhood. But the existence of the immense treasures which since that time had lain concealed or neglected was not thought of till the year 1762, when Mr. Alexander Frazier, a native of Scotland, visiting Anglesey in search of mines, and being struck with the promising appearance of the Parys mountain, in this parish, induced Sir Nicholas Bayley, the proprietor, to make some experiments, and, on sinking shafts in the mountain, copper-ore was discovered; but before a sufficient quantity of it could be obtained to defray the expenses of the work, the mine was inundated with water, and the operations were consequently suspended. About two years after, Messrs. Roe and Co., of Macclesfield, applying to Sir Nicholas Bayley for a lease of the mine of Penrhyn dd, in the county of Carnarvon, obtained it only upon condition of their taking also a lease of part of the Parys mountain, and carrying on a level for the purpose of continuing the works which had been previously abandoned. With this condition they reluctantly complied, and, upon making a fair trial, ore was discovered; but the expense of procuring it far exceeding the profits, they, after carrying on their works at a great loss for some time, resolved to discontinue operations. Their agent, however, previously to abandoning an enterprise upon which so much labour had been bestowed, and so much money expended, resolved upon making another and final effort. For this purpose he divided his men into several small companies, and having observed, near that part of the mountain which is called the Golden Venture, a spring of water which, from its appearance, he conceived must issue from a mineral bed, he ordered his men to sink shafts in several places, within seven or eight hundred yards of the spot, and in less than two days they discovered, at the depth only of seven feet from the surface, that vast body of mineral ore which has been subsequently worked with so much advantage to the proprietors. This important discovery was made on the 2nd of March, 1768, and the anniversary of that day was for many years celebrated as a festival by the miners of this district, and St. Chad considered their patron saint.

In 1775, the Rev. Edward Hughes, who in right of his wife was proprietor of another part of the Parys mountain, commenced a series of operations, and discovered a still larger body of mineral ore, the successful working of which laid the foundation of the immense wealth possessed by his only son, the present Lord Dinorben. The Parys mine, soon after its discovery, became the property of the Earl of Uxbridge, by whom and Mr. Hughes the management of their joint property in this mountain was committed to Mr. Thomas Williams, a native of Anglesey, who was subsequently admitted to a considerable share in the concern with Mr. Hughes, and by his unremitting labours realised a large fortune. Under the superintendence of Mr. Williams the works began to flourish, and, in the course of a few years, several subordinate companies of melters, refiners, and manufacturers were formed at Holywell, Swansea, Ravenhead, Birmingham, Marlow, and Wraybury; and warehouses for the sale of the copper were opened at London, Liverpool, and Bristol: these various establishments, all under the direction of Mr. Williams, formed collectively a business of almost unexampled magnitude, involving a fluctuating property of at least one million sterling, and in which numerous opulent individuals had a direct interest, and several thousand persons obtained employment. Towards the close of the last century, the immense produce of the Parys mountain exceeded the aggregate produce of all the other copper mines in the kingdom, and had such an effect upon the market, that, for some years, a severe competition existed between the Anglesey and Cornish companies, which at length ended in a coalition, advantageous to themselves, but injurious to those manufacturers to whom the use of copper was essential. The inhabitants of Birmingham, Liverpool, Wolverhampton, and other towns interested in the trade, having made an unsuccessful application to parliament, for relief against this monopoly, an association of spirited individuals, called the "Birmingham Copper Mining Company," purchased mines in Cornwall, and, erecting smelting-houses in the neighbourhood of Swansea, were enabled to supply the manufacturers at a more moderate price, and thus completely destroyed the effect of the coalition. These mines, however, continued to flourish, until about the year 1811, in which, owing to the want of employment, arising from the great depression of the trade, numerous families emigrated from Amlwch to Liverpool and other places, and left that town in a declining state of poverty and distress, from which it recovered with the extended operation of the mines, a few years afterwards, and, in connexion with the latter, has since continued prosperous and flourishing. It is now of considerable size, and is principally provided with excellent water from a spring called Fynnon Elaeth. The body of copper-ore contained in this mountain is of unknown extent; and, instead of the usual process of mining, it is in some parts quarried out from the mountain in solid masses, which are afterwards broken into small pieces, previously to its undergoing the necessary process of separating the ore from the matrix of stone in which it is contained. The Parys and the Mona mines are both in the same grand vein, which in many instances exceeds one hundred yards in breadth, descending to a depth not yet explored, and have been worked to a very great extent in a direct line, with numerous ramifications in various directions, from which, including open cast excavations and subterraneous workings, of which several are upon a scale of great extent and grandeur, besides shafts, levels, &c., many hundred thousand cubic yards of earth and ore have been removed. The principal vein contains ore, in what the workmen term "bellies," which afterwards constitute what they likewise denominate "Stock works."

Some idea of the quantity of ore contained in the Mona mine may be formed from the result of two contracts for three months each, made in the year 1787, exclusively of other smaller contracts during the same period: from one of these were obtained, within that time, two thousand nine hundred and thirty-one tons of good copper-ore, and only ninety-two tons of waste; and from the other, four hundred and eighty-eight tons of good ore, and two hundred and sixty-seven tons of waste. Divers other ores have here been discovered, and a bed of yellowish greasy clay, varying from one to four yards in thickness, lying above the copper ore, and not more than two feet below the surface, contains lead in the proportion of from six hundred to a thousand lb. per ton, each ton of metal yielding no less than fifty-seven ounces of silver. Mixed with this earth are frequently found portions of the colour of cinnabar, probably indicating the presence of sulphureous arsenic silver ores, or of quicksilver. On the temporary decline of the copper trade, works for the smelting of this ore were erected on a large scale; but, owing to the high price of coal, and the decreasing demand for lead, the undertaking was ultimately abandoned. The smelting of this ore in the mass did not realise the promise held out by the assays made of it in the crucible; but probably, the mode recently adopted by the Germans, in separating the silver-ore, may excite the attention of the proprietors to the improvement, and render productive of future profit the great mass of refuse at present lying around the Parys mountain. The various other ores also discovered in this tract have been disregarded, in comparison with the procuring of copper-ore, which appears hitherto to have engrossed all the attention of the proprietors. The ore is generally the yellow copper-ore, and contains pyrites, sulphur, and from four to fifteen per cent. of copper. Some black ore has been raised, containing from fifteen to twenty per cent. of copper; and some parts of the vein produce fine specimens of native copper, adhering, in a foliated form, to the sides of the intervening rock, and probably once held in solution and precipitated by the ferruginous quality of the substance to which it adhered.

The ore, after being quarried in large masses, is broken into small lumps, and separated as much as possible from the waste: it is afterwards conveyed to kilns, differing in shape and dimensions, in which it is exposed for a period of nine or ten months to the action of a gentle fire, by means of which the sulphur is separated from the copper, which, after being dressed and washed, is sent to the smelting-houses. The kilns contain in general from four hundred to thirteen hundred tons of ore, and attached to them are chambers, into which the sulphur, instead of evaporating, is conducted, by means of flues connected with the kilns, and afterwards condensed: the walls of the kilns, generally about four or five feet in height, and of sufficient strength to bear the lateral pressure of the ore, vary in length in proportion to the quantity they are intended to contain. The ore is heaped up to the height of four or five feet above the walls, in a long convex pile, and closely covered with stones and other matter, luted with clay, to prevent evaporation. Along the ridge of the summit are placed horizontal flues, to receive the sulphur which sublimes to the top of the kiln, and conduct it into the sulphur chamber at the extremity. The ore, when it is once lighted, continues to burn for the period assigned, during which the chamber is cleared out three or four times; and the sulphur, after having been refined, is cast into cubes and cones, principally used in the manufacture of gunpowder and vitriolic acid, and into small rolls, which are chiefly sent to London, and form the stone brimstone exposed for sale in the shops. Prior to the year 1784, the whole of the ore was calcined in open kilns on the top of the hill, the sulphureous vapour exhaling from which, being condensed in the atmosphere, for some time shed a malignant influence on the soil, and converted several hundred acres of land adjoining into a barren waste, especially between the mountain and the sea. But the fumes having since that period been carefully condensed in the chambers appropriated for their reception, this land has assumed its former appearance of comparative fertility.

The ore in the mine abounds with sulphureous acid, which, uniting with the water, flows through the fissures of the vein, and combining with the copper, holds it in solution. The water, thus impregnated, is raised into reservoirs, or pits, ranged in regular series at different elevations, according to the declivity of the ground; and iron being put into it, the acid, having a stronger affinity to that metal, detaches itself from the copper, which is precipitated to the bottom in a congeries of small granulae. In order to expedite the process of precipitation, the iron is frequently scraped, and a fresh surface is thus exposed to the action of the acid; but by this means certain portions of the decomposed iron mixing with the precipitated copper, the quality of the latter is impaired and rendered less valuable. The proportion of copper contained in the mass thus precipitated varies from ten to twenty-five per cent.; but if wrought iron be used, and suffered to remain without scraping, till it is completely decomposed by the acid, it will precipitate nearly its own weight of sediment; and a ton of sediment thus precipitated will generally produce, when dried and smelted, about twelve hundred-weight of pure copper, which is more malleable and of a finer quality than that produced from the ore. After the precipitation has taken effect in the reservoirs of the upper series, the water is drawn off into those on the next lower level, and from those again into the next lower, till all the copper held in solution has subsided. The copper is taken from the emptied reservoirs in the form of mud, and after being dried is sent to the smelting-houses.

Formerly, after the mineral water had been drawn off into the last receptacle for it, the iron was extracted from its solution in the acid in the form of green vitriol, or copperas; but this plan not proving sufficiently profitable, it was abandoned for the manufacture of alum, which also not realising the gains anticipated, was in its turn relinquished, and the only value of the sulphate of iron in the lower pits is at present derived from its depositing a yellow ochre, which is refined, dried, and shipped for the use of painters. The better sort of ore was formerly smelted in furnaces in South Wales and Lancashire, and only the poorer at Amlwch; but the whole is now smelted at this place. About twenty vessels, of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty tons' burden, were employed in conveying it thither, bringing back from those places coal and culm for the furnaces at Amlwch. These smelting-houses are upon a very extensive scale, and contain a vast number of reverberating furnaces, the chimneys of which are more than forty feet high: the furnaces are charged, every five or six hours, with about twelve hundred-weight of ore, producing about half a hundred-weight of rough copper, from which, by refinement, nearly one-half of pure metal is obtained. The best unroasted ore contains, on an average, about eight per cent. of metal, and the inferior about four per cent.; and the best roasted ore contains about ten per cent., and the inferior, on an average, about four and a half. The strikingly rugged and barren aspect of the Parys mountain is rendered still more wild and terrific by the immense heaps of burning ore which are piled up on various parts of its surface: the continual noise of the workmen employed in breaking the masses of ore which have been detached from the mountain, and the reverberated roar of frequent explosions of gunpowder used in blasting the rock, add to the dismal scene an effect truly appalling. Great numbers of the workmen are seen at different elevations on the edges of tremendous precipices, drawing up the broken ore in baskets; while others, suspended by ropes about half-way down, are working, apparently at the imminent hazard of their lives, in perforating the steep sides of the mountain, in which, after having secured a resting-place for their feet, they open a wide chasm, by detaching large masses of ore, that fall with prodigious noise to the bottom. Towards the close of the last century, when the Parys and Mona mines were very prosperous and in vigorous operation, their produce amounted to thirty thousand tons of available ore annually, and fifteen hundred men were employed in them; but when, about the year 1809, the works declined, and many of the workmen were obliged to seek employment in other places, not more than six hundred tons were obtained. In the year 1829, sixteen thousand four hundred tons, and in 1830, fifteen thousand six hundred and fifty tons, of copper-ore were produced from these works, which, in the several processes of quarrying, dressing, smelting, and refining, afford employment to more than one thousand five hundred persons. An extensive brewery has been established; but no other trade or manufacture is carried on, except such as are immediately connected with the mining operations and the works dependent on them. The mineral produce is shipped at Amlwch, which is considered a creek to the port of Beaumaris, and the harbour of which has been much enlarged by the proprietors of the mines. In 1793, an act of parliament was obtained for the improvement of the port and the formation of a harbour, under the provisions of which a pier was erected, in 1814; and in 1822 a breakwater was constructed, by which means it has been rendered one of the most secure and commodious harbours on the coast of North Wales: there are two lighthouses with steady lights at the entrance to it. It is accessible to vessels of three hundred tons' burden at all states of the tide, and numerous vessels are employed in conveying the mineral produce of this district to its several destinations, and in bringing the articles requisite for the carrying on of these extensive works, and the supply of the inhabitants. The principal exports are copper, limestone, and ale, the produce of this parish, and a very fine kind of marble, resembling the verd antique, of which there are quarries in the adjoining parish: the principal imports are coal, old iron, and tin, the two last used in the precipitation of copper; and shops goods of various kinds. A customary market, which is abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds, is held weekly; and there is a fair for the sale of cattle on November 12th. By the act for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, recently passed, Amlwch has been constituted a borough, in conjunction with Holyhead and Llangefni, contributory to Beaumaris, and sharing in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of houses worth ten pounds per annum and upwards is fifty-two: the mayor of Beaumaris is the returning officer.

This parish is divided into three parts, viz., Amlwch, Pwllcoch; Llechog, Bodynod, with Gorddwr; and Llawr y Llan; to which, in levying the county rate, the adjoining parishes of Bodewryd and Gwredog are considered a fourth division. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Llanwenllwyvo annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor, to whom the great tithes were appropriated in the reign of James I. The church, dedicated to St. Elaeth, a spacious and handsome structure, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected in 1800, at an expense of £2500, defrayed by the Earl of Uxbridge and the Rev. Edward Hughes, at that time proprietors of the mines, and by Mr. Thomas Williams, who was a great benefactor to the parish. There were formerly two chapels of ease, both of which are now in ruins; one four miles to the west of Amlwch, called Llan Lleianau, or the cell of the Nuns, and the other about the same distance to the south, called St. Cadog. There are three places of worship each for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Baptists and Independents. Edward Kynnier, in 1689, gave by deed £311, directing the interest to be appropriated to the payment of a master to teach poor children of this parish to read: this school was regularly kept up till the year 1821, when a National school was established, and a building erected at an expense of £1200, defrayed by subscription, to the support of which, in aid of the subscriptions, the interest of Mr. Kynnier's donation has, since that time, been applied. In this school, which is adapted to the reception of three hundred children, one hundred and twenty boys, and the same number of girls, receive gratuitous instruction. The interest of several charitable donations and bequests by various benefactors, amounting in the aggregate to £44 per annum, is distributed among the poor, at Christmas, by the minister and churchwardens of the parish. Near the extremity of the parish, and bordering upon that of Llanbadrig, are the remains of the monastery of Llan Lleianau, situated near the sea-shore, consisting principally of some traces of the foundation, and ruins of sepulchral memorials scattered over the extensive cemetery. Near this spot are the remains of a British fortress, called Dinas. The ancient well, called Fynnon Elaeth, was formerly in high estimation for the efficacy of its waters in the cure of various diseases, and is still held in some degree of repute. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1043. 5.

AMROATH (AMBROTH, or AMROTH), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S.E.) from Narberth, containing 636 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the western shore of Carmarthen bay, abounds with coal of a peculiarly fine quality, which, burning without smoke or any offensive smell, is much in request for the drying of malt and hops; for this purpose considerable quantities are shipped from a place called Wiseman's Bridge, in vessels of fifty or sixty tons' burden, and sent to Bristol, and other places on the banks of the Severn. This part of the bay is celebrated for salmon, cod, and flat-fish, which are taken in abundance, and of which considerable quantities are sent for the supply of the market at Tenby, five miles distant. Iron-ore was formerly obtained in this parish, during the existence of the Pembrey Iron Company; but the operations have been suspended since the stoppage of their works. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 6½., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Charles Poyer Callen, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Elidyr, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, and is well fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners. A school, for the gratuitous instruction of an unlimited number of children of both sexes, is endowed with a bequest of the late D. Rees, Esq., of the city of London, who gave £20 per annum to this parish, of which £5, according to the will of the testator, is annually distributed among the most deserving of the poor, and the remainder appropriated to the maintenance of the school. In the vicinity of Amroath are several elegant seats, of which two are within the parish. Of these, Amroath Castle, originally either the residence of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, Prince of Powys, or the site of his palace, and subsequently the seat of the family of the Elliots, at which period it was called Eare Weare, has been modernized into an elegant marine castellated villa, and is now the residence of the Rev. Thomas Shrapnel Biddulph. It was at this place that Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, according to some writers, gave a sumptuous banquet to the neighbouring chiefs, among whom was Gerald de Windsor, lord of Carew, and his wife Nesta, whom the son of Cadwgan afterwards carried off by force from the castle of Carew, as is noticed in the account of that place. Colby Lodge, an elegant mansion, the seat of Capt. Protheroe, is beautifully situated in a highly romantic dell, opening at one extremity towards the sea, of which it commands a fine and interesting view, and is enriched in other parts with scenery pleasingly varied, forming a beautiful and sequestered retreat. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £141. 1.

ANDREW'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S.W.) from Cardiff, containing 474 inhabitants. The soil of the greater part of this parish is a strong, brown, dry earth, well adapted for grain of all kinds, potatoes, &c.; the rest is either a heavy grey clay, suitable for beans, &c., or wet and marshy, producing only coarse hay, or rough pasturage for young cattle: the substratum of the whole is limestone, in the procuring of which, and lias, several of the inhabitants are employed: a considerable quantity of magnesia is also obtained in the parish. The ground is rather elevated and hilly towards the inland, or northern, side of the parish, and flat and level towards the Bristol channel, or southern side, and subject to partial inundation from the overflowing of a small stream, called Dinas-Powis brook, which runs through the south-eastern part of the parish towards the south, and empties itself into the Bristol channel, between the parishes of Cadoxton and Sully, which lie between St. Andrew's and the channel. The village is called Dinas-Powis from an ancient fortress that existed here, which also gave name to the hundred. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church has no claim to architectural description: at the east end of the north aisle, parallel with the chancel, is a private chapel, anciently the property and burial-place of a respectable family, named Howel, long since extinct, resident at Bouville, and owners of a great part of the parish, which is now kept in repair by Henry Lee, Esq., the present proprietor of part of the Bouville estate. In the floor of this chapel there is a stone bearing the following inscription:—"Here lyeth the body of John Gibbon James, buried the 14 of August, 1601. And Margaret Mathew, his wife, buried the 8 of January, 1631. He aged ninety-nine, she aged one hundred and twenty-four." A spacious and commodious rectory-house has recently been completed by the Rev. Windsor Richards, the present incumbent. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Divers benefactions of small amount have been made for the use of the poor, consisting of bequests of £2 by William David, and £10 by Thomas Stephens, in 1699; of £5 by Edward Howels, in 1709; of £5 by William Morgan, in 1718; and of £5 by Thomas Thomas, in 1729: these sums were vested in trust with the overseers, but there is no record of their appropriation to charitable purposes, except, probably, in the purchase of a house, which is now enjoyed rent-free by the poor. On part of the site of the ancient mansion of Bouville, situated at the north-western extremity of the parish, a farm-house has been erected by R. F. Jenner, Esq., one of whose ancestors purchased it, together with a portion of the estate; and there are some slight vestiges of the ancient building adjoining it. The fortress of Dinas-Powis was situated on the north-eastern side of the parish: it is stated to have been built by Iestyn ab Gwrgan, who succeeded to the kingdom of Glamorgan, in 1043, and became possessed of the district called Trêv Esyllt by marriage with Denis, the daughter of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, Prince of Powys, after whom he is said to have called the castle Denis-Powys; but this etymology is probably incorrect, as the village is invariably called Dinas-Powis, meaning the city of Powys; and the castle, Dinas-Powis castle, in all likelihood in honour of his father-in-law, the Prince of Powys. It does not appear from the remains to have been built as a place of permanent residence, but as an asylum for the inhabitants and their cattle during the feuds of ancient times. The ruins merely consist of four walls, between thirty and forty feet high, and six feet thick, rudely built of unhewn stone, with battlements about five feet high, and a platform three feet wide within, enclosing an oblong square area, seventy yards by thirty-five in dimensions, to which there are two entrances, one, apparently the principal, at the east end, now, from the falling in of the wall, presenting only a wide breach, and the other on the north side, about nine feet high, and six feet wide, arched over with rough unhewn stones. In the two walls at the end, and that on the north side, there are ranges of square holes, nine inches in diameter, plastered with mortar, distant from each other five or six feet horizontally, and about three feet perpendicularly, which were probably intended for the admission of air: within the area a mound of earth and stones, of very easy ascent, rises to the top of the wall on the south side; and near the northern extremity there are the foundations of some walls, rather difficult to be traced, which appear to have formed two small square separate apartments. On the outside of the great walls, at the north-western corner, there is a smaller heap of ruins, probably those of an arc, or tower, appendant to the castle, with which it appears to have communicated by means of a narrow door; and, within the memory of persons now living, there was a subterraneous passage, commencing in the side of the rocky hill, forming the site of the castle, and proceeding in a direction towards this tower, but which has been filled up. These ruins are the property of Mr. Lee, who has caused some parts of the walls to be repaired, to prevent their further decay. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £207. 13.

ANDREW'S (ST.) MINOR, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Cowbridge, containing 16 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its chapel to St. Andrew, and is distinguished by the adjunct Minor from the parish of St. Andrew, in the hundred of Dinas-Powis, in the same county. It is pleasantly situated in the great vale of Glamorgan, in the south-eastern portion of the county, and near the northern shore of the Bristol channel, distant only a few miles from the coast. It is of small extent, comprising only one estate, called Clementston, which is co-extensive with the parish, and is the property of T. Franklin, Esq. Clementston House, which has recently received considerable additions and improvements, and has undergone a course of thorough repair, for the residence of its proprietor, is a handsome, well-built mansion, pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully disposed. The living is a sinecure rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, and in the patronage of T. Franklin, Esq., of Clementston, who, as proprietor of that estate, pays to the minister a modus of £5. The church, which appears to have been originally built for the accommodation of the family and household at Clementston, is now in ruins.

ANGLE, or NANGLE, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (W.) from Pembroke, containing 458 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the south-western extremity of the county, and in an angle of Milford haven, affording excellent anchorage for small vessels; from which circumstance it probably has obtained its name. Limestone of very excellent quality is found here in abundance, which, being susceptible of a fine polish, is formed into mantel-pieces, and a considerable portion of it is burnt for manure. The female inhabitants are employed in platting straw for bonnets, hassocks, and matting, and, during the season, the men are occupied in dredging for oysters. The living consists of a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, the former rated in the king's books at £10. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; and the latter rated at £3. 19. 2., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's; two-thirds of the tithes are appropriated to the rectory, and one-third to the vicarage. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A school for the gratuitous instruction of about twenty-five poor girls is entirely supported by Mrs. Mirehouse, of Brownslade, in the parish of Castlemartin. Near the entrance of the haven are the remains of an ancient building, called the Block-House, of the origin or purpose of which there is no historical record: from its situation it appears to have been erected for the protection of the entrance, probably in the reign of Henry VIII., or Elizabeth; but, from the excellency of the masonry, some tourists have ascribed to it a Roman origin. Near the church is a mansion called the Hall, the property of John Mirehouse, Esq., of Brownslade, to whom the whole parish belongs, and now in the occupation of a tenant. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £229. 16.

ANGLESEY, an insular county of NORTH WALES, surrounded by the Irish sea, except on the south-east, on which side it is separated from the county of Carnarvon by the long, narrow, and rocky strait called the Menai: it extends from  $53^{\circ} 6'$  to  $53^{\circ} 23'$  (N. Lat.), and from  $4^{\circ} 20'$  to  $5^{\circ} 5'$  (W. Lon.); and comprises, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, one hundred and seventy-three thousand statute acres, or upwards of two hundred and seventy square miles. The population, in 1831, was 48,325. This island anciently formed part of the territory of the Ordovices, by whom it was variously called Ynys dywell, or "the Shady Island;" Ynys y Cedeirn, from its heroes, or powerful Druids; and Ynys Vón, or Ynys Môn, afterwards written singly Món, which the Romans latinized into Mona. From the first of these names, Mr. Rowlands, in his "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," supposes the Thule of the Romans to have been derived, and considers Anglesey as the "ultima Thule." The same respectable antiquary thinks that the name Món is derived from the position of the island with respect to the other parts of Britain, that syllable, with the same sound, being found in the names of other western extremities of this and other countries inhabited by the Celtæ. Thus Cornwall was called by the Romans Danmōnium (the furthest point of it being to this day called Penvon-laz, or wlad); the Isle of Man, Moneda; and the westernmost part of Ireland, Momonía, or, in Irish, Mown. The common ancient British appellation of this island, viz., that of Món mam Gymru, "Môn, the mother, or nurse, of Wales," is supposed by some to allude to its productiveness, which afforded so great a supply of food to the other parts of Wales; but by others it is derived from its having been the chief residence of the Druids, whom the primitive Britons considered the parents of science and the guardians of society. This region, from its remote and insular situation, its vicinity to the Isle of Man, and the facility with which a passage might hence be made to that island, or to Ireland, appears to have been chosen, as their most secure asylum, by the Druids, during the persecution which they endured from the invading Romans. The first Roman commander who penetrated as far as Mona was Suetonius Paulinus, to whom the supreme authority in Britain was entrusted in the year 58. Having first subdued the continental part of North Wales, this Roman general crossed the Menai by means of flat-bottomed boats, and by swimming that arm of the sea at low water; and made an easy conquest of the island, in spite of the opposition of the Druids, many of whom he massacred, cut down their groves, overturned their altars, and destroyed the seminary of that ancient order. Suetonius is thought to have made his entrance into Mona at Porthamel ferry, five miles westward from the site of the Menai bridge; but before he had wholly completed its conquest, his operations were interrupted by a formidable insurrection of the country in his rear, under the celebrated Boadicea; and this diversion of the Roman forces gave the remainder of the Druids a respite from persecution for fifteen years. The next attack which they experienced was under the direction of Julius Agricola, who was sent by the Emperor Vespasian to command the forces in Britain, in the year 78. This commander, on his arrival, found the Ordovices, the inhabitants of North Wales, in revolt; but he soon subdued the continental part of their territory with great slaughter, and compelled their chieftains to take refuge in Mona. He then advanced to the shore of the Menai, opposite to Moel y Don, in this county; and the struggling Britons, thus hemmed in, were urged to the necessity of exerting all their energies in defence of their lives, liberty, and sacred institutions. Tacitus describes the British army, which lined the shores to resist the landing of the Romans, as accompanied by another army of Druids, of both sexes, and in such confusion, that he designates them as a multitude of viragoes and madmen. The auxiliaries of the Roman army having crossed the Menai on horseback, to the great surprise and consternation of the Britons, a desperate struggle ensued, in which the latter were totally defeated; and the Druids, by command of the conqueror, were thrown into their own sacrificial fires. Under the Roman sway this island is supposed to have contained one station, situated at Caer Gybi, close to the present town of Holyhead. After the dissolution of the Roman power, and during the reign of Einion Urdd, son of Cynedda, who united under his government the kingdom of the Strath-Clyde Britons and the province of North Wales, and resided in his northern territories, the Irish Scots, under the command of Sirigi, or "the Rover," landed in Mona, and, having defeated the natives, took possession of the island. On receiving intelligence of this invasion, Einion Urdd sent his eldest son, Caswallon Law-hîr, to the relief of Mona; and the latter executed his orders by routing the enemy at Holyhead, where their fleet was lying at anchor, and by slaying Sirigi in a personal encounter. About the year 443, Caswallon, having succeeded to his father's throne, made choice of Mona for his residence; and, being the eldest branch of the Cyneddian family of British princes, he enjoyed a pre-eminence in dignity, and received from the other Cambrian princes homage and obedience, as their superior lord.

From this epoch may be dated the establishment of a distinct sovereignty in North Wales, which country, however, was overrun, and for a few years, early in the sixth century, held in subjection, by the Saxon monarch, Edwin of Northumbria. About the year 817, in right of that equal distribution of the property of a deceased person among all his children, by the custom which prevailed among the Welsh, similar to the Saxon gavelkind, Howel, the younger son of Rhodri Molwynog, late sovereign of North Wales, laid claim to the island of Mona, as his share of his father's inheritance. This claim being denied by his eldest brother, Cynan Tindaethwy, the reigning prince, the contending parties agreed to decide the affair by force of arms, the result of which, in two successive battles, was favourable to Howel, who thus obtained possession of the disputed territory. But Cynan, enraged at these defeats, determined to make a vigorous effort, even at the hazard of his crown and life, to recover the island: he raised a new army and marched against his brother, who, finding himself unable to rally a sufficient force, withdrew to the Isle of Man, leaving Mona in the possession of Cynan. During the reign of Mervyn Vyrch, who had married Epyllt, daughter of Cynan Tindaethwy, Egbert, King of the West Saxons, having desolated a great part of North Wales, advanced to Mona, and, having overcome the Welsh in a bloody battle fought at Llanvaes, near Beaumaris, took possession of the island, which, though soon recovered by King Mervyn, at this period lost its ancient name of Mona among the Anglo-Saxons, who henceforward called it Angles-Ey, or "the Englishmen's Isle." Anglesey was again invaded by the Saxons, in 846, under the Mercian prince Burhred, who perpetrated the most cruel ravages; but the young prince Rhodri, or Roderic (afterwards surnamed Mawr, or "the Great"), who had but just succeeded to the sovereignty of North Wales, opposed a spirited resistance to the invaders, who, unable to effect the entire subjugation of the island, were soon afterwards compelled to quit it, in order to defend their own territories against the Danish incursions. The Danes, having been repulsed from England by Alfred, made a descent in Anglesey in the year 873, where, in two successive battles (one fought at Brÿn-goleu, and the other at Menegid), they were vigorously encountered by Roderic. About this period the Welsh prince removed the royal residence from Caer Segont, now Carnarvon, where it had been fixed by the successors of Caswallon Law-hîr, to Aberfraw, on the south-western coast of the island, where that prince had originally established it. An interval of freedom from the molestations of the Danes afforded the English another opportunity of invading Anglesey with a formidable army. The Welsh sovereign opposed them with his usual spirit, and at length fell in defence of his country, being slain with his brother Gwryiad in one of the battles fought with the English.

According to the late king's division of the sovereignty among his three sons, this island was included in the kingdom of Gwynedd, or North Wales, the residence of whose sovereigns was at Aberfraw, in the palace which had been erected by Roderic. A large body of Danes landed in the island in the year 900; but this invasion seems only to have been distinguished by a battle fought at Rhôs-meilion, in which fell Mervyn, Prince of Powys. Early in the reign of Edwal Voel, who succeeded to the sovereignty of North Wales in the year 913, the Irish made a descent upon Anglesey, which they laid waste with great cruelty. A party of marauders from the same country made another descent in the year 966, destroyed the royal palace at Aberfraw, and slew Roderic, the youngest son of Edwal Voel. In 969, the island once more suffered from an invasion of the Danes, who ravaged the easternmost part of the county in the vicinity of Penmon; and in a second enterprise, shortly after, they gained for a time complete possession of it. Constantine the Black, fired with the deepest resentment at the injuries received by his family from his cousin Howel, Prince of North Wales, by whom his father Iago was then held in close confinement, collected an army of Danish pirates, and, in the year 979, laid waste this island : but Howel, having assembled his forces, routed the Danes in a battle fought at Gwaith Hirbarth, in which Constantine was slain. Meredydd, a prince who ruled in Powys by right of his mother, about the year 985, took possession of the kingdom of North Wales ; but the Danes invading Anglesey soon after, took prisoner Llywarch, that sovereign's brother, with two thousand of his men, and put out his eyes, which so terrified Meredydd, that he fled into Powys, leaving his subjects of Gwynedd without a sovereign, and exposed to the ravages of any invader : in consequence of this, the Danes again landed in Anglesey, and laid waste the whole island. Soon after the accession of Trehaern ab Caradoc to the sovereignty of North Wales, in 1073, Gruffydd ab Cynan thought this a favourable opportunity to assert his right to the same throne, to which he had an hereditary claim. This prince, during the late reigns, had sought refuge in Ireland, his mother being a native of that country ; and having procured aid from some of the Irish princes, his kinsmen, he landed a body of troops in Anglesey, of which he soon effected the conquest. He then passed the Menai, but was defeated by Trehaern in Merionethshire, and compelled to return to this island, where he soon after received reinforcements from Ireland, and speedily made himself master of the kingdom for which he contended.

In 1096, during the reign of William Rufus in England, and of Gruffydd ab Cynan in Gwynedd, a formidable army of English, under the command of Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Hugh the Red, Earl of Shrewsbury, invaded North Wales, at the secret instigation of several powerful native chieftains ; and Gruffydd retired to the mountains for safety. The two earls, encountering no resistance, advanced into that part of Carnarvonshire which lies nearest to Anglesey ; when Gruffydd, anticipating the danger which threatened the seat of his government, crossed the Menai into this island, and receiving a small reinforcement from Ireland, resolved to defend this part of his territory. At this critical moment, however, Owain ab Edwyn, lord of Englefield, one of the secret betrayers of his country, whose daughter was the wife of Gruffydd, and who was himself his prime minister and adviser, openly avowed his treachery, and joined the English army with his forces. The Welsh prince, alarmed at the defection of so powerful a chieftain, and unable to oppose the increased numbers of the enemy, withdrew to Ireland. Thus again left unprotected, Anglesey fell an easy prey to the English, who took ample revenge upon its inhabitants, for the cruelties which had a little before been committed by the Welsh on the English border, by massacring many, and cutting off the hands and feet and otherwise barbarously mutilating others. The deliverance of North Wales at this perilous period was brought about by a train of fortuitous circumstances. Magnus, son of Harold, King of Norway, having taken possession of the Orkneys and the Isle of Man, accidentally arrived at this time on the coast of Anglesey, and attempted a descent upon it. In the opposition which the English made to his landing, the impetuous valour of the Earl of Shrewsbury having hurried him into the water, the Norwegian prince levelled an arrow at him, which, through the opening of his helmet, pierced his brain through his right eye, and he fell convulsed in the sea : the Welsh regarded this as a stroke of retributive justice coming immediately from the hand of the Almighty. The death of the Earl of Shrewsbury produced some disorder among the English, and compelled them to abandon the shore ; and the Earl of Chester, on this disaster, suddenly withdrew to Bangor, where he for some time fixed his abode, carrying on a desultory warfare with the inhabitants of Anglesey, whom he annoyed with frequent aggressions. The latter earl, in the course of this expedition, erected a castle at a place called Aberlenniog, on the shores of the Menai, near Beaumaris. The Norwegians, finding that the English had left nothing to plunder, immediately re-embarked ; and this was the last attempt made by any of the northern nations to ravage or subdue this island. In the year 1151, Cadwalader, brother of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, who had long been kept in confinement by his nephew Hywel, escaped from prison, and, fleeing to Anglesey, brought a great part of the island under subjection : but a formidable body of troops having been sent against him by the Prince of North Wales, he was obliged to seek refuge in England. At the period of the invasion of North Wales by Henry II., in 1157, the English fleet, which, under the conduct of Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, sailed from Chester to infest the coasts of North Wales, made a descent on Anglesey, and ravaged a part of the island ; but, in returning to their ships, the force which had landed was attacked by the whole strength of the island and entirely destroyed, and the English fleet immediately weighed anchor, and sailed back to Chester. In 1173, Davydd ab Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, forcibly took Anglesey from his brother Roderic, whom he put into close confinement : on this occasion the island suffered considerable devastation. On the invasion of Wales by Henry III., in 1245, that monarch's justiciary in Ireland received orders to make a diversion from that kingdom on the Isle of Anglesey, which was accordingly made in August, by the Irish forces, and the whole island laid waste ; but not being promptly supported by the English king, they were assailed by the inhabitants, when laden with plunder, and driven back to their ships.

On the eve of the great invasion of Wales by Edward I., in 1277, that sovereign directed a fleet from the Cinque Ports to cruise on the coast of Wales, one object of which was the reduction of this island, which it fully effected. Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the reigning prince of North Wales, being shortly after compelled to sue for peace, obtained it only upon hard conditions, one of which was that, though he should continue to hold the island of Anglesey, he should pay for that permission the annual sum of one thousand marks, and, if he died without issue, the island was then to be vested in the King of England and his heirs for ever : Edward, however, remitted the yearly tribute of one thousand marks. This treaty being afterwards broken, Edward, in his next invasion of Wales, while lying in the vicinity of Aberconway, again, in like manner, ordered a strong detachment of marines and other forces, in the vessels of the Cinque Ports, to take possession of Anglesey, in order not only to deprive the Welsh of the advantage of that fruitful island, as a source of provisions, but also to confine them within narrower limits, and, by dividing their attention, to facilitate his entrance into the inner recesses of their continental territory. This service was performed with complete success : the island was easily taken, as the chief persons in it supported the interests of Edward, in conformance with the oaths which they had taken at the late peace. The English in Anglesey then made preparations for crossing the Menai by a bridge of boats, constructed from the point called Moel y don ; but, owing to the imprudence of a part of their forces, which crossed that arm of the sea before the bridge was completed, and was consequently surprised and destroyed by the Welsh, the rest were compelled to remain for a time in Anglesey ; nor did they finish the bridge and make good their passage until after the unfortunate death of Llewelyn, in the winter following. After the complete subjugation of the principality in this campaign, Edward allowed its inhabitants to enjoy their estates under the tenures by which they had held them under their native princes ; and the rents which the inhabitants of Anglesey had been accustomed to pay were reduced in amount to four hundred and fifty pounds a year, although they had formerly yielded a thousand marks annually to Llewelyn. Though conquered, and reduced in numbers by the long war which they had so bravely maintained, the native spirit of the Welsh remained unsubdued, and was often exasperated into rebellion by the tyranny of their new masters, who found it necessary, for the maintenance of their authority, to fortify themselves in numerous strong castles. The Isle of Anglesey at this time formed the principal rendezvous of all the native chieftains, who, notwithstanding their formal submission to the authority of Edward, were unceasingly engaged in plots to throw off the English yoke, and made this the centre of several important insurrections, which were successively quelled. Edward, in 1284, appointed his favourite, Sir Roger de Puleston, sheriff and keeper of Anglesey : this powerful knight was afterwards slain, in 1294, during the insurrection led by Madoc, an illegitimate son of the last Llewelyn, who soon after gained possession of Anglesey. Edward, having quelled the rebellion in the continental part of the principality, crossed the Menai into Anglesey ; and the English forces on this occasion destroyed the church, with some part of the other buildings, of Llanvaes priory, and devastated its lands. Edward, seeing the impossibility of preventing the excitement of other rebellions, which might threaten the stability of his dominion in Wales, whilst Anglesey, without an English garrison, afforded such facilities for combination, found it necessary to erect in this island a castle equal in strength and importance to those which he had previously built at Carnarvon and Aberconway, and to place in it a garrison equally formidable. As the site of this fortress, he selected Porth Wgyr, a place of great antiquity, near the easternmost extremity of the county, which at that time had acquired the name of Bonover, and to which the Anglo-Normans, on account of its situation in a flat on the sea-shore, gave the appellation of Beaumarais, since slightly modernized into Beaumaris : the work was completed in 1296. The ill-fated Sir Gruffydd Llwyd, who received the honour of knighthood from Edward I., on bringing him the intelligence of queen Eleanor's being delivered of a son (afterwards Edward II.), in Carnarvon castle, was a native of Tregarnedd, in this county, and subsequently did homage for his estates to this young prince, at Chester. But afterwards, indignant at insults offered to himself, and deeply resenting the wrongs and oppressions heaped upon his duped and suffering fellow-countrymen, he formed a plan for liberating them from that intolerable slavery to which he considered that he had contributed, in accepting, with other chieftains, the young prince Edward as his sovereign. In 1322, he took up arms, and for a time overran some parts of North Wales with irresistible impetuosity ; but at length being defeated by the English troops, he retreated into Anglesey, to his house of Tregarnedd, which he had strongly fortified, and garrisoned with his followers another strong hold, called Ynys Cevni, about three-quarters of a mile distant, in a marshy part of the sands called the Malltraeth, a spot which he contrived to insulate by surrounding it with the waters of the river Cevni. Here, after a desperate struggle, he was at last taken prisoner by a body of English, and conveyed to Rhuddlan castle, in Flintshire, where he was executed soon after. The custody of the castle of Beaumaris, together with the whole county and dominion of Anglesey, was granted by Henry IV. to the renowned Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur. During the great revolt under Owain Glyndwr, in this reign, the monks of Llanvaes priory being suspected of favouring his designs, the English monarch, on his first taking the field against the insurgents, put some of the friars to the sword, carried the rest away prisoners, and plundered the convent.

In the great civil war of the seventeenth century the inhabitants of this island distinguished themselves by their persevering attachment to the royal cause. So early as the year 1642, Beaumaris castle was garrisoned for the king by command of its constable, the Earl of Dorset. Thomas, the first Lord Bulkeley, afterwards succeeded to the constablership of the same fortress, and his son, Col. Richard Bulkeley, assisted by several other gentlemen of the county, held it for the king, until June 1646, when it was surrendered on honourable terms to General Mytton : it appears, however, to have fallen again into the hands of the royalists. In 1648, the inhabitants of the whole island rose for the purpose of aiding in the restoration of the unfortunate monarch's affairs, at the time that several diversions were made in different parts of Britain, with a view to the liberation of Charles, then a prisoner in the Isle of Wight. Resolutions were immediately drawn up ; and it was decided by a council of war that a general declaration should be published, subscribed by all the inhabitants from the age of sixteen to sixty. The words of this curious document are as follows :—" We, the inhabitants of the Isle of Anglesey, whose names are hereunto subscribed, after mature consideration, and hearty invocation of the name of God for directions and assistance, do remonstrate and declare to our fellow-subjects and neighbours, whom it may concern, that we, having, according to our bounden duty and allegiance, preserved the said island in due obedience to our most dread sovereign Lord, King Charles, during the time of this intestine war and rebellion ; and, by God's blessing upon our careful endeavours, defended the same until the enemy had over-mastered the whole kingdom (a few strong holds excepted), this being the only county of England or Wales for two months together kept entire under his Majesty's authority and command ; and being then, through the vast number of men and horse threatened to be poured in upon us (finding no possible expectance of relief), enforced to submit to the then prevailing power; do now, out of conscience towards God, and loyalty towards his anointed, with all humbleness, prostrate ourselves, our lives and fortunes, at his Majesty's feet, resolving, with the utmost exposal of all that we are, or have, to preserve the said island, together with the castle and holds therein, in due obedience to his sacred Majesty, his heirs and lawful successors, against all rebellious opposers and invaders whatsoever; and do also, with sincerity of heart, profess that we will, according to our several degrees, places, and callings, maintain the true Protestant religion by law established, his Majesty's royal prerogative, the known laws of the land, just privileges of parliament, together with our own and fellow-subjects' legal properties and liberties. And we also do farther declare and protest, that we shall and will account all those that do, or shall, stand in opposition hereunto, to be enemies and traitors to their king and country, and accordingly to be proceeded against, being most ready to contribute our best abilities for their reduction, and re-instating of our gracious sovereign (who hath long endured the tyranny and oppression of his barbarous and bloody enemies) to his rights, dominions, and dignity, according to the splendour of his most illustrious progenitors. Given under our hands the 14th day of July, 1648." This declaration immediately led to an expedition for the reduction of this island, under the command of General Mytton; and, when the parliamentary forces were descried from Beaumaris green, approaching over the mountain of Penmaen-Mawr, on the opposite side of the Menai, great demonstrations of defiance were made at the former place. However, after a slight skirmish near Cadnant with Major Hugh Pennant's troop of horse, General Mytton's forces advanced without further opposition to Orsedd Migin, where they held a rendezvous, the morning after their passage across the straits. Hence they marched immediately upon Beaumaris, by way of Red-hill Park, and drew up in order of battle upon the hill; the islanders, commanded in chief by Colonel Bulkeley, and by Colonel Roger Whitely as major-general, drawing up in the fields below the hill. A smart engagement speedily ensued, in which the royalists were defeated and put to flight, with the loss of some slain and four hundred made prisoners. The town was now closely pressed and soon taken, notwithstanding that the church was obstinately defended by a number of men who had been left locked up in it by their commander. Most of the royalist commanders retired into the castle, to which General Mytton sent a summons, demanding the bodies of the two colonels, Bulkeley and Whitely, who immediately surrendered themselves to save the effusion of blood in the slaughter of the prisoners, which was threatened in case of a refusal. Unable successfully to resist the formidable force brought against it, the garrison in the castle also capitulated on honourable terms, on the 2nd of October; and articles of agreement were drawn up and signed by the parliamentary commissioners and by those appointed for the purpose by the governor of the castle, on behalf of the inhabitants of the whole island. On the 9th of October, instruments were interchanged, in which it was stipulated that the estates of persons within the island should be relieved from sequestration, on condition of paying one twenty-fifth of their value; and that they should be permitted to compound for them at the rate of two years' income for all estates of inheritance, and for other estates in proportion. This mulct was paid by instalments, and the total amount of the money thus obtained from the island is supposed to have been about £20,000.

Anglesey is in the diocese of Bangor, and province of Canterbury; and forms an archdeaconry, which was annexed to the bishoprick by act of parliament of the 1st of James I., comprising the deaneries of Llivon and Tal y bolion, Menai and Malltraeth, and Tyndaethwy and Twrcelyn: the number of parishes is sixty-nine, of which twenty-two are rectories, four vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the six hundreds of Llyvon, Malltraeth, Menai, Tal y bolion, Twrcelyn, and Tyndaethwy. It contains the boroughs, market-towns, and sea-ports of Amlwch, Beaumaris, and Holyhead; the borough and market town of Llangvni; and the market-town of Llanerchymedd. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for the united boroughs: the county member and the member for the boroughs are elected at Beaumaris: the polling-places are Beaumaris, Holyhead, and Llangvni. This county is in the North Wales circuit: the assizes and sessions are held at Beaumaris, where stands the county gaol and house of correction: there are twenty-two acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £19,196, and the expenditure to £19,209, of which £16,006 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The exact form of this island, of which the general outline is somewhat oblong, extending in length nearly from north-west to south-east, is extremely irregular, the rocky barrier of its sea-worn shores being broken in numerous places by small bays, creeks, and other inlets: it is the only county in the principality of which the surface approximates to uniformity of character, the whole gently undulating, and there being few swells that can properly be termed hills, or hollows deserving the name of valleys. The interior being also devoid of wood, nearly all the land is enclosed, and these enclosures seldom surrounded by the lively green of quickset hedges, the whole district exhibits a very dreary aspect, and impresses the beholder at first sight with an idea of sterility, which, however, does not predominate, the land, when under proper management, being in general highly productive. The only part possessing any variety of sylvan beauty is that bordering on the Menai. Although the scenery of the island is so little interesting, yet the traveller, after proceeding a few miles from the shores of the Menai, by looking across that arm of the sea into Carnarvonshire, will obtain a splendid view of the chain of mountains which stretches through that county, and the outline of which is varied at irregular intervals by numerous diversified peaks, above all which rises the majestic Snowdon. As the spectator recedes from the Menai, the connecting links of this magnificent chain are gradually lost, and only the insulated summits of the highest mountains remain visible in the distant horizon. The high table land, called Mynydd y Tryslwyn, in the north-western part of the county, is an object of especial interest to travellers, from a part of it forming the far-famed Parys mountain, so distinguished for its mineral treasures, and which has been supposed to derive its name from one Robert Parys, a commissioner in an inquisition, in the 8th of Henry IV., to fine such of the inhabitants of Anglesey as had taken part in Owain Glyndwr's insurrection. The aspect of this elevation, rising into enormous rugged rocks of coarse aluminous shale and whitish quartz, is naturally very rude; and the romantic grandeur of its outward form has been further heightened by the vast mining operations which have penetrated its interior, yet lie open to the day like immense quarries. The most extensive tract of marsh land is that of Malldraeth, or Malltraeth, near Newborough, in the southern part of it, which is situated on the shores of a sandy creek, extending a considerable distance inland, in a north-easterly direction, and comprises about three thousand acres. Acts of parliament for enclosing it were obtained in the years 1788 and 1790, and an embankment across the lower part of it, one thousand four hundred yards long, was nearly completed, when the whole work was suddenly abandoned, and an uncommonly high tide, on the 23rd of January, 1796, added a breach, twenty roods long, to the space of about twenty roods which had been left unfinished. In this neglected state the work remained until early in the present century, when a scheme for erecting another embankment, upon a more enlarged scale and durable plan, was carried into execution, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1815, and the work was completed in 1819.

It is probable that Anglesey originally joined the main land; for near Porthaethwy, on the shores of the Menai, a line of rocks, called the Swelly rocks, juts out nearly across the channel, which are supposed to be the remains of an isthmus: in the rugged openings between them, the sea, for about an hour after the commencement of the flood tide, violently fluctuates and foams, owing to the meeting of two currents, called Pwll Ceris, which renders the passage very dangerous. Across the Menai strait there were formerly six ferries, sanctioned by authority; but this number has been reduced to five by the erection of the magnificent iron suspension bridge over the narrowest part of it, where was formerly the ferry of Porthaethwy, commonly called Bangor ferry. On the subjugation of North Wales by Edward I., the ferries became the property of the crown; but this monarch soon granted one of them, viz., that of Cadnant, to Einion, Bishop of Bangor, for christening the young prince Edward of Carnarvon: the rest continued in the possession of the crown until the time of Henry VIII., who granted four of them to Richard Giffard; and the latter, in the twenty-third year of that monarch's reign, let them on a term to William Bulkeley, from whose descendants they have since been transferred to different hands. Though the situations of these appear to have been well chosen, according to the nature of the strait, yet, owing to sand-banks, opposing tides rushing into them from each extremity, and other natural causes, the passage is not absolutely safe by any one of them, and serious accidents have occurred at each. The most southern of the five remaining ferries is that of Abermenai, opposite to Carnarvon; the next, at a distance of three miles north-eastward, is that of Tal y Voel; four miles beyond which is that of Moel y don, and, three miles further, the Menai bridge; beyond which is that of Cadnant, now removed to

Garth; and lastly the longest of all the ferries at high water, viz., that between the town of Beaumaris and Aber, in Carnarvonshire. The shores of Anglesey are studded with several small islets, of which the principal are the following; viz., that of Priestholme, Ynys Seiriol, Glannauch, or Puffin Island, separated from the easternmost extremity of the county by a deep channel about half a mile broad: it is of an oval form, about a mile long, and half a mile broad, extremely lofty, and has a precipitous shore on every side, except that which faces the promontory of Penmon, where the land is not quite so elevated: it slopes gradually from the summit to the edge of these cliffs, and forms a bold boundary on the west to the broad bay of Beaumaris. The next to this, proceeding along the northern coast of the island, is Ynys y Moelrhoniad, or "the Isle of Seals," commonly called the Skerries, situated at its northernmost extremity, in front of the village of Llanrhwydrys, and about half a league from the main land, from which it is separated by a deep and dangerous channel: its surface is composed chiefly of rocks, half covered with vegetation, and on its highest point is a lighthouse, erected about the year 1730. To this succeeds Ynys Cybi, or Holy Island, at the westernmost point of Anglesey, comprising the parishes of Holyhead and Rhôscolyn, and consisting for the most part of barren rocks and dreary sands: the channel separating it from the rest of Anglesey is narrow, and is fordable in some places at low water; and the great Irish road is carried over it by means of a noble embankment, three-quarters of a mile long. A remarkable phenomenon attends the tides on the shores of this county, more particularly in the straits of the Menai. It appears that two tides set in from the western sea, which are divided by the Isle of Anglesey, one part passing through the Menai straits, and the other through the great channel lying between Holyhead and the Irish coast. The latter tide, having to extend its influence round the greater part of the island before it can reach the north-eastern entrance of the Menai, the flow is more than an hour earlier at Carnarvon than at Beaumaris; and the water from the main sea begins to pour into the strait at Carnarvon while it is yet ebbing out of it at Beaumaris; consequently, the water in the vicinity of Carnarvon continues falling after the direction of the current is changed. In like manner the ebb commences at Carnarvon before it is high water at Beaumaris, and though the direction of the current in this case is also changed, yet it continues rising at the Menai bridge for a considerable time after it has begun to ebb at Carnarvon. These tides (the one entering the Menai from St. George's channel, and the other from the Irish sea) meet at a place near Beaumaris, called Taraw Point.

The climate of this county, owing to the sea-breezes which constantly blow over it, and the greater uniformity of its surface, is milder and less boisterous, and the snow lies upon the ground a shorter time, than in the neighbouring counties. But, from the same causes, it is incommoded with frequent mists in the autumn, during which damp season the inhabitants are subject to intermittent fevers: still they are in general healthy and long-lived. The soils, though various, are for the most part fertile: they consist chiefly of the following kinds, viz., a friable mould; a shallow soil on light sand; a coarse healthy soil on hard rock; a quick warm soil, invigorated by marl; a reddish and stiffish loam; and a black peaty earth; under which there are generally beds of peat, forming useful turbaries. There is also an abundance of marly soils, lying in contiguity with the ranges of limestone hereafter described. The reddish loams are of excellent quality, and lie near the shores of the Menai, in the vicinity of Llanidan: the light soils, consisting of various admixtures of sandy loam, rounded pebbles, gravel, peat, &c., occupy the greater part of the island, and are best adapted for the culture of barley, peas, turnips, &c.: free loams, of a rather better quality than the latter, are found in different parts of the interior.

The agriculture of the county has much improved since smuggling, which was formerly carried on by the inhabitants to an amazing extent, has been nearly suppressed by the vigilance of the government; but the greater part of the island still presents a mixed aspect of wildness and cultivation, excepting a few scattered farms, which are managed under superior systems. Of the enclosed lands, which occupy nearly the whole of its surface, about an eleventh part is actually under tillage; and of this quantity, about one-fourth is annually sown with oats, and the remainder with barley and wheat, in equal proportions. The rotations of crops are various, but the white corn crops of oats and barley are too frequently taken in unvaried succession, or alternately with each other, for five or six years. The average produce of oats is only from four to six times the amount of seed sown, although sometimes, under superior management, as much as from fifteen to sixteen: the produce of barley is very various; and that of wheat averages no more than that of oats, although some farmers obtain from eight to ten times the quantity sown. The cultivation of peas, which used formerly to be considerable, is now greatly diminished; and beans are hardly ever seen; but there is no part of North Wales where potatoes are cultivated so well and so extensively as in this island. Turnips were first introduced as an agricultural crop in 1765, and their culture has been since gradually increasing in extent: in 1797, there were about fifty acres under turnips, of which only seven were drilled. Anglesey is distinguished for a native species of this root, which is a small, yellow, garden turnip, called in the adjacent county of Carnarvon Maip sir Von. A few small patches of land are occasionally sown with hemp. The artificial grasses are of the ordinary kinds. Burnet grows naturally on the limestone hills near Llanidan, bordering on the Menai; and the plantago maritima, or narrow-leaved sea plantain, is found wild on different parts of the sea-shore: the latter tastes like samphire, is very succulent, and is eagerly eaten by sheep. Anglesey contains nearly one hundred and fifty thousand acres of meadows and pastures, of which the natural produce is in general of a fine quality, great quantities of hay seeds being annually conveyed from it as far as the hilly parts of Denbighshire and Merionethshire. The grass lands are almost exclusively devoted to the rearing of cattle, to be sold lean to the graziers of other districts having richer pastures, where they are fattened for different places requiring a large supply: lean cattle, therefore, constitute one of its chief articles of export. The dairies are so few and on so small a scale as hardly to supply the consumption of the island; nor, indeed, is the cheese made in it of good quality, for, to supply the want of that richness of which the milk is robbed for the sake of making butter, the curds are so saturated with rennet as to make it quite spongy. The extraordinary manures are various and valuable. Lime is extensively used within a convenient distance of those parts of the island where it is burned; and sea-weed, or sea-thong, and the fucus of various kinds, are collected on the shores after storms, and spread on the fields to be immediately ploughed in, or made into composts with various other manures. But that for which Anglesey is more particularly distinguished is the shell-sand found on different parts of its coasts, but of the best quality in the Traeth Coch, or Red Wharf bay, in the eastern part of its northern shores; that which is obtained at this place contains about two-thirds, and from that to four-fifths, of decayed shells: it is carried to every part of the island in carts and waggons, is generally laid upon the land about an inch thick, and if its fertilizing particles are not suddenly washed away by violent rains, it enriches the soil for ten or twelve years. The first time this shell-sand is known to have been used as a manure was in 1645, by the Rev. Thomas Williams, rector of Llansadwrn; but at present, besides the extensive consumption of it in the island, great quantities are annually shipped coastwise to Denbighshire and Flintshire. Both the shell-sand and the sea-weeds are preferred to lime upon lands that have been for some time under cultivation. The plough in most common use is of the large old kind, which was universally used in North Wales prior to the introduction of the lighter Lummas plough, about the year 1760: the mould-board is a plain plank, which turns the split over by its extreme length; and by the holder pressing much on the left handle, its nether edge forms an acute angle with a line parallel to the surface of the soil, by which means a feather-edged split is formed, which, in ley grounds, does not afford a sufficient depth of mould for the harrow: the surface resting on the ground from the heel to the point of the share is four feet long, and the friction occasioned by this large surface requires great force to overcome it.

In this county, where the rearing of cattle is in most cases the farmer's principal object, and the dairy is almost entirely neglected, the calves are not weaned until they arrive at double the age at which they are commonly weaned in other counties. This partly accounts for the bull-like appearance of the oxen about the head and dewlap; but it is a received opinion that they are hardier on that account, and may be kept on coarser pasture. The characteristics of the choice Anglesey oxen, commonly called (from their small size and peculiar appearance) runts, are (says the Rev. W. Davies, in his View of the Agriculture of North Wales,) the same in most points with those of the Roman oxen described by Columella. Their colour is coal black, with white appendages: they have remarkably broad ribs, high and wide hips, deep chest, large dewlap, flat face, and long horns turning upwards: their average weight, when fat, at three or four years old, is from eight to eleven score lb. per quarter. These deep-chested and short-legged oxen are much esteemed by the graziers for their aptness to fatten; but they are not quite so well adapted for draught. Anglesey is distinguished for its sheep, which are the largest native breed in North Wales, weighing, according as they are variously fed, from ten to sixteen lb. per quarter, and sometimes as much as eighteen lb.: they have black legs and faces, and are generally without horns; but whether they were originally from the same stock as the present small sheep of the county of Carnarvon, and attained their present superiority in size from a milder climate and better pasturage, or are a foreign species brought over at some remote period from Ireland, cannot now be ascertained. They bear a fleece weighing from one lb. and three-quarters to two lb. and a half; and are shorn about the middle of May, or early in June: some are shorn twice a year. Several experimental farmers have introduced other breeds from England. Great numbers of hogs were formerly bred in this county for the English markets, but since the establishment of steam-boats from Dublin to Liverpool, which has caused the importation of great numbers to the latter place from Ireland, this practice has declined. The native breed of horses is but of an inferior description, and their natural awkwardness and want of symmetry is further increased by the universal custom of fettering them, as well as the sheep; a practice which is rendered necessary owing to the want of proper fences. Tender furze, bruised with mallets, or ground in mills erected for the purpose, used formerly to be a chief article of fodder for horses, and the farmers were then accustomed to sow furze, and sometimes to let the crop at a certain price per acre, in which case it was frequently more profitable than a crop of wheat; but this system is now abandoned. Rabbits are very numerous in some places in the vicinity of the sea-coast, where the sandy soil favours their burrowing, more especially near the ruins of the monastery of Llanddwyn. Seals are frequently seen on the shores of this island. The water-rail is a constant visitor of Anglesey early in the spring; and that rare quatic bird, the shag, sometimes makes its appearance on the shore near Holyhead. The horticulture of the county presents nothing remarkable, except that sea-kale, which grows in abundance on the coasts, has in some places been introduced into gardens, and is found an excellent substitute for asparagus, being also somewhat earlier in the spring.

Anglesey is said to have been anciently called the dark or shady island, in allusion to its thick groves of wood; but at present its woodlands are almost wholly confined to a narrow slip along the Menai; and even here, great numbers of the trees, sinking beneath the force of the western blasts, which sweep over them loaded with saline particles, have a stunted and blighted appearance. Lord Boston, however, has some considerable woods at Lligwy, in the parish of Penrhôs Lligwy; and a few plantations have been made on different estates, and have flourished, with the exception of those trees immediately exposed to the westerly winds, which are always gradually destroyed. Wherever a few trees occur in the hedge-rows, they are invariably much inclined towards the north-east by the violent winds from the opposite quarter. At the commencement of the present century the amount of waste land was between twelve and thirteen thousand acres, from which must now be deducted the whole extent of Malltraeth marsh, which has been embanked and enclosed: of this amount, nine thousand acres, including Malltraeth marsh, are level and highly improvable. The principal unenclosed tract on the uplands is Talwrn-Mawr, an extensive and continuous chain of wastes, intermixed with old enclosures, and running through the greater part of the county. The surface of the unenclosed level wastes is continually pared by the poor inhabitants for fuel. Some of the flat lands lying adjacent to the sea are covered with drifting sands, more especially those near the southernmost extremity of the county. Anglesey being comparatively destitute of coal, peat, and wood, the inhabitants are chiefly supplied with coal brought coastwise from Flintshire and Lancashire, which being sold at a high price, the poor are frequently unable to purchase it, and are thus compelled to collect the dried dung of cattle from the moors and fields, to the great injury of the soil, and the paring of the surface of sound waste land. The Anglesey Agricultural Society was established in the year 1808.

The mineral productions are of great variety and importance; but the geology of the island, which is also interesting, has received but very little illustration. The prevailing rock may be said to be clay-slate, but granite occurs in a small spot near its centre; and on its south-eastern and north-eastern sides there is an abundance of limestone and gritstone, which in some places are accompanied by a few thin and poor strata of coal. The immense produce of the island in copper is wholly obtained from the Parys mountain mine and the Mona mine, which are in fact only portions of the same mine, distinguished under these two names to mark the possessions of two different proprietors, and situated in the northern part of the island, in the vicinity of Amlwch, a town which entirely owes its elevation from the rank of an inconsiderable fishing village to the discovery and extensive working of the mineral treasures of the neighbouring high ground of Tryslwyn, in which these mines are contained. There is abundant reason to suppose that copper-ore was procured and smelted here at a very remote period; but the main stratum, after several unsuccessful attempts, was discovered only on the 2nd of March, 1768, the anniversary of which day was for many years kept as a festival by the miners. This mass is in some places more than three hundred feet thick, and lies in vast clusters, commonly called stock works. Both the mines are situated on this grand vein, which has numerous branches, and is worked, not, as in other mines, by means of subterranean excavations, but open to the day, in the manner of a quarry; the reason of which is, that the chief substance of the mountain itself consists of copper-ore. The matrix of this ore is a dark-coloured petrosilex, over which lie strata of aluminous schistus, and a yellow earth containing ores of lead: in many places the ore is immediately covered by a thin stratum of red shale and ochre: the various strata, thus bounding the ore, dip in general towards the north, at an angle of about forty-five degrees. The ore consists chiefly of the yellow sulphate of copper, the richest of which generally contains twenty-five per cent. of metal, and the same amount of sulphur, while the remainder consists wholly of refuse. The worst ore yields nearly the same quantity of sulphur, for which it is chiefly worked, but produces only from one and a quarter to two per cent. of copper. These mines also produce black ore, consisting of copper mixed with galena, calamine, and a little silver; malachite, or green and blue carbonate of copper; native copper, though in very small quantities; sulphate of copper, crystallized and in solution; sulphate of lead in considerable quantities, containing a tolerably large portion of silver; and native sulphur. Although these ores are not equal in richness to those obtained in Cornwall, yet they are rendered of immense value by their abundance and the facility with which they are worked. As the greater part of the ore consists of sulphate of copper, the roasting of it for the sake of the sulphur forms a considerable branch of its manufacture. The regulus of copper, which collects itself, during the process of roasting, into a globule in the centre of the ore, is separated from the rest by breaking the latter, and then sent to be smelted. The amount of ore annually raised, and thus manufactured at Amlwch, is estimated at about sixteen thousand tons. Towards the close of the last century, when the Parys and Mona mines were most prosperous, the quantity of available ore annually procured amounted to no less than thirty thousand tons, the raising of which afforded employment to fifteen hundred men. The works afterwards declining, the number of men gradually decreased, so as, in the year 1809, not to exceed six hundred, the remainder having emigrated to Liverpool and other places; but the concern having some years afterwards gradually and materially improved, the number of workmen has increased in proportion, and now amounts to upwards of fourteen hundred, who are employed in the different departments of these extensive and important works. The finest metal obtained is that from the sulphate of copper held in solution in the vitriolic waters, which, by pumps and other machinery, are raised from the mines into large cisterns, about two feet deep, some square and others oblong, into which are thrown quantities of old iron, brought from different parts of the country, and shipped for the most part at London and Liverpool; and the supposed transmutation of iron into copper, which this mineral water is so remarkable for producing, immediately commences. By the laws of elective attraction, as it is termed by the chemists, the sulphuric acid, having greater affinity with, and stronger attraction to, iron than copper, lets go the latter, which is precipitated to the bottom of the cisterns in the form of a ponderous muddy sediment, of a yellowish colour, and attaches itself to the iron, which it dissolves and retains in solution in the same manner as it at first did the copper. When this change in the circumstances of the two metals is completed, the acid menstruum containing the iron is drawn from the cisterns, and received into other pits on a lower level, leaving the precipitate of copper behind, which is collected together, dried on the kilns, and smelted. One ton of iron will precipitate from its solution an equal weight of copper mud, which, when smelted, produces twelve hundred-weight of the purest copper. The only value of the sulphate of iron in the lower pits is at present derived from its deposition of yellow ochre, which is refined, dried, and shipped off for the use of painters. "Nature," as Mr. Pennant observes, "has been profuse in bestowing her mineral favours on this spot;" for besides the above, together with an ore of zinc, which, after being properly prepared, is sent off to London, there is found, above the copper-ore, and about three-quarters of a yard beneath the surface soil, a bed of yellowish greasy clay, from one to four yards thick, containing a large proportion of lead, of which metal one ton of it yields from six hundred to one thousand lb. weight, containing no less than fifty-seven ounces of silver per ton: this is smelted at extensive works erected for the purpose.

Next to Flintshire and Denbighshire, Anglesey claims the third place among the counties of North Wales possessing coal mines. The coal strata have all the usual accompaniments of that mineral, except iron-stone; but hitherto only a small profit has been derived either to the proprietors or the public from working them, which has been attempted only on the borders of the Malltraeth marsh, and between the small rivers Braint and Caint. In the former place were found,—first, sand to the depth of five feet; secondly, freestone for the next sixty-six feet; thirdly, black shale, for a further depth of six feet; fourthly, a bed of good coal, three feet and a half thick; fifthly, indurated clunch, two feet deep; and lastly, freestone to an unknown depth. In the latter occurred—first, peat; then, gravel; next, clay; and lastly, coal metal, as the workmen term it, that is, shaly clunch, having tumblers of coal interspersed with it in irregular masses, some of which were of several tons weight: but having reached this, the work became flooded, and was abandoned after being carried, at a great expense, to the depth of one hundred and twenty feet. It has been stated, as a discouraging symptom in boring for coal in this island, that its strata dip almost perpendicularly; but the inclination of the three feet and a half coal, near the Malltraeth, appears to be only one yard in ten, which is towards the east by south; and the concomitants of coal, freestone, and limestone, appear in nearly horizontal strata, in several parts of the island. The vast limestone ranges of Denbighshire and Flintshire, which also form the Great Orme's Head, in Carnarvonshire, are continued from this latter point, under the bay of Beaumaris, to the easternmost extremity of the island, whence they extend, in the same north-westerly direction, along the sea-coast to Dulas, and thence beyond Amlwch to Cemmaes and the northernmost parts of the county. From several points of this range ramifications extend quite into the interior of the island, and, in some instances, even entirely across it, as from Llugwy to Llanfinnan and Llangevni; and from Penmon, at its easternmost extremity, along the shores of the Menai, where it appears at Plâs Newydd and Llanidan. From the latter place a line of insulated limestone rocks is continued in the same direction by Trêvdraeth, Bôdwrog, and Llanvaethlu. Between these two lines are quarries of millstone, and some inferior kinds of grit-stone; and between the south-western part of the latter and the bay of Carnarvon is found a much finer kind of freestone: some of the limestone strata are of the kind called terras limestone. Anglesey contains a great abundance and considerable variety of marbles, some of which are excellently adapted for sculpture and ornamental architecture. White marble is found at Llangwyvan; blue-veined grey marble and blue-veined white marble at Cemmaes, near Amlwch; black, grey, and mottled brown marbles on the northern coast, between Traeth Côch, and Moelvre Point, which are in considerable demand, to be manufactured for sepulchral monuments and architectural ornaments; and asbestine marble near Cemlyn bay, in the parish of Llanvairynghornwy, which is intersected by narrow veins of a remarkably white incombustible substance, of a silky appearance, which, from its brittle nature, renders the stone in which it is enclosed unsusceptible of a very high polish. A green marble is found near Rhôscolyn, in Holy Island, which contains a green amianthus, or brittle asbestos; and unripe asbestos, of a waved schistose appearance, occurs in different parts of the county, more especially on the shores of the Menai, from Bangor ferry to Maes y Porth, opposite to Carnarvon. Serpentine is found at Maes y Porth and at Cemmaes. This island also produces different kinds of potters' clay, both white and yellow. Fullers' earth, both white and of a dusky colour, is found in small quantities at Mynydd y Twr, near Holyhead; as also is a peculiar kind of soponaceous argil. In the vicinity of Amlwch is found a kind of earth, remarkable for yielding two-thirds of pure magnesia. Steatite, or soap rock, occurs both at Mynydd y Twr, and in the vicinity of Llanvairynghornwy. Three kinds of marl are found in this county, adjacent to its limestone rocks: these are distinguished according to their different colours, which are red, grey, and white: pits of the two former are known to be as much as two hundred years old; and the white marl, at Llanddvyndan, was discovered about the year 1652, by some of the parliamentary soldiers then stationed in Anglesey. Barytes, united with vitriolic acid, and tinged with red, occurs at Llangeinwen.

The manufactures, excepting those of the mineral productions at Amlwch and in its vicinity, are very inconsiderable. Many of the inhabitants buy quantities of the coarse wool of the mountainous districts of Carnarvonshire at the fairs of Carnarvon and Bangor, and manufacture it, intermixed with a proportion of the native wool of the island, into cloths of a deep blue, flannels, blankets, &c., entirely for home consumption; and these manufactures are facilitated by a few carding and spinning machines erected in different places. Most of the remaining wool is disposed of to the Yorkshire clothiers at Chester fair. It appears that Anglesey was in ancient times a place of much commercial importance; and its exports are still of great value, consisting of copper, sulphur, yellow ochre, zinc, and lead; shell-sand, for manure; barley and oats in productive seasons; and cattle, sheep and hogs. The number of cattle annually sent to the English market has been variously estimated, but, according to the best authority, it averages about eight thousand, of which nine hundred are yearlings, two thousand one hundred of two years old, and five thousand of three years old and upwards. Before the erection of the grand suspension bridge over the Menai, the numerous herds purchased here were compelled to swim in droves across that strait, and although numbers of the weaker sort were sometimes swept down by the force of the current, a distance of several miles, yet losses were seldom experienced. The annual exportation of sheep to the English markets is from five to seven thousand, and of hogs about one thousand. The chief imports, besides the ordinary supplies of foreign articles, are corn and coal. An extensive illicit trade was formerly carried on by the inhabitants, more especially in the several narrow sandy coves between the rocks on the southern coast of the island, so well adapted for receiving small vessels unobserved by the revenue officers; but this has long been nearly annihilated by the vigilant measures of the government. The natural harbours are numerous, and some of them have been much improved by art. Beaumaris, near the easternmost extremity of the island, has a good harbour: the custom-house at this place is not only the controlling office to the different other ports of the island, but also to all those of North Wales, from the Point of Air, at the mouth of the Dee, to Aberdovey, at the southernmost extremity of the coast. To the north of Beaumaris is Traeth Côch, or Red Wharf bay, which is of considerable extent, and receives the waters of the small river Torryd, but is too much exposed to winds from the north-east, an inconvenience which can only be removed by the erection of a pier. Two leagues further along the northern shore of the county is Dulas bay, at the mouth of the Dulas river, which is narrow at the entrance, and obstructed by fragments of rock. Proceeding round St. Elian's Point is Amlwch, where, by excavating a vast rock, a harbour has been formed, about two hundred and fifty yards long and forty wide, capable of containing thirty vessels, of from one hundred to three hundred tons' burden each, which are chiefly employed in the copper trade. Cemlyn, or Crooked Pool bay, in the northernmost part of the island, might, at a little expense, be rendered a safe port. Holyhead, which, being only twenty leagues from Dublin, has been selected as the station for the Irish packets, had naturally a good port for the reception of small vessels, formed by some cliffs, on the summit of which stands the church of that town, and by a small island, called Ynys Cybi, on which stands a lighthouse: this was rendered more commodious at the expense of government. Aberfraw has a small harbour, capable of admitting vessels of thirty tons' burden, which is susceptible of great improvement, as also is that of Malltraeth, situated between Aberfraw and the south-western entrance to the Menai, at the mouth of the small river Cevenny, or Cevni. Beaumaris is a place of considerable resort for the purpose of sea-bathing. The waters immediately surrounding the shores of Anglesey abound with various kinds of fish, namely cod, turbot, soles, plaice, herrings, whittings, crabs, lobsters, and oysters of different kinds. The crabs and oysters are remarkably abundant and excellent: the former are chiefly taken on the rocky coasts in the vicinities of Llanddwyn, Rhôscolyn, Holyhead, and Penmon, where they are found at low water, hidden under stones amongst the sea-weed left by the previous tide. The large kind of oysters found in the channel at the eastern extremity of the county, which separates the little island of Priestholme from the main land of Anglesey, are in great esteem, under the name of "Penmon oysters," and great quantities are annually pickled, packed in neat small casks, and exported to different parts of the kingdom. This channel is also remarkable as the abode of different peculiar species of fish, among which the Beaumaris shark, the Anglesey morris, and the trifurcated hake, are most worthy of notice: here are also found several rare species of muscle. Various kinds of beautiful shells are taken by the dredgers for oysters in this channel, and in Red Wharf bay. The cliffs of Priestholme island produce abundance of samphire, the gathering of which, together with the eggs of the sea-fowl, forms a hazardous employment, which is followed by many of the hardy islanders: the south-western end of the same island also abounds with the smyrnium olusatrum, or Alexanders, which, when boiled, afford a salutary repast for sailors just arrived from long voyages.

Anglesey is wholly devoid of inland navigation, natural or artificial; but it is pleasingly watered by twelve small streams, which flow from the gentle elevations of the interior in various directions to the sea, among the principal of which are the Cevenny, or Cevni, the Alan, the Fraw, and the Dulas. This island having long been the grand thoroughfare to Ireland, and possessing an abundance of excellent materials for making and mending the roads, these mediums of communication received great improvement in this county, as early as in any other of the principality; and at present the Irish mail road, which runs the whole length of the island, from the shores of the Menai to Holyhead, as also the roads connecting the principal towns and villages, are in good repair. Early in the present century, Lord Bulkeley formed an excellent road, at his own expense, along the beautiful shore of the Menai, from Bangor ferry to Beaumaris; and various other important public improvements and alterations have since taken place, among which may be noticed the erection of the superb suspension bridge over the Menai in the vicinity of Bangor. Great alterations were also made, early in the present century, in the mail coach route from Bangor to Holyhead, by which the distance was reduced from twenty-five to twenty-one miles, and several fatiguing ascents avoided. The mail coach roads from London to Holyhead, by Chester and Shrewsbury respectively, uniting near Bangor, enter this county over the Menai bridge, and take nearly a direct course by the Mona Inn to Holyhead, the station for the Irish packets, which sail regularly thence to Dublin, a distance of twenty leagues: near the bridge a road branches off in a north-eastern direction to Beaumaris.

The remains of antiquity are numerous and of great interest. In ancient times Anglesey formed, as before mentioned, a chief place of refuge for the Druids, when expelled from their former abodes by the progress of the Roman arms, and various memorials of that remote period of its history are yet visible. The parishes of Llanedwen, Llanddaniel Vab, and Llanidan, on the borders of the Menai, include a district abounding with remains indicative of its having been a scene of Druidical worship, which Mr. Rowlands, in his "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," attempts to prove was the principal seat of the religious rites of the Druids, and contained the residence of the arch-druid. Among the monuments now existing are two cromlechs, standing contiguous to each other, in the park of Plâs Newydd, the seat of the Marquis of Anglesey, one of which is said to be the largest in the island, the table stone being about thirteen feet long, eleven broad, and four thick. At a little distance is a large carnedd, which, on being opened, was found to contain various singular rude apartments; and at Bôdowyr, in the same vicinity, is a remarkable cromlech, the table stone of which, resting upon three strong supporters, is seven feet long, six broad, and six thick. At Tre'-vry are some small traces of stone circles; but the most remarkable monument of this period yet existing, and around which these and some smaller remains of Druidical antiquity are scattered, is that which has been supposed to be the seat of the arch-druid, at a place called Tre'r Dryw: this, called by Mr. Rowlands the Brein Gwŷn, or royal tribunal, is a circular hollow, one hundred and eighty feet in diameter, surrounded by an immense rampart of loose stones, evidently brought hither from a distance: it has only a single entrance, and near it are the remains of a circle of stones, with a cromlech in the midst, and of a gorsedd, or great copped heap of stones, all extremely imperfect: two of the stones of the circle are very large; one, which at present serves for the end of a house, being twelve feet seven inches high, and eight feet broad; while another, yet standing, is eight feet high, and twenty-three feet in circumference. Various other cromlechs are seen in different parts of the island. A very large one is situated in the grounds of Llugwy, in the parish of Penrhôs Llugwy, where are also several Druidical circles, nearly contiguous to each other, comprising numerous upright stones: the table stone of the cromlech is of a rhomboidal form, seventeen feet and a half long, fifteen feet broad, and four feet thick, supported by several upright stones at the height of only two feet from the ground. In a field near the seat called Presaddvedd, in the western part of the island, are two large cromlechs, one yet standing, the other fallen, the table stones of which are about thirteen feet long and nine broad. Near Pentraeth are two small stones standing upright, at the distance of about fifty feet from each other; and another similar one lies prostrate at a short distance: the whole are supposed to have once formed some Druidical monument.

The remains of Roman antiquity discovered in Anglesey are few and inconsiderable. On the summit of Gwydryn hill is a semicircular fortification, called Caer Idris, or Castell Idris, consisting of a triple fosse and vallum, which is also thought to have been of British origin, but to have been afterwards occupied by the Romans. Various remains of fortifications, in which the discriminative peculiarities of Roman workmanship are visible, are yet left standing in the vicinity of Holyhead, among which may be specified the massive walls which nearly surround the churchyard, in the form of a parallelogram, at one corner of which is a circular bastion tower; a long dry wall, twelve feet high, and in many places regularly faced, which runs along the side of the hill called Pen Caer Cybi; and Caer twr, a circular building on the summit of the same elevation, supposed by Mr. Pennant to be the ruins of a pharos, or lighthouse. At Tan y Cevn, on the river Braint, and in the neighbourhood of the great assemblage of Druidical remains above-mentioned, are two large quadrangular intrenchments, nearly contiguous to each other; and Caerleib, or "the moated intrenchment," in the same vicinity, is also of a square form, having a double fosse and vallum, and comprising within its area the foundations of various buildings, both circular and angular. At a place called Castell, between Llanerchymedd and Tregayan, coins of several Roman emperors have been found. In the parish of Llanvlewyn were dug up, about the commencement of the present century, three golden bracelets and a Roman bulla of the same metal; and near Aberfraw have been frequently found the amulets called gleiniau nadroedd, or "snake gems," supposed to have been manufactured by the Romans, and given to the superstitious Britons in exchange for the commodities of their country. On a precipitous hill, called Bwrdd Arthur, or "Arthur's Round Table," in the vicinity of Llangoed, are vestiges of an ancient fortification, surrounded by two lofty ramparts of loose stones, and called Din, or Dinas Sylwy: within the area are the foundations of oval buildings. About a mile from the village of Monachtŷ, or Mynachdŷ, are two circular encampments, formed by single ditches and ramparts, and commonly called Castell Crwn; and another British fortification, called Craig y Ddinas, is situated on a rocky eminence on the sea-shore of the parish of Llanvair-Pwllgwŷnyll. Tregarnedd, a farm-house in the parish of Llangvni, derives its name from an immense carnedd, or piled heap of stones, surrounded by a circle of upright stones: beneath are numerous hollow passages, formed by flat flag-stones laid upon others placed edgewise. In a deep gully leading from Llanddona church to the sea-shore are two round tumuli, supposed by Mr. Pennant to have been thrown up by the Danes for the protection of their vessels, which were often moored in Red Wharf bay, on this part of the coast. About a mile from Monachtŷ also are three of those large upright stones commonly called meini hirion, which stand at the distance of about five hundred yards from each other, the intermediate space forming nearly an equilateral triangle; and another, called Llêch-gynvarwydd, stands on an eminence near the church of that name. In the centre of Penmon park, near Beaumaris, stands a very ancient British cross, curiously and richly sculptured.

At the period of the Reformation there were, at Penmon, a priory of Benedictine monks, and at Holyhead a college of prebendaries: at Llanvaes a house of Franciscan friars was existing in the reign of Henry V. There are yet extensive remains of Penmon priory, and part of the ancient conventual church at present serves as the parochial church: the round arches by which the architecture of this edifice is distinguished, and which in England are regarded as evidences of the Saxon or early Norman erection of the buildings in which they are found, are in this instance supposed to be of ancient British construction. The chapel of Llanvaes priory is now used as an outhouse to the seat of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart.; and near the centre of Priestholme island, or Ynys Seiriol, amidst the scattered vestiges of other buildings, is an ancient tower, supposed to have formed part of a religious house, a cell to the neighbouring priory of Penmon. Most of the seventy-four parishes of this island have their churches situated near the sea-shore, and some of them are so placed as to oblige their ministers to regulate the time of divine service according to the state of the tide, which at high water completely surrounds them: such is the case with that of Llangwyvan, on the western side of the island, and with that of Llandysillio, on the shore of the Menai. The churches most distinguished for architectural curiosity are, St. Mary's, at Beaumaris, a handsome edifice; that of Holyhead; and that of Llaniestyn, celebrated for containing a tomb of remarkably curious workmanship and very remote antiquity: that of Llaneilian is distinguished for its handsome tower and spire, of which appendages most of the churches of Anglesey are destitute, having simply at the west end a small turret, with an arched aperture, in which is hung a single bell. Almost the only ruins of any mural fortress at present existing are those of Beaumaris castle, which are very grand and extensive. Vestiges of a small fort of Norman erection are, however, yet visible at the back of a farm-house at Castell Aber Llieniog, near the sea-shore in the vicinity of Beaumaris. The most remarkable old mansions are Tre'r Castell, in the same vicinity, now occupied as a farm-house; Bôdychan, about half-way between the Menai bridge and Holyhead, now used as a barn; Penmynnedd, near the centre of the island; and Court Mawr, in Beaumaris. Some trifling remains of the ancient royal palace of the princes of North Wales, at Aberfraw, are yet shown in the walls of a barn at that place. The seats of more modern date most worthy of notice are, Plâs Newydd, the residence of the Marquis of Anglesey; Baron Hill, that of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart.; Bôdorgan, that of O. P. Meyrick, Esq.; Cadnant, that of J. Price, Esq.; Fryars, that of Lady Williams; Henllŷs, that of J. H. Hampton Lewis, Esq.; Llanddvyddan, that of Mrs. Lewis; Llangoed, that of the Rev. R. J. Hughes; Llanidan, that of Lord Boston; Llwydiarth, that of W. P. Lloyd, Esq.; Plâs Côch, that of Sir W. Bulkeley Hughes; Plâs Gwŷn, that of B. Panton, Esq.; Presaddved, that of Captain King; Red Hill, that of W. W. Sparrow, Esq.; Trêgayan, that of Admiral Llwyd; and Trê-Iorwerth, that of the Rev. H. W. Jones. A few of the farm-houses and their offices are particularly well built and commodious, but the greater number is of an inferior description; and the cottages are generally of the most wretched appearance. Quickset hedges, as well as timber, flourish on the shores of the Menai; but in the interior the vast expanse of horizon, without any interruption from woods or hedges, is wearisome to the eye: there the common fences are banks of sods, about four feet and a half high, with a ditch on each side. Dry stone walls are not uncommonly used to form enclosures on the larger estates; and of late years great progress has been made in the raising of quickset hedges, notwithstanding the antiquated opinion of its impracticability. Furze is sometimes sown on the banks, and both hawthorn sets and furze seed are imported from Ireland. The common household bread is made of barley or oats. Servants hired by the year generally commence their term of service on the 1st of May. Anglesey confers the title of marquis on the noble family of Paget, the present marquis having been raised to that dignity on the 23rd of June, 1815, in acknowledgment of the bravery and heroism which distinguished his military career during the late continental war.

ARDDR (ARDDAU), a township in the parish of LLANBEDR, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Llanrwst, containing, with the township of Dôl y Garrog, 158 inhabitants. The township of the ancient lordship of Arddr, including a part of the extra-parochial demesne of Maenan Abbey, situate between the rivers Dôlgarrog and Dulyn, maintains its own poor, by a regulation lately entered into by the parishioners.

ARGOED, a joint township with YSTRAD, in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing, with the market-town of Trêgaton, 655 inhabitants. The name signifies a sheltered position among woods, which, with Ystrad, a dale, is descriptive of the situation of these two townships in the vale of the Teivy. The market town of Trêgaton occupies the banks of the Berwyn, near its junction with the river Teivy, in this township.

ARTHOG CHAPEL, a hamlet in the township of CREGENNAN, parish of LLANGELYNIN, hundred of TALYBONT and MOUDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Dôlgelley. The population is returned with the parish. This place is situated on the road from Dôlgelley to Llwyngwrl, and on the south side of the river Maw, or Mawddach, near the influx of which into Barmouth bay is an extensive turbary, or peat moss, where a great quantity of peat is dug, and conveyed in small boats down the river to Barmouth, and up to Llanelltyd, whence it is sent in carts to Dôlgelley and its neighbourhood, for fuel. Arthog, a modern mansion in the later style of English architecture, is pleasantly situated on rising ground, well sheltered by hills, the sides of which are adorned with plantations, and their summits command extensive and pleasing views, particularly of the sea-port and bay of Barmouth, and the vale of Mawddach, as far as Dôlgelley: in the grounds there is a highly picturesque waterfall, called Avon Cregennan. A chapel was erected here, about twenty-five years ago, at the expense of two successive proprietors of the Arthog estate, the living of which is a donative, in the patronage of Reginald Fowden, Esq., the present owner. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, to which a Sunday school is attached.

Arms.

ASAPH (ST.), a city and parish, partly in the hundreds of ISDULAS and YALE, county of DENBIGH, but chiefly in the Rhuddlan division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 15 miles (W. by N.) from Flint, 18 (N. W. by W.) from Mold, and 218 (N. W.) from London, containing 3144 inhabitants.

The hill upon which the upper part of the city is built, and the township in which the cathedral church is situated, are called Brÿn-Paulin; from which circumstance, corroborated by the peculiar adaptation of the spot for a military station, and from its position between two rivers, the proximity of an exploratory post on the brow of the hill called Bron y Wylva, or "the watch hill," and the discovery of numerous Roman coins, it is by some writers supposed to have been occupied by the Roman forces under Suetonius Paulinus, either in advancing to the conquest of the Isle of Mona, now Anglesey, or on their rapid return to subdue the revolted Britons under Boadicea. The city, which was originally called Llan Elwy, derived its origin and name from the erection of a church on the bank of the river Elwy by St. Kentigern, commonly called St. Mungo by the Scottish historians, bishop of Glasgow, and primate of Scotland, who, about the middle of the sixth century, being compelled to quit his see by a pagan prince of that country, fled for refuge into this part of North Wales, where he was kindly received by Caswallon, uncle of Maelgwyn Gwynedd, then sovereign of this country, who assigned to him the pleasant tract between the rivers Elwy and Clwyd, the site of the present city. On this spot Kentigern built a church of wood, and laid the foundation of an extensive monastery, similar to that established at Bangor Iscoed, which so rapidly increased, that, during the time he presided over it, it is said to have contained not less than nine hundred and sixty-five brethren, of whom part devoted themselves to religious instruction and the performance of the services of the church, and the remainder to labour and secular pursuits. Maelgwyn, whose seat of government was then at Deganwy, on the river Conway, about eighteen miles distant, was at first opposed to this growing establishment; but he became reconciled to it, and Kentigern having converted Prince Maglocunus to the Christian faith, he allowed it to be elevated into an episcopal see, which he endowed with several lordships, and invested with many privileges and immunities. On the death of the prince by whom Kentigern had been expelled from North Britain, his successor Roderic, King of the Strath-Clyde Britons, recalled that prelate to his original charge, and reinstated him in the dignities of which he had been deprived: the latter then appointed Asaph, or Hassaph, his successor in the see of Llan Elwy, which from him subsequently obtained the appellation of St. Asaph, by which it has since been known. Asaph, who was a native of North Wales, and eminently distinguished for his piety, dying in 596, was buried in the cathedral church, which had been probably rebuilt of stone during his prelate: he was subsequently canonized, and his memory was held in such veneration, that the circumstance of his remains having been deposited in the cathedral contributed greatly to its subsequent prosperity, and to the high character for sanctity which it afterwards attained. The history of this see, which includes all events of importance connected with the city, is involved in considerable obscurity. Its situation near the marches exposed the latter to the frequent attacks of hostile armies, by which it was often ravaged; and its being also a barrier, on the line of demarcation between the sovereignties of North Wales and Powys, made it frequently an object of contention in the intestine wars among the native chieftains, by whom it was alternately laid waste. From these causes the records of the successors of Asaph, during a period of nearly five hundred years, are, with the exception only of a few incidents obtained from other sources, entirely lost; and during the long interval from the death of Asaph until the Norman Conquest, we learn only from the Welsh Chronicles, and on the authority of Spelman, that the Bishop of St. Asaph was among the suffragan bishops of St. David's who, in 601, were present at the meeting of St. Augustine and his associates. Although the see may have been occasionally vacant during those times of distraction and tumult, Wharton considers it as certain that the bishops were regularly appointed, notwithstanding that their names are not to be found upon record, with the exception only of Chebur, whom Wynne, in his History of Wales, states to have accompanied a deputation of learned men to Rome, in the year 940, to obtain from the pope a ratification of the celebrated code of laws compiled by Hywel Dda, sovereign of all Wales, at the making of which the Welsh Chronicles and the learned Spelman both agree that a bishop of St. Asaph assisted. The monastery continued to flourish till nearly the commencement of the ninth century, about which time the monks were dispersed, but their lands and possessions continued with the see, which, notwithstanding the frequent assaults it experienced, retained possession of its privileges and endowments, and, in the year 1016, the cathedral church was rebuilt of stone, chiefly by the munificence of King Ethelred and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and completed by Canute, soon after he had ascended the throne of England. Though these acts of munificence were obviously intended to conciliate the affections of the Welsh, they failed in producing the desired effect; the latter expelled all the Saxon ecclesiastics, and declared open war against them. The subsequent benefactions of Edward the Confessor, conferred on the see from the same motive, did not produce a different result; but Harold, after he had taken Rhuddlan, was more successful in his efforts for conciliation, and bestowed on the ecclesiastics considerable portions of land in Disserth.

After the Norman Conquest of England, this place suffered dreadful ravages in the fierce conflicts between the Anglo-Normans and the native chiefs: the city was laid waste and almost deserted by its inhabitants, the bishops were plundered and driven from their see; the episcopal chair remained vacant for many years, during this frightful period of war and devastation, and the revenues of the see were seized by the crown. In the reign of Henry I., Hewens, Bishop of Bangor, the first Welsh prelate that ever attended an English council, being present at the synod held at Westminster, in 1102, before Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, described in forcible terms the great distress to which the Welsh prelates were reduced: shortly after, an ecclesiastic named Gilbert was appointed to the see of St. Asaph, and consecrated by Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the bishops of London and Rochester; and this authority, which had been previously exercised by the bishops of St. David's, was retained by the archbishops of Canterbury ever afterwards. Gilbert died in 1152, and was succeeded in the prelacy by Galfrid ab Arthur, commonly called, from the place of his birth, or from his archdeaconry, Geoffrey of Monmouth, who holds a distinguished rank among the ancient monkish chroniclers. On the invasion of North Wales by Henry II., in 1157, Owain Gwynedd, the reigning sovereign, encamped his forces for some time at a hamlet in this parish, which was subsequently called Cil Owen, or "Owen's retreat," and afterwards, on the nearer approach of the enemy, he retired to a stronger position at Bryn y Pin, five miles to the west of the city, from which post he frequently descended to skirmish with the English. In 1175, Godfrey, then bishop, was driven from his see by the Welsh, and Adam was appointed his successor: at a council held in London, at which Henry II. was present, that monarch gave to the deposed bishop the abbacy of Abingdon. Reyner, bishop of this see in 1188, accompanied Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was then preaching the crusades in Wales, and exerted his personal influence in promoting the object of the primate's exertions within his diocese. In 1241, a treaty of peace was concluded between Henry III. and Davydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, and signed on the part of the latter by the bishops of Bangor and St. Asaph, at Alnet, on the river Elwy, near this city; but on the renewal of hostilities, in 1247, both those prelates having taken part with their countrymen, in resisting the ambitious designs of the English king, had their churches destroyed, and their lands laid waste by the English forces, and were reduced to such a state of destitution, that they were compelled to abandon their respective sees, and to subsist upon alms: the latter retired to the abbey of St. Mary Osney at Oxford, where he soon afterwards died. After a vacancy of two years, the Dean and Chapter petitioned Henry III., who granted them license to elect a bishop, and Anian, or Einion, was appointed to the see, and consecrated in 1249. His second successor, who had been confessor to Edward I., by whom his appointment was confirmed in 1268, bore the same name, and was distinguished by the surname of de Schonaw: he had been a Dominican friar of Nanney, and was from that circumstance also called, by the Welsh, y Brawd dŷ o Nannau, "the black brother of Nannau:" he obtained for his church, in 1271, from John Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel and lord of Oswestry and Clun, a grant of one hundred acres of land at St. Martin's, in acknowledgment of which he was to present annually at Midsummer a pair of gilt spurs; and in 1276 he received from Edward I. a confirmation of the rights and privileges of his see. Richard, son of Fitz-Alan, confirmed and materially augmented the benefaction of his father, and, in 1278, Gruffydd Vaughan, Lord of Yale, settled upon the bishop and his successors the manor of Llandegla.

During the invasion of the principality by Edward I., the city suffered great devastation, and, in 1282, the cathedral and the houses of the ecclesiastics were burnt to the ground, by a body of English forces in the service of that monarch. Alarmed at this calamitous event, and sensible of the continual danger to which the establishment was exposed, from the defenceless state of the city, which afforded neither shelter nor security against the frequent outrages, both of the English and the Welsh, Anian was desirous of removing the seat of his diocese to Rhuddlan, about three miles distant, which, being a fortified place, might afford protection from those devastations to which, during the unsettled state of the principality, the city of St. Asaph was constantly exposed. Edward sanctioned the design of Anian, and offered to grant a site for the erection of a new church, and one thousand marks towards the expense of the building; but that design was not carried into effect, either from the reluctance to abandon the ancient seat of its first establishment, which had acquired a high degree of veneration, as the depository of the ashes of St. Asaph, or, as Godwin supposes, by the death of Pope Martin IV., to whom application had been made for license to remove it, or more probably, as Browne Willis states, by the circular letters of the Archbishop of Canterbury, exhorting the bishop and canons to rebuild the cathedral on the former site; and in the year 1284, the building which forms the principal part of the present structure was erected. In the course of the preceding negotiations, matters had been so represented to the king, that he deprived Anian of the prelacy, seized the temporalities for his own use, and entrusted the spiritual management of the see to the Bishop of Wells; but Archbishop Peckham, who visited the see of St. Asaph, in company with the deposed bishop, convinced of the necessity of having a resident prelate, prevailed upon Edward to restore Anian to his see, and he was accordingly reinstated. During the repeated struggles between the Kings of England and the native Princes of Wales, the bishops of St. Asaph were constantly led to embrace either one side or the other; and Leoline de Bromfield, Anian's immediate successor, adhering to the party of Edward, repeatedly excommunicated Madoc, son of Llewelyn, Prince of Wales, for his determined opposition and resistance to the English monarch. This prelate, in 1310, gave four portions of the tithes of the parish to the four vicars choral of his cathedral, for serving the cure of the parish; but the latter have now only four portions of five townships of the parish, the corn tithes of the said townships being divided into five portions, of which the bishop receives one. He also appropriated the rectories of Llansilin and Rhuddlan to the canons of the cathedral, who derive their present stipends from that source, and that of Llan-asaph to the cathedral: he died in 1313, and bequeathed considerable property to the church, having obtained special license to that effect from Edward, to whom his goods, like those of other Welsh drelates deceased, would otherwise have escheated. The confirmation of an annual fair on May 1st, the anniversary of the death of St. Asaph, was obtained for the city by Davydd ab Bleuddyn, successor of Leoline, who, besides a grant of certain lands to himself and his successors, also procured a confirmation of the appropriation of the church of Nantglyn to the vicars choral, for saying mass in the chapel of St. Mary, in this parish, which appears to have been erected about this time. William de Spridlington, who succeeded to the see in 1375, procured, on account of its poverty, several livings to be held in commendam with it, and one for the better support of the vicars; and obtained from Edward III. the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair, the former to be held on Monday, and the latter on the 9th of October. Previously to this time, the tenants of the lordship of Llan Elwy, or St. Asaph, were bound to find six labourers to work throughout the year in the quarry called Red Rock, or at such other work as should be appointed by the bishop, for the maintenance of the cathedral church; but, in 1381, this prelate released them from this imposition, on condition of their paying annually the sum of ten marks, which is stated by Bishop Godwin to have been paid in his time, and called Ardreth y Garreg Gôch, or "the rent of the red rock." John Trevaure, the second prelate of that name, being detained prisoner in the castle of Flint, in 1399, by Henry Duke of Lancaster, was induced to pronounce sentence of deposition against his sovereign, Richard II., in favour of this ambitious nobleman, by whom, after the accomplishment of his usurpation, he was sent on an embassy into Spain. During his absence in that country, Owain Glyndwr, exasperated at his adherence and that of his clergy to the cause of the usurper, burnt the cathedral, of which he left only the outer walls standing, destroyed the houses of the canons, and reduced the episcopal palace to ashes. Trevaure, on his return, finding the insurrection of Glyndwr increasing, and his party every day gaining ground, went over to the side of that chieftain, for which reason he was expelled from his see, and being sent to Paris, upon an embassy by Owain, died there in 1410. The political troubles of this reign continuing, the see appears to have remained vacant from the time of his expulsion to his death, and the spiritualties were entrusted to the abbot of Shrewsbury, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who issued a mandate to the Archdeacon of Chester, to certify the names of all such as preached up rebellion in the diocese of St. Asaph. After the accession of Edward IV. to the throne, Thomas, Bishop of St. Asaph, being a strenuous adherent of the House of Lancaster, was expelled from his see, in which, during the short restoration of Henry VI., he was reinstated, with full possession of all its privileges and endowments; but upon the return of Edward to power, he was arraigned on a charge of high treason, and, being convicted, was compelled to purchase his pardon by the surrender of his bishoprick to Richard Redman, a prudent and learned divine, and a zealous adherent of the House of York. The cathedral, after having lain for eighty years in the desolate condition to which it had been reduced by Glyndwr, was rebuilt by the munificence of this prelate, aided by the liberal contributions of the neighbouring gentry. Bishop Redman, having countenanced the pretensions of Lambert Simnel, the feigned duke of York, fell under the displeasure of Henry VII.; but having unreservedly submitted himself to the clemency of that monarch, he continued to preside over the see till his death. The city for a long period exhibited marks of the desolation it had suffered from the insurgents under Glyndwr, and it was not till near a century after, that the episcopal palace was rebuilt by Davydd ab Owen, who also erected a bridge of wood over the river Clwyd, about a quarter of a mile to the north-east of the city, which was afterwards rebuilt of stone, but is still called Pont Davydd Esgob, or "Bishop David's Bridge." During the civil commotions in the seventeenth century, this place suffered dreadful havoc: the revenues of the see were sequestered by the parliament, the cathedral was desecrated and converted into a stable for horses and oxen, and the episcopal palace was appropriated as a tavern for the sale of wine and spirituous liquors. In this degraded state it continued till the Restoration, when, after a vacancy of nine years, the see was filled by Bishop Griffith, who restored the cathedral, which was afterwards greatly improved by his successor, Dr. Isaac Barrow, who also rebuilt the episcopal palace, and erected and endowed almshouses for eight poor widows. During the prelacy of Dr. John Wynne, a violent hurricane blew down the upper part of the tower of the cathedral, which, falling into the choir, greatly damaged that part of the building; it was, however, immediately repaired by the bishop and other dignitaries of the see, aided by the liberal contributions of the gentry and clergy resident in the vicinity.

Among the bishops of St. Asaph, many have been eminently distinguished for learning and piety, and for their sedulous attention to the interests of the see. Bishop Hughes, who was promoted to this diocese in 1573, was a great benefactor both to it and to the city: he procured from the Archbishop of Canterbury a faculty to hold in commendam with the bishoprick the archdeaconry of St. Asaph, which has since that time been invariably held by his successors in the see: he died in 1600, and was interred in the cathedral church. The learned William Morgan, an eminent linguist and divine, was one of the principal persons engaged in translating the Bible into the Welsh language, of which the first edition was printed in 1588: he also assisted in the English version, commonly called Queen Elizabeth's Bible: he was translated from Llandaf to this see in 1601, and died in 1604. Parry, the successor of Bishop

Morgan, and his coadjutor in the translation of the Bible, was succeeded by John Owen, who introduced the custom of preaching in Welsh in the parish church of St. Asaph; he repaired and beautified the cathedral, in which he placed an organ of large dimensions, and paved the road between the cathedral and the parish church, a portion of which latter he rebuilt: he also enlarged the episcopal palace, and, having lived to see the revenues of his see sequestered by the parliament, he died at Aber Kinsi, near St. Asaph, in 1651, and was privately buried in the cathedral, under the bishop's throne. Dr. Isaac Barrow, uncle of the celebrated mathematician of that name, was alike eminent for his munificence and his piety; he greatly promoted the interests of the diocese by his prudence and liberality, and the welfare of the city by his benevolence and charity: he died in 1680, at Shrewsbury, from which place his remains were removed to St. Asaph, and interred in the churchyard, near the west door of the cathedral. Dr. William Beveridge, usually styled the "Apostolic Beveridge," was equally eminent as a divine, and for his proficiency in oriental literature: he published a treatise on the excellence of the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Samaritan, and Arabic languages, with a Syriac grammar, and, among numerous devotional works, one entitled "Private Thoughts," which has deservedly acquired a high degree of admiration, and "the Church Catechism Explained, for the use of the diocese of St. Asaph." Bishop Fleetwood, who succeeded him, expended large sums of money in repairing and beautifying the cathedral, and materially contributed to the obtaining of an act of parliament, in 1712, for abolishing the custom of mortuaries due from the clergy of his diocese, in lieu of which vexatious source of revenue, the sinecure rectory of Northop was annexed to the see. Dr. Thomas Tanner, the celebrated antiquary, and well-known author of the Notitia Monastica, for some time presided over the see of St. Asaph: he died in 1735, and left his valuable collection of manuscripts to the Bodleian library.

The city is beautifully situated on the gentle acclivity of an eminence, washed on the eastern side by the river Clwyd, and on the western by the river Elwy, which unite at the distance of about a mile to the north. Over the Elwy, at the extremity of the principal street, is a handsome stone bridge of five arches; and over the Clwyd is a fine bridge of more modern erection, within a quarter of a mile to the east of the cathedral church. The houses in the principal street are of brick, and in general small, though neatly built; the streets are well paved, but not lighted; and, under the provisions of an act of parliament for making a new line of road, several handsome houses and pleasing cottages have been built, which have greatly improved the appearance of the place. In the construction of the new road, which now forms the best street in the town, an elegant bridge has been erected over the river Clwyd, near Bronwylva; the road has been raised several feet, in order to avoid a steep hill; and some beautiful plantations have been formed on both sides of it, which contribute to render the approach to St. Asaph not only commodious but picturesque. The view of the city is peculiarly striking: its elevated situation on an eminence near the termination of the rich and fertile Vale of Clwyd, crowned on its summit with the cathedral, and having the parish church at its base, makes it a conspicuous object from every point of view; and the luxuriant groves of trees in which it is deeply embosomed, give to it a pleasingly romantic appearance. The surrounding scenery, which in every direction abounds with objects of interest and beauty, is seen to great advantage from the eminence on which the city is built, and from the high grounds in the immediate vicinity. From the brow of a hill, about two miles distant from the town, on the road to Holywell, is an extensive and pleasing view of a portion of the Vale of Clwyd, beautifully diversified with corn-fields and meadows, groves and woods, intersected by the windings of the river, and enlivened with numerous picturesque cottages, skirted on all sides with rugged and precipitous mountains, except on the right hand, where a fine view of the sea is obtained, bounded in the distance by dark receding mountains. To the south the prospect embraces a fine view of the town of Denbigh, with the venerable remains of its ancient castle on the lofty summit of an isolated rock, and on the north are seen the ruins of Rhuddlan castle, forming an interesting and picturesque object in the distance. The road from St. Asaph to Denbigh is in many parts beautifully picturesque, the small Vale of Elwy, at the extremity of which is a fine bridge of one arch, eighty feet in the span, over that river, called Pont yr allt Gôch, is richly wooded, and abounds with finely varied scenery: the Elwy, which sometimes rushes through the vale with the impetuosity of a torrent, is beautifully shaded by the luxuriant foliage on its banks. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on Easter Tuesday, July 15th, October 16th, and December 16th, chiefly for cattle. By the late act for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, St. Asaph has been added to the other boroughs of this county, now eight in number, which unitedly return one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of houses worth ten pounds per annum and upwards is about ninety-three: the boundaries of the borough are minutely described in the appendix to this work: the bailiffs of Flint are the returning officers.

Arms of the Bishoprick.

The diocese of St. Asaph appears originally to have comprehended the whole territory of the ancient Princes of Powys: its jurisdiction at present extends over the whole of the county of Flint, with the exception of the parishes of Bangor, Overton, Hanmer, Hawarden, and Worthenbury; the whole of Denbighshire, except the deanery of Dyfryn Clwyd, and the chapelries of Holt, Iscoed, and Penley; the hundreds of Edeyrnion, Penllŷn, and Tal y bont and Mowddy, in the county of Merioneth; the greater part of the county of Montgomery, including thirty-seven parishes; three parishes in the county of Carnarvon; and eleven parishes and chapelries in the county of Salop; comprehending in the whole one hundred and thirty parishes and parochial chapelries, all of which, with the exception of seven, are in the patronage of the bishop, as is also the deanery of St. Asaph. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of the bishop, who is also archdeacon; a dean, who is also chancellor of the diocese; a precentor, who holds the prebend of Vaenol, called the golden prebend; a chancellor of the cathedral, who holds the prebend of Llan-Nevydd; a treasurer, who holds the prebend of Meliden; and three other prebendaries, seven canons, four vicars choral, an organist, four lay clerks, four choristers, and other officers. The cathedral consists principally of the structure raised by Bishop Anian, about the year 1284, and, after its demolition by Owain Glyndwr, restored and partly rebuilt by Bishop Redman, towards the close of the fifteenth century, with the exception of the choir, which was partly rebuilt about the year 1770, by the dean and chapter, with funds which had been vested in their hands, as trustees, for that purpose. It is a plain cruciform structure, principally in the decorated style of English architecture, with a low square embattled tower rising from the intersection of the nave and transepts, and having at the north-east angle a square staircase turret: the exterior is of simple, but good design, the buttresses are few and of very bold character, and the arch of the west door is plainly moulded. The nave is of the decorated style, and is separated from the aisles by a lofty range of piers and arches, the details of which are plain, but of good character, and lighted by a range of clerestory windows, square-headed and enriched with ancient tracery, and at the west end by a fine window of six lights, which is an elegant composition in the decorated style, enriched with flowing tracery of exquisite design. The transepts, which are also in the decorated style of architecture, are without aisles, and lighted by a range of windows of appropriate character, but not remarkable for their tracery. The choir, which is also without aisles, is of comparatively modern date, and, though apparently an imitation of the later style, bears but a very faint resemblance to any of the styles of English architecture: the east end is ornamented with a window, which is said to be a fac-simile of the east window in Tintern abbey, in Monmouthshire, and in 1810 was filled with stained glass, at the expense of the dean and chapter, aided by the contributions of the gentry in the neighbourhood, whose armorial bearings are emblazoned in some of the compartments: the choir is very small, scarcely affording accommodation for more than the officiating clergy. The south transept is partly fitted up as a chapter-house and library, containing a valuable collection of more than two thousand volumes, which is open to the use of the clergy of the diocese. The whole length of the cathedral, from east to west, is one hundred and seventy-nine feet, the length of the nave one hundred and nineteen feet, the whole breadth along the transepts one hundred and eight feet, and the length of the choir sixty feet: the height of the roof from the pavement is sixty feet, and that of the central tower ninety-three feet. There are few monuments of any interest, and, though many of the bishops have been interred within the walls, scarcely any memorials of them have been erected. An altar-tomb, with a recumbent figure in episcopal robes, is said to commemorate the munificent prelate, Davydd ab Owen, who was interred here in 1512; and near the west door is a plain tomb in the churchyard, with an inscription to the memory of Bishop Isaac Barrow, who died in 1680. A monument of white marble, to the memory of Dean Shipley, was erected by subscription about the close of the year 1829, at an expense of about £600, consisting of a full-length figure of the dean in his canonicals, in a sitting posture. The churchyard was enclosed with a wall and handsome palisades in 1815, and in the following year it was planted with trees and laid out in good taste; and the cathedral is now undergoing a course of repair, the expense of which will be defrayed out of the funds arising from the tithes of the parish of Llanrhaiadr in Mochnant, granted by act of parliament in the 54th of George III., for that purpose. The episcopal palace, situated at a short distance to the west of the cathedral, is now being rebuilt, upon a more extensive scale and in an appropriate style, at the expense of the present bishop. The deanery, about a quarter of a mile from the cathedral, and on the west bank of the river Elwy, has recently been rebuilt by the present dean. The canon's houses, which were demolished by Owain Glyndwr, have never been rebuilt. The bishop holds his consistory court, which is the only court exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the diocese, either himself or by his surrogate, in the chapter-house, as occasion may require, generally about nine times in the year.

This parish is in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph. The four vicars choral of the cathedral perform the ecclesiastical duties in rotation, dividing equally among them a part of the tithes of the parish, and also four out of five portions of those of the parish of Gwyddelwern, in the county of Merioneth, of which the vicar of that parish receives the fifth; but they have no cure of souls in the parish of St. Asaph: in addition to this they receive a small stipend, styled "Preaching Money," from the members of the chapter. The parochial church, dedicated to St. Asaph and St. Kentigern, is situated at the base of the eminence of which the cathedral occupies the summit, and consists of two parallel aisles, called respectively Eglwys Asaph and Eglwys Cyndeirn, St. Asaph's and St. Kentigern's churches. It is a small edifice without a tower, and is supposed to have been erected about the year 1524: the interior contains two monuments of white marble, one of which is to the memory of Thomas Humphreys, of Bôd-Elwyddan, commonly called Bôdlewyyddan, Esq., who bequeathed an annual sum to the poor and for catechising the youth of the parish. In the churchyard, which is very spacious, are some ancient tombs, said to have been brought from Rhuddlan abbey, two miles distant: they are of stone, and in the form of coffins, having on the lids a sword and spade sculptured: one of them, which wants this ornament, has in lieu of it a shield with a lion rampant, beneath which passes a sword grasped by a hand, and round it the inscription "Hic jacet Ranulfus de Smalwode." There are places of worship for Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Certain lands were assigned by Bishop Hughes for the endowment of a free grammar school, but the grant being conditional, and the contingencies referred to not happening, it did not take effect. The school is endowed, however, with lands here given in trust to the vicars of St. Asaph, by Mrs. Elizabeth Williams, of

Chamber Wen, by will dated October 25th, 1729, and now producing £60 per annum, of which £40 is paid to the master, for the instruction of twenty-four boys of the parish; and his salary has been increased by the interest of £200, bequeathed by Mr. Hutchinson of Wrexham, in 1829. A National school will shortly be erected, the expense to be defrayed from trust money in the hands of the vicars choral, an annual payment from the Dean and Chapter, and any subscriptions that may be received from the clergy. Almshouses for eight poor widows were founded and endowed with £12 per annum by Bishop Barrow, in 1678, who also gave £100 towards the maintenance of a free school at St. Asaph, which he intended to have erected, but died at Shrewsbury in 1680, before he had carried the design into effect: the almshouses, having fallen into decay, were rebuilt by Bishop Bagot, and the widows are appointed alternately by the bishop and dean, and the families of Cevn and Llanerch. In addition to the above endowments, various minor sums have been given for charitable uses, the principal of which are, a rent-charge of £2 by Dr. Smith, in 1680, for apprenticing a poor boy; £30 for clothing poor persons in the townships of Bôdlewyyddan, Pengwern, and Vaynol, £10 to the poor of Brÿn Paulin and Gwernglevryd, and £20 to the almswomen of St. Asaph, by Thomas Humphreys, in 1696; £20 each by Margaret Lloyd, in 1720, and Ellin Lloyd, in 1726, to the poor of Cevn Meriadog and Wygvair; £10 by Alice Morris, in 1724,—£100 by the Rev. William Lloyd, in 1732,—£10 by the Rev. Richard Lloyd, in 1736,—and £20 by Susannah Lloyd, in 1750,—for the benefit of the poor of the parish in general; £60 by the Rev. Robert Lloyd, to the poor of Bôdlewyyddan, Brÿn Paulin, Cevn Meriadog, Gwernglevryd, Talar, Vaynol, and Wygvair; and a portion of land by Thomas Foulkes, in trust to the vicars of St. Asaph, for clothing poor people. Near the river Elwy, in the township of Wigvair, is Fynnon Vair, or "the well of Our Lady," situated in a richly wooded dell: this spring, which is enclosed in a polygonal basin of hewn stone, beautifully and elaborately sculptured, discharges about a hundred gallons per minute: the water is strongly impregnated with lime, and was formerly much resorted to as a cold bath. Adjoining the well are the ruins of an ancient cruciform chapel, which, prior to the Reformation, was a chapel of ease to St. Asaph, in the later style of English architecture: the windows, which are of handsome design, are now nearly concealed by the ivy which has overspread the building; and the ruin, elegant in itself, derives additional interest from the beauty of its situation. There are numerous elegant mansions within the parish, among which the most conspicuous are, Bôdlewyyddan, the seat of Sir John Williams, Bart., lately rebuilt by its proprietor in the English castellated style; Pengwern, the seat of Lord Mostyn, built about the beginning of the last century; Cevn, the seat of Edward Lloyd, Esq., now being rebuilt in the Elizabethan style of architecture; and Bronwylva, the residence of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Henry Browne, erected in the year 1660, and enlarged in 1816. In this last mansion are some valuable trophies, taken during the late war, among which are Napoleon Buonaparte's travelling map and books of roads of the French empire, in splendid morocco cases, emblazoned with the imperial arms, taken from his library at Fontainebleau by Sir Henry, in 1815; and a French field-marshal's baton, two feet three inches in length, covered with purple velvet ornamented with golden bees, and surmounted with an imperial crown, taken in Silesia, in 1812, by a division of Blucher's corps. In the township of Cevn Meriadog are some magnificent natural caverns, extending for a considerable distance into the limestone rocks: in some parts of these the roof is more than forty feet in height, and near the river Elwy the base of the rock is perforated by a lofty natural arch, twenty-one yards in length, and thirty-six feet high, through which is a road capable of admitting a waggon loaded with hay. Various fossil remains have been found in these caverns; among which are, the skull of some remarkably large animal, with the teeth, of corresponding size, perfectly enamelled; and the tongue of an animal, as large as a deer's tongue, of which the form and grain were perfect, though the relic itself was completely petrified. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the city and parish amounts to £1209. 14.

ASTON, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Hawarden, containing 237 inhabitants.

ASTON, a township in that part of the parish of LYDHAM which is in the lower division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Montgomery, containing 84 inhabitants. This township, which is situated on the border of Shropshire, on the road from Bishop's Castle to Montgomery, formerly composed part of the manor of Teitrêv, or the three townships, which had a chapel attached; but subsequently this manor was divided, and Aston was connected with the parish of Lydham, the greater part of which is in the hundred of Purslow, county of Salop. It now forms one of the eighteen parishes and townships which are incorporated for the support of their poor in the house of industry at Forden: the average annual assessment for this purpose is £24. 7.

ATHAN (ST.), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 312 inhabitants. This place, according to Dr. Malkin, derives its name from St. Tathan, a nephew and one of the disciples of St. Illutus, who lived here in retirement, about the commencement of the sixth century, and founded the parish church, in which, returning after an absence of several years, he was interred, and of which he became the tutelary saint. The parish is pleasantly situated in the most fertile part of the vale of Glamorgan, bordering upon the Bristol channel, to which the village extends, near the small port of Aberthaw, which is a creek to the port of Cardiff. The scenery is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and the air is remarkably salubrious: the neighbourhood abounds with excellent limestone, the working of which affords employment to such of the poorer inhabitants as are not engaged in agriculture; and its proximity to the port of Aberthaw confers upon this place a small degree of commercial importance. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. 7., and in the patronage of Robert Jones, Esq. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. On the edge of an abrupt acclivity, in this parish, are the venerable remains of East Orchard castle, erected by Roger Berckrolles, or Berelos, one of the twelve knights who accompanied the Norman adventurer, Fitz-Hamon, upon whom this lordship was bestowed at the time of the Conquest. A small rivulet winds pleasingly round the base of the eminence on which the castle is built, and the ruined walls, mantled with ivy, present an object highly picturesque. Berelos is said to have divided his lands with the original proprietor of the whole, and out of his reserved moiety to have afforded subsistence to other families, who had been dispossessed of their property by the Norman usurpation. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £261. 6.

ATPAR, a borough and township in the parish of LLANDYVRIOG, upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the town of Newcastle-Emlyn. The population is returned with the parish. This place was formerly one of the contributory boroughs within the county, which were united in returning one member to parliament; but, according to Dr. Meyrick, it forfeited its franchise by misconduct, and was deprived of the privilege by a vote of the House of Commons, in 1742: it has, however, by the bill for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, been restored to the enjoyment of the elective franchise, and, in conjunction with Aberystwith and Lampeter, shares with Cardigan in the return of one member: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of these tenements within the limits of the borough, which are minutely described in the Appendix to this work, is sixty-eight: the mayor of Cardigan is the returning officer. The borough, which is said to have been a borough by prescription, was anciently governed by a portreeve, recorder, and two bailiffs: the burgesses were made upon the presentment of a jury, which consisted apparently of the proprietors of burgages, and were accustomed to vote, whether resident or not, for the election of a member: at present there are no burgesses alive. A belief prevails amongst the inhabitants that the charter was destroyed by a fire which occurred within the memory of some now living, in which, there can be no doubt, many of the documents of the borough perished. Atpar is situated on the northern bank of the river Teivy, and is connected, by means of a stone bridge across that river, with Newcastle-Emlyn, of which town it is usually considered as forming part. It comprises within its limits an elegant villa, called Atpar Hill, the seat of John Beynor, Esq.

B.

BÂCHYMBYD, a joint township with Ysceibion, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Ruthin. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated near the left bank of the Clywedog, which falls into the river Clwyd a short distance off. Lord Bagot has a fine seat here, remarkable for its pleasant situation, and the extent of its ancient woods, some of the chesnut trees having acquired a very large growth: the estate came into the possession of this noble family by marriage of Sir Walter Bagot with Jane, daughter and sole heiress of Charles Salusbury, Esq.

BADLAND, a joint township with Kennarton, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with Kennarton.

BAGILLT, a township in the parish of HOLYWELL, Holywell division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Holywell. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is divided into Bagillt-Vawr and Bagillt-Vechan, is situated close on the southern shore of the æstuary of the Dee, on a branch of the great road from Chester to Holyhead, which, branching off at Northop, passes through Flint, and joins the main line at Holywell. The Halkin mountain, rich in mineral treasures, rises on the south-west; and on the western side of this eminence the ancient line of demarcation, called Wat's Dyke, passes through this township to its junction with the Dee, near Basingwerk abbey. Here are very extensive collieries, affording employment to upwards of two hundred and fifty men, and yielding annually more than forty thousand tons of coal, which is chiefly exported coastwise to Chester, Liverpool, and the distant parts of North Wales. There are also three separate and extensive establishments for smelting lead-ore, which annually produce upwards of one hundred thousand tons of that metal, and connected with them are refineries for extracting from the lead the proportion of silver which it contains: the amount of the latter metal, thus annually procured, averages about forty-two thousand ounces. Subordinate to these principal establishments are also extensive works for manufacturing the lead into sheets, pipes, and bars; and in the various departments nearly three hundred men are constantly employed. Steam-vessels, which maintain a constant communication between Holywell and Liverpool, ply daily between the latter place and the quay at Bagillt. There are places of worship for Independents, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Between Gadlys and Pentre Bagillt is an eminence, called Brÿn Dychwelwch, or "the Return Hill," from a tradition that it is the spot on which Henry II. gave the order to his forces to retreat, when engaged in the battle of Counsylvllt, or Coleshill, for the particulars of which, see the article on HOLYWELL.

BAGLAN, a parish in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.) from Neath, on the road to Cardiff, comprising the townships of Higher Baglan and Lower Baglan, each maintaining its own poor, and containing 410 inhabitants, of which number, 58 are in Higher Baglan, and 352 in Lower Baglan. This small parish, which comprises not more than two thousand five hundred acres, is delightfully situated in the midst of rich and beautifully diversified scenery, bounded on one side by mountains, the acclivities of which are thickly wooded, and commanding over the lower grounds a magnificent view of Swansea bay. The beauty of its situation, and the local advantages which it possesses, have made it a favourite place of residence; and within its circumscribed limits, in addition to the many neat cottages which are profusely scattered over its surface, there is a greater number of gentlemen's seats than is usually found in so small a parish. The village has an air of rural simplicity, and a prepossessing appearance of cheerfulness and tranquillity. The soil is of different kinds, part being meadow and grazing land of good quality, and some tolerably good arable land; but the greater portion of the parish consists of mountainous ground, affording pasturage for sheep, and on the side next the sea are extensive banks and plains of sand. There are several veins of coal, of a good bituminous quality, of which some are worked; and a considerable quantity of fire clay is obtained, part of which is used in the manufacture of earthenware, and part conveyed to the different copper-works in the neighbourhood, together with some iron-ore, which is smelted at the Neath Abbey iron-works. A creek, called Baglan Pill, which falls into the Neath a little below Briton-Ferry, affords a facility for conveying the produce of the mines, and other commodities, in small craft of from twenty to thirty tons' burden. The living is a consolidated vicarage with that of Aberavon, both of which are endowed with the great tithes, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Baglan, is a neat and appropriate building, and the churchyard is shaded with yew trees of luxuriant growth. A small sum of £2 per annum, chargeable upon the turnpike trust, is annually distributed among the poor. Of the gentlemen's seats with which the parish is decorated, the principal are, Baglan House, the property of the Earl of Jersey, and the residence of Watkin Homfray, Esq., once the residence of the Rev. William Thomas, by whom it was built, the friend of Mason and Gray, who were his occasional visitors; Baglan Hall, the seat of Griffith Llewellyn, Esq.; Baglan Cottage and Greenfield Lodge, two ornamental cottage residences on the road side, both the property of that gentleman; and Baglan Lodge, the property of the Rev. Edward Thomas, patron and incumbent of Aberavon cum Baglan. Mynydd Gaer, in this parish, a small circular intrenchment, is supposed to have been either of British or of Danish origin. There is a separate assessment for the support of the poor of each portion of the parish, the average annual expenditure of the Higher division being £85. 6., and of the Lower £85. 3.

BALA, a township, and a market and assize town, in the parish of LLANYCIL, hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 18 miles (N.E.) from Dôlgeley, and 204 (N.W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place derives its name, which signifies "a running out," from its situation near the efflux of the Dee from the adjoining lake of Llŷn Tegid. Its early history is involved in obscurity, and nothing peculiarly remarkable has been with certainty recorded of it. A high artificial mount, called Tommen y Bala, at the south-eastern extremity of the town, is thought to have been constructed by the Romans, who built a small fortress upon its summit, to protect the pass towards the sea, and overawe the turbulent inhabitants of the district: this mount was afterwards used by the Welsh, as one of a chain of forts which they established across this portion of the principality, terminating at the sea on the confines of Flintshire, for the purpose of defending themselves against the invasions of the lords-marcher. A castle was erected here, in 1202, by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, probably, as Mr. Pennant supposes, on or near the site of a more ancient castelet, called "Castell Gronw Bevr o Benllŷn:" some vestiges of it are still traceable on the eastern side of the Dee, near the point where that river emerges from the lake. Bala was probably dependent upon the castle of Harlech, and, in the reign of Edward II., was committed to the custody of Einion de Stanedon, constable of that castle: in that of Edward III. both these places were given in fee-farm to Walter de Manni, a distinguished military commander, who was appointed sheriff of this county for life.

The town, which consists of one wide street and a smaller one, not lighted, but well supplied with water, is situated on the road from Dôlgeley to Corwen, near the north-western extremity of the lake; and, although standing in an unfertile district, and destitute of all the advantages derived from water carriage, yet in appearance it is excelled by few towns in the principality. The surrounding country consists chiefly of wild moors and heathy mountains, from which circumstance this has become the general rendezvous of gentlemen resorting to this part of Wales for grouse-shooting. A book society was established here in 1828. Bala and its neighbourhood have for a long series of years been noted for the knitting of woollen stockings, socks, and gloves, but this manufacture has of late been on the decline: in the year 1830, thirty-two thousand dozen pair of stockings, ten thousand dozen pair of socks, and five thousand five hundred dozen pair of gloves, were made. The hosiery is distinguished for the softness of its texture, which causes it to be held in high esteem for winter wear, and universally recommended by the medical faculty. The market, which is on Saturday, is well attended; and fairs are held on the Saturday before Shrovetide, chiefly for the hiring of servants, and May 14th, July 10th, October 24th, and November 8th, chiefly for the sale of live stock; that in July is a great fair for lambs. Bala was anciently incorporated, under the government of two bailiffs and a common council: it is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. The spring assizes, and the winter and summer quarter sessions, for the county are held here; and the county court, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, is held once a month, by the deputy sheriff, either here or at Dôlgeley. The town-hall is a plain substantial building, standing in the principal street: attached to it is one of the county bridewells, which is under the regulation of the magistrates for the hundred, but is too small to admit of an extended system of classification. A chapel of ease was erected by subscription, in 1811: it is a small plain structure, with a low tower, surmounted by a spire. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists, with Sunday schools attached. A grammar school was founded and endowed, in 1712, by Dr. Edmund Meyrick, chancellor of St. David's, who bequeathed, in trust to the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, land then let for £15 per annum, for the instruction of children: thirty boys are now clothed and educated for four years on this foundation, and the master, who is appointed by the Principal and Fellows, receives a salary of £40 per annum, with a rent-free residence: the sum of £60 is annually applied towards clothing the children. A branch of the Roman Watling-street, passing from the station Mediolanum, in Montgomeryshire, to that of Heriri Mons, near Festiniog, proceeded through or very near the present town of Bala; and at the upper end of the lake, the remains of a Roman station, now called Caer Gai, are very conspicuously situated, around which a great quantity of Roman bricks lies scattered. The Rev. T. Charles, formerly of Jesus' College, Oxford, one of the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and an indefatigable promoter of Sunday schools and circulating charity schools, resided at this place, where he died in 1814, and was interred in the parochial church: he also distinguished himself as the author of an extensive work, in the Welsh language, entitled Geiriadur Ysgrythyrol, or a "Scriptural Dictionary." Bala lake, called also Llŷn Tegid and Pimble mere, is the largest in Wales, being about four miles in length, and in some places nearly one mile in breadth: its greatest depth, which is opposite Brŷn Goleu, is about forty-six yards. Its overflowings, when the wind rushes from the mountains at the upper end, occasion great damage: in stormy weather it receives a great accession of water from the mountain torrents, and rises to the height of seven or eight feet above its ordinary level, covering a considerable portion of the vales of Penllŷn and Edeyrnion, and even endangering the security of the town itself. The river Dee has its source under Aran Penllŷn, a high mountain at the head of the lake, through which it has been said, by Giraldus Cambrensis, Drayton, and others, to flow without mingling its waters; as the Rhone is fabled to pass through the lake of Geneva, and the classic Alpheus through the Adriatic sea. This assertion is partly founded on the circumstance that salmon, which are plentiful in the river, are never found in the lake; nor are gwyniaid, which swim in shoals in the lake, ever seen, except rarely, in the river; but this may be accounted for by the instinct which all creatures exhibit, in resorting only to those haunts most congenial to their habits, and most convenient for feeding and shelter. The lake abounds with pike, perch, trout, and eels; and there are also a few roach, and innumerable gwyniaid (so called from the whiteness of their scales), a species of fish found only in Alpine waters, and resembling whittings in flavour, which spawn in December, and are caught in great numbers in spring and summer. The fishery, in the thirteenth century, belonged to the abbot and monks of Basingwerk: the whole is now the property of Sir W. W. Wynne, Bart., who has a handsome villa, called Glŷn Llŷn, pleasantly situated upon the margin of the lake. From the summit of Tommen y Bala, at the north-eastern extremity of this fine sheet of water, the view to the south-west is exceedingly grand: on the right it is fringed by a line of rich meadows, and on the left is the bridge, under which the Dee passes: a large rocky hill, the sides of which are well clothed with wood, rises over it in picturesque beauty, and hence the eye is directed along a ridge of craggy elevations, to the lofty Arans, with their two pre-eminent summits, Aran Mowddwy and Penllŷn. On the north-west soar the Arenigs, Vawr and Vach, with the cloud-encircled summit of Cader Idris, terminating the prospect. The local tradition vulgarly connected with the formation of this lake, in common with most other large pieces of water in the principality, is, that it occupies the site of the palace and grounds of a rich, haughty, and irreligious prince, whose wealth, acquired by acts of rapine and murder, was preserved by oppression and the violent exercise of arbitrary power; till at length, disregarding the warnings he had often received from a superhuman agent, he drew down upon himself the vengeance of an offended God, and his magnificent mansion was suddenly swallowed up, whilst celebrating the birth of his eldest son's first-born, and surrounded by a gay concourse of lords and ladies, whom he had invited as friends to participate in the festivity: the towers and parapets of the palace are credulously reported to have been frequently seen, by the superstitious boatmen of former times, when the bright full moon reflected its refulgent lustre upon the glassy surface of the unruffled waters. Some flourishing plantations of young trees have within the last thirty years been formed at Cyfty, Caer Leon, and Tal y Bont, in the vicinity of this town, by W. M. Thackeray, Esq., M.D.

BANGOR, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 210 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, the banks of which, in this part of its course, are richly ornamented with finely varied and beautifully picturesque scenery. The land, which is mostly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, usually produces good crops of corn. Blaen Dyfryn, the property of John Lloyd Davies, Esq., to whom it passed by marriage with Miss Price, niece of the late proprietor, is pleasantly situated within this parish. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Hênllan annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small plain building, occupying a remarkable situation above a bold reach of the river. Near it is a circular mount, surrounded by a moat, called Castell Pistog, which is said to have been the site of a mansion anciently belonging to a family of that name, who were proprietors of the lordship. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor is £32. 6.

BANGOR, a city, port, and parish, in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (N. E.) from Carnarvon, and 243 (N. W. by W.) from London, on the great road to Holyhead, containing 4751 inhabitants. The origin of this small, but ancient, city is involved in very great obscurity. Leland, on the authority of the Chronicle of John Harding, states that, prior to the establishment of Christianity in Britain, Condage, a prince of the early Britons, erected in this place a temple, which he dedicated to Minerva. Upon the correctness of this testimony alone rests the supposition of its having existed during the continuance of the Roman empire in Britain, and the sole evidence of its having been occupied by the Romans is derived from a hewn block of gritstone, three feet four inches in length, and eighteen inches broad, found at Tŷcôch, a short distance from the city, bearing a Latin inscription of undoubted antiquity, and which is the only relic of the Romans known to have been discovered in the neighbourhood. The earliest authentic account of this place occurs in the history of the first religious establishment founded here, which, according to some authorities, originated with Deiniol, or Daniel, son of Dynawd, or Dúnothus, abbot of the monastery of Bangor Iscoed, in the county of Flint, who is said to have built a college for the instruction of youth, and for the support of the clergy, in this part of North Wales, about the year 525. This college continued to be dependent on the parent establishment at Bangor Iscoed, from which it is supposed to have derived its name, till the year 550, when Maelgwyn Gwynedd, King of North Wales, called by Gildas "Maglocunus," endowed it with lands and divers privileges, and erected it into a see, of which Daniel was consecrated first bishop, by Dubricius, Archbishop of Caerleon. Daniel died about four years after his consecration, and was buried in Ynys Enlli, or Bardsey isle, at that time the usual place of interment for men of distinguished sanctity. According to other authorities, it appears that Dúnothus, abbot of Bangor Iscoed, who, in the year 597, headed a deputation of seven bishops and a great number of learned men, to meet St. Augustine, whom Pope Gregory had sent into Britain to propagate the Christian faith, founded a small establishment on or near the site occupied by the present cathedral, as a cell to the abbey of Bangor Iscoed, and placed in it monks from that establishment. This small monastery afterwards became the asylum of the few brethren that escaped the subsequent massacre of the monks of Bangor Iscoed, by Ethelfrith, King of Northumberland, who, in 607, advancing to Caerlleon ar Ddyvrddwy, now Chester, against the Britons, whose army he defeated in a decisive battle, fell with fury upon the monks of Bangor Iscoed, who had assembled near that place to assist their countrymen with their prayers, and put twelve hundred of them to death. About fifty only saved themselves by flight into the mountains, and afterwards united with the brethren at this place in forming a religious establishment, to which they transferred the name of their ancient monastery, then reduced to ruins, and which afterwards, from its increasing importance, obtained the appellation of Ban côr the "chief society," or Bon côr, the "good choir." Notwithstanding the uncertainty of the original foundation of the religious fraternity at Bangor, it appears that it was erected into a see about the year 550, and that Deiniol was the first bishop: it continued, no doubt, to be a suffragan bishoprick to the archiepiscopal see of Caerlleon, though no regular succession of its bishops is recorded for a space of nearly three hundred years. The first of Daniel's successors, of whom there is any mention, is Elvod, who, according to the Annales Menevenses, died in 811; and the see is said to have been endowed with additional lands by Rhodri Mawr, and also by his son and successor, Anarawd, in gratitude for his victory over the Saxons, on the banks of the Conway. In 925, Sisylt ab Clydauc gave some lands to the church, and King Athelstan is stated in the archives of the cathedral to have been a benefactor to the see. Mordav, Bishop of Bangor, in 940, together with Chebur, Bishop of St. Asaph, accompanied Hywel Dda, King of Wales, to Rome, in order to obtain from the pope a confirmation of that monarch's celebrated code of laws.

In 973, Iago, sovereign of North Wales, having been expelled from his dominions by a rival prince, named Howel, applied for assistance to Edgar King of England, who, desirous of fomenting the quarrel, advanced with an army to Bangor, and compelled Howel to allow him an equal share in the sovereignty. The English monarch, during his continuance in this city, assumed a sovereign authority in Wales: he confirmed the privileges of the see, and augmented its possessions with lands and other gifts, erecting also, on the south side of the cathedral, a church, which he dedicated to St. Mary, and which, according to Browne Willis, was used as a parochial church till the reign of Henry VII. In 1071, the city suffered material injury, and the cathedral was destroyed, by an English army which invaded this part of the principality; and about the year 1080, Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, in order to assist his descent upon the Isle of Anglesey, and to secure the conquests which he had already made in North Wales, erected a castle, about a quarter of a mile to the north of the city, on the ridge of hills which bounds the vale. Of this castle, no particular event is recorded in the history of the principality: probably, after the restoration of Gruffydd ab Cynan to the throne from which the earl had expelled him, it was either destroyed immediately, or suffered to fall gradually into ruins. The city recovered from its devastation, but the cathedral remained in a ruinous state till 1102, when a synod was held at Westminster, for the reformation of the church, at which Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, presided, assisted by Girard, Archbishop of York, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, and others, and at which also Hervé, or Herveus, Bishop of Bangor, the first Welsh prelate that had ever attended a council in England, and who was consecrated in 1093, by Thomas, Archbishop of York, was present. The members of this synod, lamenting the decay of religion in this part of North Wales, which they attributed in a great degree to the destruction of the cathedral, gave large sums of money towards its restoration. Giraldus, who accompanied Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, in his circuit to preach the crusades through Wales, relates in his Itinerary, that they visited Bangor in 1188, and were well received by the bishop of that diocese, with whom they remained one night; and on the following day, after the celebration of mass by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Guianus, Bishop of Bangor, was compelled by his importunity to take the cross, to the infinite regret of all his people. From this time Bangor appears to have remained in a flourishing state till the year 1211, when King John, invading North Wales, encamped his forces on the banks of the river Conway, and detached a portion of his army to burn the city, which they accomplished; and, entering the cathedral, took Robert the bishop (who had succeeded to the see upon the death of the prelate elected in place of Giraldus, who declined the office) from before the high altar, and made him prisoner, but afterwards liberated him, on the payment of a heavy ransom. During this reign, Bangor suffered great devastation in the wars that were carried on between King John and Llewelyn; and, in the reign of Henry III., it was dreadfully ravaged by the continued struggles for empire between that monarch and David ab Llewelyn, whom Richard, at that time bishop of Bangor, and a partisan of the King of England, excommunicated. In these wars, the cathedral was again destroyed, and the bishop, taking refuge in England, was honourably entertained for nearly twenty years in the monastery of St. Alban's.

On the final invasion of Wales by Edward I., the neighbourhood of Bangor became the scene of several engagements, and, in particular, of that disastrous conflict in which fifteen knights, thirty-two esquires, and one thousand soldiers, were slain by the Welsh forces under Richard ab Walwyn, after crossing the Menai strait, at low water, by a bridge of boats. At this time Anian, Bishop of Bangor, being in high favour with Edward, obtained from that monarch the restoration of its various endowments, which had been confiscated during the preceding reign, together with many additional grants and extended privileges: he procured also a grant of Bangor House, in Shoe-lane, London, as a town residence for the prelates, when attending their duties at court. For the better maintenance of the episcopal dignity, he obtained by letters patent from the crown the return of all writs, with all waifs and estrays, in his several manors, and also in the villages of Tregaian, Abydon, and Bôdychan. In 1284, having had the honour of baptizing the young prince Edward, who was born that year in Carnarvon castle, he received a grant of the ferries of Porthaethwy and Cadnant, and the manors of Bangor, Castell-Mawr, and Garthgogo in the county of Carnarvon, with the cantred of Trefos, in the Isle of Anglesey, and, two years afterwards, a confirmation to himself and his successors of a third part of the tithes issuing out of the king's demesnes, mills, and lead mines, in England and Wales. When Edward I. made his extent, or survey, of the revenues of the Prince of Wales, the Bishop of Bangor procured a commission from Chancery, to enquire into the tenures of his see, which survey, called the Bishop's Extent Book, is still preserved among the Harleian Manuscripts in the British Museum. In 1329, Matthew de Englefield obtained for the inhabitants the grant of an annual fair, on the eve, day, and morrow of St. Luke, and of another on the eve, day, and morrow of St. Trillo. During the reign of Henry IV., John Swaffham, having written a book in confutation of the doctrines of Wickliffe, was advanced to the see, as a recompense for his services; and during the rebellion of Owain Glyndwr, Llewelyn Bifort, a Welshman, having been promoted to the bishoprick by that chieftain, without the sanction either of the king or of the Archbishop of Canterbury, his name appears, in 1406, among the chief persons who were outlawed for the part they took in that rebellion: this prelate was taken prisoner, in 1408, by the king's troops, in the battle fought in Yorkshire, in which the Earl of Northumberland was slain; but not having taken any active part in the engagement, nor having borne arms against his sovereign, his life was spared. The conspiracy excited by Owain Glyndwr against the authority of Henry IV., is said to have been contrived chiefly in the house of David Daron, Dean of Bangor, who was also outlawed by that monarch. During this insurrection the city was devastated, and the cathedral destroyed; the latter continued in a state of ruin for nearly ninety years, till Bishop Dean, or Denny, rebuilt the choir, and, on his subsequent translation to the see of Salisbury, left his mitre and crosier, which were of considerable value, to his successor at Bangor, on condition that he should complete those other parts of the building which he had already begun. In the reign of Richard III., Dean Kyfin, who was instituted about the year 1480, was a zealous and active partisan of the Earl of Richmond, the success of whose enterprise he materially contributed to promote, and from whom, after his accession to the throne by the title of Henry VII., he obtained a grant of lands, and permission to endow a chantry in the south transept of the cathedral, at the entrance of which he was interred. During the civil commotions in the reign of Charles I., the city became the scene of great desolation; the services of the church were suspended, and the cathedral was used as a stable for the horses of the parliamentary troops; the monuments, shrines, and other decorations of this venerable structure were defaced and mutilated, and the revenue of the see was alienated and appropriated to the use of the parliament. It was, however, restored to the see after the interregnum; and, in the first of James II., Humphrey Lloyd, bishop of the diocese, obtained an act of parliament for augmenting the revenues of the see, providing for the repair of the cathedral, and for the maintenance of the choir. The same act annexes to the bishoprick the archdeaconries of Bangor and Anglesey, and to the chapter the sinecure rectory of Llanrhaiadr yn Kinmerch and two-thirds of the comportionate rectory of Llandinam. The celebrated Bangorian Controversy originated in this city, from which it took its name, between Dr. Benjamin Hoadley, who presided over the see from 1715 to 1721, when he was translated to Salisbury, and Dr. Thomas Sherlock, who succeeded him in this diocese, and was also translated to Salisbury in 1738, on the advancement of Dr. Hoadley to the see of Winchester.

The city is delightfully situated in a pleasing vale, bounded on the south by lofty and precipitous rocks, and having at the eastern extremity a fine opening towards the adjacent straits of the Menai, and commanding an extensive view of the beautiful bay of Beaumaris, bordered on the opposite side by the rocky shores of Anglesey and the town of Beaumaris. It consists principally of one main street, from which others branch off on the north side, and of some smaller streets on the acclivity of an eminence near the sea: it is neither lighted nor paved. The neighbourhood comprehends a variety of pleasing and picturesque scenery, and in many parts is characterised by features of striking grandeur. At the distance of a few miles, on one side, are the lofty and rugged mountains of Snowdonia, and on the other the wide expanse of waters in the bay of Beaumaris; and in the immediate vicinity of the town are extensive and varied walks and rides through a tract of country abounding with objects of romantic interest. The vast sums expended by government in the improvement of the Holyhead road, and the stupendous works which have been raised in prosecution of that object, have, from their partial locality, contributed to the importance of the city, which, combining with the natural advantages it possesses, might elevate it to a very prominent rank among the commercial towns of the principality. Bangor, which is a member of the port of Beaumaris, carries on little or no trade of importance: coal and the common necessities of life are the only goods brought to it, and are landed from the ships upon the coast, and conveyed away in carts at low water, without the aid of quays or wharfs. The coast is accessible to ships of three hundred tons' burden, which can enter the bay at all states of the tide; and all vessels, however large, can ride securely in the channel, well sheltered from storms, except in violent easterly gales, to which only they are exposed: steam-packets ply regularly between Bangor and Liverpool. The market is on Friday, and, during the summer, a market is also held on Tuesday; they are well supplied, but provisions of all kinds are dear. The fairs are on April 5th, June 25th, September 16th, and October 28th; and there are also large cattle fairs, called "Borth fairs," held at the Menai bridge, in this parish, on August 26th, September 26th, October 24th, and November 14th, to which a greater number of cattle is brought than to any other fairs in North Wales. By the late act for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, Bangor has been constituted one of the six contributory boroughs within the county, which unite in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which are minutely described in the Appendix of this work, is about one hundred and seventy. The bailiffs of Carnarvon are the returning officers. The town-hall and shambles are situated nearly in the centre of the town.

Prior to the union of England and Ireland, a variety of plans was suggested for conducting the great road from London to Dublin over the Menai strait, in lieu of the ancient ferry; but it was not until the increased communication between the two countries, subsequently to the union, had invested the subject with so much additional importance, that it obtained the consideration of government; and in consequence of this, official instructions were given, in 1801, to Mr. Rennie, to survey the strait, and to propose a plan and estimate for a bridge. Pursuant to these, that eminent engineer prepared four designs, two for crossing, by means of a cast-iron arch, or arches, with others of stone at each extremity, at the rock called Ynys y Môch, or "Pig's Island," about one hundred yards from the ferry, where the present suspension bridge has since been erected; and two for crossing at the Swelly rocks, half a mile further southward. But, though no objection was offered to the plans, they were not at that time carried into execution; and nothing further was done regarding the measure until the year 1810, when a parliamentary committee was appointed to enquire into the state of the roads from Shrewsbury and Chester to Holyhead. This committee having reported that no injury would result to the navigation of the Menai by the construction of a bridge across that strait, as proposed by Mr. Rennie, notwithstanding the propagation of contrary opinions, by meddling or interested persons, instructions were issued from the Treasury to Mr. Telford, the engineer, to survey the above-named roads, and to take into consideration the best lines that could be adopted, and the best mode of crossing the strait. This gentleman proposed two designs, one applicable to the Swelly rocks, and the other to Ynys y Môch: the latter, which was intended to consist of a cast-iron arch, five hundred feet in the span, was accompanied with his decided preference, and both were transmitted by the Lords of the Treasury to the parliamentary committee again appointed, in 1811, to enquire into the state of these roads; but, although the erection of a bridge on one of the plans furnished by that able engineer was strongly recommended by the committee, no means were then adopted for carrying it into effect. In 1815, the state of the Irish road through Wales having been again brought under the consideration of parliament, an act was passed appointing a commission to direct the accomplishment of the proposed improvements, and authorising a grant of money from the Treasury. The commissioners appointed Mr. Telford their principal engineer, who, in 1817, was requested to state his opinion regarding the erection of a bridge, on the principle of suspension, across the Menai, and, if he deemed it practicable, to prepare a plan and estimate. Early in the following year, therefore, this gentleman presented to the commissioners a report, design, and estimate, fixing upon Ynys y Môch as the most proper situation. This is a mass of solid rock, rising steeply from the edge of the water, and situated nearly adjacent to the Anglesey shore, with which it is connected by a narrow reef, dry at low water. The opposite, or Carnarvonshire, shore is composed of clay, shale, sandstone, &c., lying in strata much resembling coal measures; and rises from the surface of the water perpendicularly to the height of about forty feet, above which the ground still rises to the ridge separating the valley of the strait from that of the city of Bangor: the breadth between the shores, at high water, is three hundred and six yards, and at low water one hundred and sixty. Mr. Telford proposed that the distance between the centres of the supporting pyramids should be five hundred and sixty feet, the roadway to be preserved uniformly one hundred feet above the reach of spring tides, and the height of the pyramids to be fifty feet above the level of the roadway: the main chains were to be sixteen in number, with a deflection of thirty-seven feet; and their extremities were to be secured in a mass of masonry built over stone arches between each of the supporting piers and the adjacent shore, four on the Anglesey side, and three adjoining the Carnarvonshire shore, each arch to be fifty feet in the span. The roadway was divided into a carriage-way on each side, twelve feet wide, with a foot-path between them, four feet in width. This design having been approved of by the commissioners, a report was made to the Lords of the Treasury, which was laid before parliament, and a grant of £20,000 was obtained for commencing operations, which took place in July 1818. Quarries of limestone, both of a dark and mottled colour, were opened at Penmon Point, the north-eastern extremity of Anglesey, for the erection of the piers, &c.; railways of small extent, for conveying the stone, carpenters' and smiths' shops, a storehouse, office, kiln for burning lime, and quays for the vessels to unload, were soon completed; barracks were erected for the accommodation of the men employed in the quarries; and, notwithstanding that the opposition to the erection of the bridge was revived, on the alleged ground of injury to the navigation, the most active measures were adopted for prosecuting the undertaking. In 1819, the commissioners, in spite of considerable opposition, obtained another act of parliament, which not only empowered them to build the bridge, levy tolls, and purchase Bangor ferry, but to make a new road from the bridge across the Isle of Anglesey to Holyhead. All these preparatory objects having been accomplished, and a considerable quantity of limestone procured from Abergthaw, in Glamorganshire, to be burnt into lime for mortar, the first stone was laid on August 10th, at which period the number of men employed amounted to upwards of two hundred, and of vessels occupied in bringing stone from the quarries, five. In the early part of 1821, it was determined, in lieu of securing the chains over stone arches, to carry them through tunnels, and fasten them to the solid rock that lines the shore: this alteration in the original plan allowed the arches to be sprung at the distance of sixty-five feet above high water mark, those next the main piers being made semicircular, and those towards the land gradually diminishing segments, the crowns of the whole being parallel with the superincumbent roadway. Thus, there is only as much masonry over the arches as is necessary for a proper entablature and cornice; and the small piers being tapered from ten feet to seven and a half in thickness at the spring of the arches, whereby the latter were increased from fifty feet to fifty-two and a half in the span, a greater degree of lightness and elegance has been imparted to the structure. At this period, about four hundred men were employed on the work; and the first cargo of iron-work was delivered on the 3rd of August, the whole having been contracted for to be made of the best hammered iron at Shrewsbury, whence it was conveyed by canal to Chester, and from that port hither by sea; and a machine was subsequently constructed for proving its quality by actual straining. In 1822, application was made to parliament for an act to extend the period for completing the bridge, which, as stated in the former act, would have expired in July 1823; and the number of workmen, owing to the forwardness of the work, was gradually reduced towards the close of this year. The new act, which received the royal assent on the 7th of July, 1823, besides extending the time for completing the bridge to July 1825, invested the commissioners with additional powers; and the Lords of the Treasury were authorised to issue £108,498. 18. for completing the bridge, and for payment of the sum awarded by a jury for the purchase of Bangor ferry, viz., £26,394. The fixing of the main chains was commenced on October 24th; and, to prevent the roadway sinking in the middle below a horizontal line, by their expansion, it was determined that the roadway and side railing should have a rise of two feet towards the middle; and, in order that the deflection of the main chains might not be lessened to the same extent, it was also resolved to increase the height of the pyramids, so as to make their elevation fifty-two feet above the level of the roadway under the archways. Experiments having been made to prove the lateral tension of the chains with various degrees of deflection, in order to ascertain what strain would be exerted in stretching the main chains to their required curvature, a plan was adopted for putting up the main chains, by building the central portion of each upon a raft, then floating it to the bridge, and raising it into its proper place by capstans and other suitable machinery: the first main chain was hoisted on the 26th of April, in presence of a great concourse of spectators. The two middle lines of chains having been suspended, a pathway was formed between them by resting joists on the lower chains of each series, and placing planks upon them parallel with the chains, the three upper chains on each side forming the parapet. The last chain was raised on the 9th of July, and the whole of their suspended parts having been connected by the end of August, the suspension of the roadway bearers was commenced, and a passable roadway was formed by the 24th of September, on which day many of the gentry and other inhabitants of the neighbourhood crossed the bridge. The roadway is formed of deal planks, resting upon sleeping rods, and consists of two carriage-ways, each twelve feet in breadth, with a footway, four feet wide, secured by iron railings running the whole length between them: these roads are formed of two tiers of deal planks, three inches thick, lying longitudinally, with a third, and upper tier, placed transversely, and secured at each end by guards of oak, to prevent the carriage wheels injuring the vertical rods. The approaches to this stupendous structure were next undertaken, and it was determined that the bridge should be opened on January 30th, 1826; and, as the expense of the work had been defrayed by a loan from the public, the first vehicle allowed to cross it was the London and Holyhead mail, on its way downward, about half-past one in the morning, which was followed by the Chester and Holyhead mail, about half-past three; and during the whole day there was a crowd of carriages, horses, and foot passengers on the bridge, whilst the roads leading to it in every direction presented a busy and animated scene. Very soon after its completion the bridge sustained considerable damage from a very violent tempest, owing to the motion of the main chains; to remedy which, four sets of transverse braces were introduced between each series of chains, to prevent them from coming closer together. Between each two lines of braces, consisting of cast-iron tubes, there is a diagonal lacing of wrought-iron, which, with the tubes and bolts, forms a stiff frame, between each series of chains. The completion of the bridge was considerably retarded by gales during the spring; but the additional securities suggested in consequence of the late storms were carried into effect in the early part of the summer, and have served the intended purpose; this magnificent work having braved, uninjured, the storms of succeeding years.

The see, of which the origin and history have been anticipated in the account of the city, with which it is almost identified, is perhaps the most ancient in the principality. It comprises the whole of the Isle of Anglesey; the whole of the county of Carnarvon, with the exception only of four parishes in the hundred of Creuddyn; about one-half of the county of Merioneth; the deanery of Dyfryn Clwyd, in the county of Denbigh;

and seven parishes in the county of Montgomery; and is divided into the three archdeaconries of Anglesey, Bangor, and Merioneth, of which the two first were annexed to the see by an act of parliament passed in the 1st of James II. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, chancellor, precentor, treasurer, archdeacon, two prebendaries, three canons, two vicars choral, an organist, lay clerks, choristers, and other officers. The cathedral church, dedicated to St. Daniel, and, after repeated demolitions, principally rebuilt and restored by the liberality of Bishops Dean and Skeffington, is a handsome cruciform and embattled structure, principally in the later style of English architecture, displaying portions in the early and decorated English styles, with a low massive square embattled tower at the west end, crowned with pinnacles. The whole of the edifice, though not highly enriched with architectural embellishment, has a pleasing symmetry in its proportions, and an appropriate simplicity of character, which is much improved by its situation in a spacious open area, on one side of which is a fine avenue of trees, forming in summer a pleasant promenade. The interior is extremely well lighted by ranges of six windows, in the later English style; in each of the aisles of the nave and transepts, and at the extremities of the latter, as well as at the east end of the choir, are larger windows of elegant design and lofty dimensions. The nave is one hundred and forty-one feet in length, sixty feet wide, including the aisles, and thirty feet high; the roof is supported by ranges of six obtusely pointed arches, resting on octagonal fluted columns, on square plinths, and ornamented with annular capitals, which separate it from the aisles, and is lighted by ranges of circular-headed clerestory windows. Between the eastern extremity of the nave and the choir, and also forming entrances into the transepts, is an area, of which the roof, of loftier elevation, is supported by four obtusely pointed arches, resting upon corbel heads, originally intended to sustain a central tower. The choir, which is a well-proportioned Latin cross, is of the same height as the nave, and is sixty-three feet in length to the altar screen, above which rises to the roof the large east window, twenty-seven feet high, and thirteen feet and a half in width, which was put up about forty years since. The transepts are ninety-six feet in length, from north to south, and thirty-two feet and a half in width, and are partly in the decorated and partly in the later style of English architecture. The present internal arrangement, which is rendered necessary from the want of a parish church, differs materially from that of cathedrals in general. The organ screen is placed across the nave, nearly in the centre, dividing it into two portions, of which the eastern is connected with the choir, and contains the bishop's throne and family pew, and the prebendal stalls, which are of highly enriched tabernacle work. The prebendal stalls are ranged in this portion of the nave, twelve on each side, commencing from the organ screen, and the remainder, together with the choir and the transepts, is regularly pewed and fitted up for divine service. The western portion of the nave is appropriated to the performance of morning and evening service, every Sunday, in the Welsh language, according to the usual ceremonies of the church; in addition to which there are two full cathedral services in the choir, which are performed in the English language. The whole length of the cathedral is two hundred and fourteen feet, and its breadth along the transepts ninety-six feet; the tower is sixty feet high, and, but for the premature death of Bishop Skeffington, would have been raised to the height of one hundred and twenty feet. There are few monuments of importance, either for their antiquity or for their architectural character; the tomb of the renowned Gruffydd ab Cynan, King of North Wales, on the left side of the altar, was formerly surmounted by a shrine, which was destroyed during the parliamentary war; and under an arch at the south end of the transept is the effigy, in stone, of his successor, Owain Gwynedd, recumbent on a sarcophagus ornamented with a cross fleury. Several of the bishops have been interred in the cathedral, but there is nothing worthy of notice in the small monuments which have been raised to their memory. A gravestone marks the place of interment of William Wynne, M. A., author of a history of Wales, chiefly compiled from the chronicles of Caradoc of Llancarvan. The north aisle of the choir has been separated from the remainder, to serve the purposes of a chapter-house, consistorial court, and library: in the last is preserved a manuscript of Bishop Anian, forming a folio volume of moderate size, entitled Liber Pontificalis Dñi Anniani Bangor Episcopi, containing a missal, which, in addition to the rubric, includes thirty-two offices and numerous anthems set to music for the use of the cathedral of Bangor and other churches. This volume appears to have been drawn up by the bishop about the year 1291, and to have formed one of those provincial diversities in the mode of performing the service of the church, which were prohibited by the statute of Uniformity, in the preamble of which it is expressly named. During the commotions in the time of Owain Glyndwr, this volume was lost, but was restored to the church by Bishop Ednam, in 1485; and during the occupation of the cathedral by the parliamentary troops, in the reign of Charles I., it was again carried away, but was afterwards recovered by Bishop Humphreys. The episcopal palace, in which Mr. Pennant, in 1770, observes that "the prelate is indifferently lodged," was, after its previous demolitions, almost entirely rebuilt by Bishop Skeffington, in the early part of the sixteenth century; it was much improved by Bishop Warren, and other alterations and additions have since been made by his successor, Dr. Majendie. The deanery, a handsome building to the north-west of the cathedral, and adjoining the cemetery, was erected towards the close of the seventeenth century. The parish of Bangor, of which the city forms but a small portion, was united with that of Pentir previously to the year 1402, when the latter was wrested from it by the abbot of Valle Crucis, who, in 1444, was compelled to restore it, and they were re-united, but again separated at the Reformation: in an action tried at Shrewsbury, however, in 1657, they were again re-united, and have ever since been reputed to form one parish, of which Pentir is considered only a township, and to which its church is now deemed a chapel of ease. The tithes of the whole are equally divided between the vicars choral, who perform the parochial duty, previously to which arrangement, the vicars were accustomed to begin the service in the choir, and, after proceeding to the first lesson for the day, in the English language, to retire to the nave and finish the service in the Welsh language. The living is thus a consolidated comportionate vicarage, not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop. Of the ancient parochial church, founded by Edgar, and dedicated to St. Mary, not a single fragment is remaining. The site of an old chapel was sold, some years since, and the money applied to the redemption of the land-tax: a house has been built near the church on another plot of ground, as a vicarage-house, in which one of the vicars resides. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded in 1557, by Geoffrey Glynn, L.L.D., advocate of the court of Arches, and brother to Dr. William Glynn, Bishop of Bangor, who bequeathed the friary house, with all its appurtenances, and all his lands in North Wales, or elsewhere, in trust to the bishops of Bangor and Rochester, and their successors for its foundation and endowment, and also £400 in money, to be invested in the purchase of land, of the yearly value of £20, to be divided equally among ten poor scholars on the foundation. The trustees dying before the intentions of the testator could be carried into effect, the completion of the design devolved upon Sir William Petre and others, who, with the concurrence of the bishop, determined upon the statutes and regulations for its government, which were drawn up by Dr. Alexander Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's, and the school was established by letters patent in the third year of the reign of Elizabeth. The revenue arising from the endowment is £230. 13. 10.; there are at present about forty day pupils, but the school is free for one hundred boys, being "poor men's children;" and the master has the privilege of taking boarders. Two scholarships were founded in Jesus' College, Oxford, by Bishop Rowlands, in 1609, to which, after his own kindred, the scholars of Bangor and Beaumaris have the preference. The ancient friary was formerly appropriated to the use of this establishment, but early in the present century it was taken down and a handsome brick building erected upon its site, comprising a good house, with twenty acres of land adjoining it, for the head master, a house with land for the usher, and a commodious school-room, to which a play-ground is attached. Bishop Rowlands also bequeathed an estate for the endowment of an almshouse, which he had founded during his lifetime, for six single men, of whom one was to be of the parish of Penmynydd, two from those of Aberdaron and Meylltyn, and the rest from the town and parish of Bangor, and the parishes of Llangrystiolys and Amlwch, to each of whom were allowed two shillings per week, and six yards of frieze, annually for clothing: these almshouses have been rebuilt, upon an enlarged scale, on the south side of the cemetery of the cathedral, and afford two rooms to each of the inmates, who, from the increased value of the land, receive each seven shillings per week, with a suit of clothes annually, and a proper supply of bedding, linen, and coal. In addition to these, the same benefactor bequeathed £100 for the repair of the cathedral; and Dean Jones, in 1719, gave £100 for purchasing an altar-piece, the whole of his books to the chapter library, and £100 towards the establishment of a permanent parochial school for poor children. A National school for boys, and another for girls, were erected in 1822, by subscription, aided by a grant of £90 from the society in London:

in these schools, which are adapted to the reception of three hundred children, one hundred and fourteen boys, and one hundred and nine girls, are at present gratuitously instructed. Another National school, in which seventy-five children are taught, was built at Vaenol, in this parish, in 1816, by subscription, aided by a grant of £30 from the society; and a third has been erected at the village of Pentir, near the church, containing about sixty scholars. An infant school has been recently established, which is well supported and promises to be highly beneficial. At a short distance from the town, on the London road, is the Carnarvonshire and Anglesey Loyal dispensary, instituted in 1809, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III. to the throne, as a testimony of loyalty and affection to their sovereign, by a party of gentlemen, who had determined to celebrate that day by the establishment of some permanent charity, and finally resolved upon building a dispensary for gratuitously supplying the poor with medical and surgical assistance. A substantial and commodious building has been erected for the purpose, and the benefits of the institution, under the conduct of proper officers, are extensively and advantageously administered. The whole expense of the establishment is liberally defrayed by subscription among the gentry resident in the neighbourhood. A house of friars preachers was founded here prior to the year 1276, and was probably enlarged or rebuilt about the year 1299, by Tudor ab Gronow, Lord of Penmynydd and Treacastle, who, from that circumstance has been commonly regarded its founder, and who was interred in the chapel of that establishment, in 1311: in the seventh of Edward VI., the site was granted to Thomas Brown and William Breton, and it subsequently became the property of Dr. Geoffrey Glynn, who bequeathed it, with other possessions, as above related, for the endowment of the free grammar school. Of the castle erected near the city, by the Earl of Chester, there are only some slight vestiges: a few traces of the walls may be discerned, which appear to have extended one hundred and twenty yards on the south-east, and about sixty-six yards on the south-west, terminating in a precipice; on the north-east they appear to have extended for more than forty yards, and on the north-west the natural strength of its situation rendered any other defence unnecessary. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £1438. 12.

BANGOR-ISCOED, a parish comprising the townships of Eyton, Pickhill, Ryton, and Sesswick, in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and the township of Bangor, in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, all which separately support their own poor, and containing 1389 inhabitants, of which number, 648 are in the township of Bangor, 5 miles (S.E.) from Wrexham, on the road to Whitchurch. This place, which has received the adjunct of Iscoed, to distinguish it from the city of Bangor in Carnarvonshire, was the station Banchorium of Richard of Cirencester, and is generally thought to have been the Bovium, or Bonium, of Antonine. It was the site of the most ancient and extensive monastery founded in Britain, which, having also been intended as a school for religious instruction, became a great seminary for learning: from this institution, the foundation of which is ascribed to Lucius, King of Britain, under whose auspices Christianity was firmly established in this country, it obtained its British name Ban-Gôr, which was changed by the Saxons into Banchorna-byrig, a name descriptive of its importance as a privileged town. Pelagius, the noted arch-heretic, who is affirmed to have been a native of Britain, and whose paternal name was Morgan, was educated in this monastery, of which he became abbot, about the commencement of the fifth century: the Pelagian heresy was principally eradicated by St. Germanus, who is said to have introduced considerable improvement into this institution. Augustine, having been sent by Pope Gregory to re-establish Christianity in England, by converting the Saxons, endeavoured to extend the power of the church of Rome, by usurping an authority over the British prelates. But the latter resisting, a great council of the clergy was convened, at which seven bishops and many learned men from the monastery of Bangor were present: the British deputies continued firm in their refusal to submit to St. Augustine, or aid him in his intended conversion of the Saxons; in consequence of which the mortified missionary denounced against them the judgment of God, predicting that, as they would not accept peace with their Christian brethren, they would soon have war with their pagan enemies, and that they would speedily find death by the swords of those to whom they had refused to preach the word of life: this threat was accomplished, a few years afterwards, in the battle of Chester, by the slaughter of eleven hundred and fifty, out of twelve hundred, monks who had gone forth to pray for the success of their countrymen, the Welsh, against the Northumbrian Saxons, by whom, under Ethelfrid, that ancient city had been attacked. The Saxons, having defeated their opponents and taken possession of Chester, advanced to Bangor, where they entirely destroyed the monastery, and committed its valuable library to the flames: they then intended to penetrate into Wales, but their passage over the Dee at this place was disputed by Brochwel Yscithrog, Prince of Powys, who successfully resisted all their attacks, until relieved by Cadvan, King of North Wales; Meredydd, King of South Wales; and Bledrus, sovereign of Cornwall. The confederate princes called to their aid the services of Dunawd, or Dunothus, abbot of Bangor, and one of the fifty monks that had escaped the general massacre of his brethren, who delivered an oration to the army, which he concluded by ordering the soldiers to kiss the ground, before the action commenced, in commemoration of the communion of the body of Christ, and to take up water in their hands out of the river Dee, and drink it, in remembrance of his sacred blood. This act of devotion infused a confident courage among the Welsh, already ardent for revenge for the calamities which they had recently endured; and they encountered the invaders with such bravery as entirely to defeat them, with the loss of above ten thousand men, compelling Ethelfrid, with the remainder of his army, to retreat into his own country. From this disastrous infliction the monastery of Bangor never recovered: the surviving monks were dispersed throughout the interior of the country, many of them having settled in North Wales, and others probably serving as a supply to the ministry of the church in South Wales, and in Armorica. At one period the entire establishment here is said to have consisted of two thousand four hundred brethren, of whom one hundred officiated by turns for one hour, thus performing divine service both day and night, whilst many of the others laboured for the benefit of the community. Of the vast pile of buildings that composed the monastery, the ruins of which are described by William of Malmesbury, a short time after the Norman Conquest, as consisting of numerous half-demolished churches and mutilated remains, the only vestiges are parts of the foundations, extending for a considerable distance along the eastern bank of the river Dee, which flows between the sites of two of the ancient gates, of which they still retain the names; the one being called "Porth Kleis," one mile to the south of the church, on the road to Overton; and the other "Porth Wgan," one mile and a quarter west-north-westward from it, on the road to Wrexham.

The village is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the Dee, which is navigable to this place, and is here crossed by a handsome bridge of five arches, connecting the counties of Denbigh and Flint. The parish contains about eight thousand acres, of which about five thousand are composed of a stiff clay, the remainder being meadow land, generally of a sandy loam: the ground is chiefly flat, and about two thousand acres are subject to inundation from the overflowing of the Dee. The adjacent scenery in many places is beautiful and richly picturesque, the noble sweeps of the Dee being frequently overshadowed by thick hanging woods, which fringe its elevated banks. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Overton annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £39. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Westminster. The church, dedicated to St. Dinoh, who was abbot of the monastery when Augustine landed in England, and canonized after his death, appears to have been built at various periods, though the greater part of it is of modern erection. The communion table of white marble, and the floor within the rails, of black and white marble, were the gift of Mr. Lloyd; and the altar-piece and tablets of mahogany, with gilt mouldings, were presented by Mr. Peter Lloyd, in 1775: the font, which is very ancient, is ornamented with sculptured heads and shields bearing the Cross of Calvary, surmounted by the Welsh plume. The arms of the several rectors of the parish, from the year 1662 to the present time, with the dates of their respective induction, are arranged in the hall of the rectory. A parochial free school was founded in 1728, by Lady Dorothy Jeffreys, widow of Chief Justice Jeffreys, who gave £500 to be laid out in the purchase of lands for teaching and apprenticing poor children. There are several charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor, of which the principal are, a legacy of £60 by Mr. Thomas Lloyd, £50 by Mr. E. Price, Sen., a tenement in Iscoed by Mr. E. Price, Jun., £50 by the Rev. Hugh Morris, £40 by Thomas Tunna, a plot of ground by Margaret Lloyd, and a tenement called the Graig and £200 in money by Mr. Peter Lloyd, the proceeds of which are periodically distributed in bread and money. The Roman road to the station Banchorium passed through the village, a little to the south of the church; and, in digging graves in the churchyard, Roman pavements are occasionally found. The average annual expenditure of the parish for the support of its poor

BARDSEY ISLE, a small island in St. George's channel, near Cardigan bay, an extra-parochial district, locally in the parish of Aberdaron, in the hundred of DINLLAEN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, lying off the promontory of Llyn, from which it is separated by Bardsey Race, three miles in breadth, containing 84 inhabitants. This island, from the remotest known period of antiquity, appears to have been the resort of devotees, who, retiring from the cares of the world, sought an asylum here, where they passed the remainder of their lives and were buried. St. Dubricius, Bishop of Caerleon, resigning his see to St. David, retired to this solitary spot, where, dying about the year 612, he was interred; but his remains were afterwards removed to Llandaf. After the slaughter of the monks of Bangor, not only the brethren who survived, but numerous other Britons, who had embraced the Christian doctrines, took refuge in the island. Prior to the time of St. Dubricius, this was probably a retreat of the Culdees, the first religious recluses in Britain, for whose secret worship of the Almighty its retired situation was peculiarly auspicious. Before the death of St. Dubricius, a monastery was founded in the island, probably by the monks who joined him after the massacre at Bangor, and dedicated to St. Mary, which subsequently became more eminent for its sanctity than for the extent of its endowments. In the reign of Edward II., a petition was, according to the Sebright manuscripts, presented to that monarch by the abbot, complaining of exaction on the part of the sheriff of Carnarvon, which procured redress. The monastery continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue amounted to £58. 6. 2. There are only some small portions of the abbey remaining: the site was granted by Edward VI. to Sir Thomas Seymour, and afterwards to the Earl of Warwick. The island, now the property of Lord Newborough, is two miles and a half in length, and one and a half in breadth. From the violence of the current which runs through the sound, it obtained the British name Ynys Enlli, or the island in the current, and by the Saxons it was, from its being a favourite retreat of the bards, named Bardsey, or the island of the bards. The shores and sand-banks in this part of the channel render the navigation exceedingly dangerous, and numerous vessels have been lost: to prevent the recurrence of similar disasters, a lighthouse, with a flashing light, was erected on the island, in 1821, and lighted for the first time on the 24th of December in that year. The tower is a substantial and handsome square structure, seventy-four feet high, surmounted by a lantern ten feet high; and, being built on an elevation sixty-two feet above the level of the sea, the light is one hundred and forty-six feet above high water mark at spring tides. The south side of the island being the first headland that appears in navigating the channel, the erection of this lighthouse became an object of the greatest importance, and its completion has been attended with the utmost benefit to the numerous vessels connected with the port of Liverpool.

BARELAND, a joint township with BORVA, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W.) from Presteign, containing, with the township of Evenjobb, 369 inhabitants. It is situated on the border of Herefordshire, and is passed on the west, at the distance of about half a mile, by that remarkable work of the Saxons, Offa's Dyke. It is assessed jointly with the township of Evenjobb for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £228. 12.

BARMELE, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 115 inhabitants. .

BARMOUTH (ABER-MAW), a small sea-port and market town, in the parish of LLANABER, hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 10½ miles (W. by S.) from Dôlgeley, and 222 (W.N.W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. The present name of this place is an Anglicism of the original name Aber Maw, denoting its situation at the mouth of the river Maw, or Mawddach, and was adopted in 1768, at a meeting of the masters of vessels belonging to the port, when, in consideration of the increase of the shipping, it was deemed expedient to have an English name inscribed upon the sterns of the vessels. The town is beautifully situated on the northern side of the river, at the point where it pours its waters into Cardigan bay: the æstuary of the Maw, which forms its port, is a mile in breadth at high water. The beach is a fine smooth sand, extending from the harbour northward to Traeth Artro, where the small river Artro falls into the sea, and is peculiarly adapted to the purpose of sea-bathing, for which the water of the bay is still more efficacious than on other parts of the coast, owing to the frequent agitation of the tides, which in St. George's channel are violent, and dash furiously on the rocks that line this part of the coast. The air is rendered mild and salubrious by the situation of the town at the base and on the acclivities of high hills, which shelter it from the north and north-east winds. The view from the beach is strikingly magnificent: the hills on the opposite shores of Carnarvonshire are seen in the distance towards the west, and towards the north the view of the sea is bounded by lofty mountains, apparently forming majestic ramparts for the defence of the coast, and beyond which, in clear weather, may be seen the peak of Snowdon, towering above the rest. The appearance of the town, as viewed from the sea, is peculiarly romantic: the houses, rising in successive tiers from the base nearly to the summit, are scattered along the brow of the mountain, which is a barren rock, and assume a character singularly picturesque. On the banks of the river is found a profusion of scurvy grass, the efficacy of which, in conjunction with the benefit of sea-bathing, is supposed to have originally made Barmouth a place of resort for invalids; and the salubrity of the air, the fineness of the beach, the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and the varied and interesting excursions which the environs afford, have contributed to render it a place of fashionable resort during the summer months, and to raise it to an eminent rank among the watering-places on this part of the coast. There is an excellent hotel, provided with every accommodation, to which a capacious boarding-house is attached; and numerous respectable lodging-houses have been erected for the accommodation of families. Warm and cold sea water baths have been constructed by the proprietor of the hotel, by whose exertions many improvements have been made, and are now in progress, in the town: opposite to the hotel is also a billiard-room, erected by the same gentleman; and assemblies are held at the hotel during the season. Among the interesting excursions in the neighbourhood are, a pleasing ride to Harlech castle, about ten miles to the north of the town, a great part of which is over the fine sands that stretch along the coast; and the ride from Barmouth to Dôlgelley, about the same distance towards the east, which comprehends a finer range of varied scenery, and of interesting and magnificent objects, than can be found within the same distance, either in this or perhaps in any other country: the road is conducted along the slope of a vast mountain, which impends over it for about two miles, and on the opposite side is skirted by the river, which forms a small arm of the sea, and at high water reflects the masses of barren rock which rise from its steep banks, occasionally interspersed with hanging woods, and varied with spots of luxuriant verdure. Beyond this point, the road winds beautifully through the lower hills, at a small distance from the river, which is seen through the different openings, partly concealed by intervening eminences, and sometimes expanding into a broad lake, from the margin of which, on either side, rise lofty and abrupt promontories, some of them rugged and barren, others half clothed with purple heath, and others again richly wooded. The banks of the river are occasionally enlivened by a few scattered rural dwellings, erected on the acclivities, at a great height above its channel; and on the opposite side, several rivulets, descending from the mountain with impetuosity, and after rains swelled into torrents, discharge themselves into the river. In the back ground, towering above the mountains which bound the view, is seen the lofty Cader Idris, on the other side of Dôlgelley. Throughout the whole of this beautiful ride the most pleasing and the most sublime features of landscape are strikingly grouped, and the most interesting varieties are beautifully combined. The waterfalls in the neighbourhood of Dôlgelley, and the Druidical remains on the road to Harlech, are objects of great attraction, and are deservedly admired.

Barmouth is a creek to the port of Aberystwith. Prior to the late war with France, the inhabitants carried on a commercial intercourse with Ireland, Spain, and Italy; but the trade is now principally coastwise, and consists chiefly in the exportation of timber, poles for collieries, bark, copper and lead ore, black jack, manganese, turnery, webs, and slates; and in the importation of corn, flour and meal, coal, limestone, American and Baltic timber, hides, and grocery. The harbour is formed by the mouth of the river Maw being partially closed by a small island, called Ynys y Brawd, or the Friar's Island, and a gravel beach to the south: this island defends it from the billows of the ocean, and anciently afforded pasturage for sheep and cattle, but, owing to the shifting of the sands, a great part is now inundated. The entrance is rendered somewhat difficult and dangerous, in consequence of these sands, the principal of which are the banks called the North and South Bars; so that vessels of considerable burden can only enter and depart at spring tides. In the year 1802, the harbour was greatly improved by the erection of a small pier, or embankment of stone, under the authority of an act of parliament, and at a total expense of £1660, by which the depth of water was increased, and the loading and unloading of vessels considerably facilitated: at the same time a new quay was also constructed. A buoy has been laid down upon each of the bars, and a beacon has been erected near the pier; so that the natural obstacles opposed to the growth of the commerce of this port have been in a great measure removed. The river Maw, over which there is a ferry at this place, is navigable for boats under twenty tons' burden to within two miles of Dôlgelley. The sea has made considerable encroachment on this part of the coast: to the north of the town there was formerly a verdant plain, about half a mile long, and a quarter of a mile broad, now entirely covered by its waters, and over which passed the line of road which has since been cut along the rocky elevations to the right. Ship-building and the tanning of leather are carried on here, the latter to a considerable extent. A great quantity of peat is obtained in a neighbouring turbary, through which a canal has been cut, walled on each side with stone, by means of which and the river Maw this species of fuel is conveyed in vessels either to Barmouth or Dôlgelley. Here are two weekly markets, on Tuesday and Friday; and fairs are held on Shrove-Monday, Whit-Monday, October 7th, and November 21st. In 1830, a chapel of ease was erected, at an expense of £2000: it is a neat cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, containing four hundred and seventy sittings, half of which are free, in consideration of a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society for building, enlarging, and repairing churches and chapels. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, to which are attached Sunday schools, supported by subscription. A branch establishment, belonging to the Merchants' Hospital in London, was established here, in 1828.

BARRY, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. W.) from Cardiff, containing 72 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, by which it is bounded on the south, and comprises but a small tract of country, of which the surface is pleasingly diversified and richly ornamented with woods of luxuriant growth, and thriving coppices of underwood. The surrounding scenery is generally pleasing, and the views extending over the channel and the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. The soil, though various, is in general fertile and productive, and the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. The living is a rectory, not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of R. Jones, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £28. 13.

BARRY ISLAND, in the parish of BARRY, hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. W. by S.) from Cardiff. The population is returned with the parish. This small islet, situated in a sandy bay of the Bristol channel, is separated from the main land only by a narrow isthmus, which is dry at low water: it is about one mile and a half in circumference, and comprises about three hundred acres of land, let as one farm, but chiefly in a wild state of heath and warren, abounding with rabbits, and producing only a scanty herbage for a few sheep and cattle. Lead-ore and calamine are stated to have been formerly obtained among the limestone of which the island consists. It is supposed to have derived its name from St. Baruch, a disciple of Gísalch, who was interred here in the year 700, and, in later times, was in the possession of the family of de Barri, one of the most distinguished members of which was Giraldus de Barri, otherwise, Cambrensis, who was born at Manorbeer, in the county of Pembroke, where the remains of their castle may still be seen; some of the descendants of this family afterwards settled in Ireland, and became ennobled. Leland describes it as bearing "very good Corne, Grasse, and sum Wood;" and says, "There ys no Dwelling in the Isle, but ther is in the midle of it a fair litle Chapel of S. Barrok, wher much Pilgrimage was usid." Since his time a house has been erected, as a residence for the farmer, which is fitted up in summer for the reception of persons desirous of enjoying in retirement the salutary pleasure of sea-bathing. On the western side of the island, opposite to the ruins of Barry castle, are faint vestiges of a similar structure, and of two ancient chapels, in one of which the hermit St. Baruch was interred. Towards the southern side, at a place called Nell's Point, there is a well, much resorted to on Holy Thursday by females, who, having washed their eyes with the water, each drop a pin into it, the memorial of some ancient custom, or offering to the presiding saint. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his description of the island, gives an account of a small cavity in a rock near the entrance to it, from which, on applying the ear, proceeded a noise resembling that of blacksmiths at work, the blowing of bellows, strokes of hammers, grinding of tools, and roaring of furnaces; and is at a loss to conjecture its cause, as the same sounds were heard at low water, as at the ebb and flow of the tide, which might produce this effect by the influx of the waters under the cavities of the rocks. Modern writers, however, have not been able to discover any cavity whence these subterraneous noises issue, and the phenomenon, if it ever existed except in a fanciful imagination, exists no longer.

BATTLE, a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N.W. by W.) from Brecknock, containing 192 inhabitants. This place, though traditionally said to have derived its name from a battle, in which the last of the Brechinian princes, Bleddyn ab Maenyrch, was defeated and slain by Bernard de Newmarch, is, with greater probability, supposed to have been so called in honour of the monastery of Battle, in the county of Sussex, to which abbey the priory of Brecknock was made a cell by its founder Bernard de Newmarch, the whole, or greater part, of this parish having belonged to the latter priory. Prior to the commencement of the fourteenth century, it was a hamlet in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, in the town of Brecknock, in the church of which the inhabitants have still a chapel, to which they resorted for divine service prior to the erection of their church, and in which they still occasionally bury their dead. The village is situated near the river Yscir, which falls into the Usk at Aberyscir; and the neighbourhood, in which are several neat villas and handsome seats, abounds with romantically beautiful and richly varied scenery. Pennoyre, the seat of John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, Esq., is a handsome modern residence, surrounded by a very extensive demesne, of which the grounds are laid out with appropriate taste: the approach is by an avenue of great length, which is not yet completed: the views from the house are extensive, and comprehend an expanse of scenery which is at once superb and sublime: through a small vista on the east are seen the village of Llandew, and Peytyn Gwŷn, the latter, in the early part of his lifetime, the residence of the celebrated Sir David Gam; and in the back ground are the Black mountains, in the direction of Talgarth. On the west is a fine view of the beautiful Vale of Usk and the grounds above Penpont, beyond which is Abercamlais, skirted behind by the mountains of Llywel and Devynock. The view from the south is richly magnificent; nearly opposite to the house is the knoll of Venny-Vâch, luxuriantly clothed with wood, beyond which the precipitous and majestic summits of the Beacons lift their aspiring heads. The appearance of the Beacons, which from this spot are seen to great advantage, is always interesting, though varying according to the state of the atmosphere: in fine weather the whole outline may be distinctly traced, in all the irregularity of its extent; and in cloudy or rainy weather, the clouds, which are continually hovering over, or breaking on, their summits, assume an appearance indescribably beautiful. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late John Browne, Esq.: there is neither parsonage nor glebe attached to the living. The church, dedicated to St. Cynog, is supposed to have been built by the prior and convent of St. John's, Brecknock, at the commencement of the fourteenth century, when it first became parochial: it is a small unadorned edifice, situated on an eminence above the Yscir, commanding a fine view of one reach of the Usk, with the wood of Venny-Vâch in front, and the beautiful plantations of Penpont and Abercamlais, fringing the slopes down to the very margin of the river, in the western horizon: the east window, for the repair of which the sum of twelvepence was bequeathed in 1573, is in the later style of English architecture: the sacramental cup, on which the letters W. P. D., and the date 1576 are engraved, is supposed to be the oldest in the county. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. In the neighbourhood are several objects, the names of which are supposed to allude to the battle before mentioned: these are Heol y Cymry, "the Welshmen's lane;" Cwm gwŷr y gad, "the wood of the vale of battle;" and Fynon Pen Rhŷs, or "the well of Rhŷs' head," near which the unfortunate Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, who had just escaped from the battle of Hîrwaun Wrgan, after being defeated by Robert Fitz-Hamon, is said to have lost his head: there is also a maen hîr, or long upright stone, situated to the south of the church; and the remains of a Roman encampment, where fragments of military weapons and several coins have been found, are discernible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £88. 15.

BAUSELEY, a township in that part of the parish of ALBERBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Welshpool, containing 365 inhabitants. This township, situated on the border of Shropshire, separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £105. 15.

BAYDEN, a chapelry in the parish of LLANGONOYD, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from Bridgend, containing 167 inhabitants. This chapelry is also called Lower Llangonoyd: it contains some well-wooded enclosures on the southern declivity of an extensive common. The chapel, which is supposed to have been a private one, is now in ruins. There is a small charitable bequest for such poor persons as do not receive parochial relief. This place separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £45. 3.

BAYVILL, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Newport, containing 160 inhabitants. This small parish, which is situated in the northern part of the county, and within a short distance of the coast, is intersected by a tributary stream, which rises to the north of the church, and falls into the river Nevern near its influx into the sea at Newport bay. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Moylegrove, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, and endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Independents. The poor are supported by an average annual assessment amounting to £24. 5.

Arms.

BEAUMARIS, a sea-port, borough, market town, and chapelry, having exclusive jurisdiction, in the parish of LLANDEGVAN, locally in the hundred of Tyndaethwy, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Bangor, and 249 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 2497 inhabitants. This place, which is the county town of Anglesey, was anciently called Porth Wgyr: it derives its present name from its situation in a fine open flat, formerly marshy, but now a fertile plain, on the western shore of the Menai strait, near its junction with the Irish sea, where it expands into a good roadstead, called Beaumaris Bay. For some centuries prior to the erection of the present town, which owes its origin and progress to the castle subsequently built here by Edward I., Beaumaris had attained a considerable degree of importance, and was distinguished as one of the three principal ports of the Isle of Britain. In 818, a sanguinary engagement took place in the immediate neighbourhood, between the Welsh and the West Saxons, the latter led by their king Egbert, who, having subdued the country as far as Snowdon, took possession of the Isle of Mona, which was henceforward called by the English Angles-ey, or Anglesey, signifying "the Englishmen's Isle." But the Welsh sovereign, Mervyn Vrych, continually on the alert to recover his possessions and repel the invaders, carried on a desultory and successful warfare; and Egbert and his Saxon forces, unable to contend with that valiant chieftain and with the severities of a hard winter, abandoned the island, and returned into his own kingdom.

In 1096, Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, entering into a confederacy, united their forces, and carried slaughter and devastation through the whole of North Wales; and, having landed a powerful army at Cadnant, they advanced against this town, of which they made themselves masters. To secure their conquests, they erected, in the immediate neighbourhood, the fortress of Llewiniog, or Aberllienawg, by means of which, in conjunction with the castle of Bangor, they commanded the whole of the Menai strait, and reduced the islanders to the lowest state of vassalage and degradation. But their career of usurpation and tyranny was interrupted by the unexpected arrival of Magnus, son of Harold, King of Norway, whose landing was opposed by the confederate earls; but Magnus, who was standing upon the prow of his ship, called to his side an expert archer, and both discharged their arrows at the Earl of Shrewsbury, who, in complete armour, was standing on the shore, and an arrow entering his brain through the eye which was undefended by the vizor of his helmet, he fell dead on the spot. The Earl of Chester was soon after driven from the island, and compelled to retreat to Bangor, where he for some time fixed his abode, carrying on a desultory warfare with the inhabitants of Anglesey, whom he annoyed with frequent aggressions, which led only to slight skirmishes. From this period nothing of historical importance is recorded of this place, till the time of Edward I., when that monarch, having reduced the whole of Wales under his authority, and erected the splendid castles of Carnarvon and Aberconway, found himself still unable to retain quiet possession of his newly-acquired dominions, and exposed to continual insurrections of the native princes and chieftains. The Isle of Anglesey at this time was the principal rendezvous of all the native chiefs, who, notwithstanding their formal submission to the authority of Edward, were constantly endeavouring to throw off the English yoke. Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, and after him Madock, his illegitimate son, made this the theatre of their several insurrections for this purpose; and Edward saw the impossibility of putting an end to these, while Anglesey, without an English garrison, afforded such facility for combinations, which threatened the stability of his government in Wales. He therefore found it necessary to erect a castle, equal in strength and importance to those which he had previously built at Carnarvon and Aberconway, and to place in it a formidable garrison, to counteract the efforts of the unsubdued spirit of the Welsh. For this purpose he selected Porth Wgyr, which at that time had acquired the appellation of Bonovr, and was peculiarly adapted from its situation to command the island; and, from the low site on which he built it, Edward gave to the castle the name of Beaumaris. The ground on which the fortress was erected being private property, Edward gave to the owners other lands in exchange for it, of equal or superior value; and its low situation on a flat on the sea-shore afforded the opportunity of surrounding it with a deep fosse, which might at any time be filled from the sea, and of cutting a canal by which vessels might deliver their cargoes under the walls of the castle.

This fortress was completed in the year 1296, and in the same year Edward incorporated the inhabitants of the town by charter, investing them with valuable and important privileges, and appointing the constable of the castle to be also captain of the town. Most writers state that the town owes its origin to the erection of this castle; but, from reference to the records of the corporation, it appears that it must have attained some degree of importance prior to that era, and probably Edward, who, after the completion of the castle, surrounded the town with walls and made considerable additions to it as a fortified place, may, from that circumstance, have been regarded as its founder. The first governor appointed to the command of the castle was Sir William Pickmore, a Gascon, with an annual salary of forty marks, afterwards increased to £40; and, according to the Calendar of the patent rolls in the Tower, published by the commissioners of the public records, the custody of the castle was granted for life, by Richard II., to Gronow ab Tudor, and afterwards by Henry IV., together with the whole county and dominion of Anglesey, to the renowned Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur. The garrison, which usually consisted of twenty-four men, were frequently involved in disputes with the inhabitants of the town, and, in the reign of Henry VI., a sanguinary conflict took place between them, in which Davydd ab Evan ab Howel and many others were killed. The maintenance of the castle was found extremely burdensome to the country, and, in consequence of continued complaints of the general misconduct of the men, the garrison was withdrawn in the reign of Henry VII., with the exception only of the governor, Sir Rowland Villeville, who was continued in his office of constable of the castle. From this time the castle was without a garrison, till the year 1642, when Thomas Cheadle, deputy of the Earl of Dorset, then constable, placed in it a body of men and supplies of ammunition, in order to retain possession of it for the king during the civil war, which now threatened to become general. The year following, Thomas Bulkeley, Esq., soon after created Lord Bulkeley, succeeded to the governorship of the castle; and his son, Col. Bulkeley, and several gentlemen of the county, held it for the king till 1646, when it was surrendered on honourable terms to General Mytton. Charles' subsequent captivity produced, in 1648, together with partial insurrections in other parts of the country, that general revolt of the inhabitants of Anglesey, which is more fully noticed in the article on that county, and which gave rise to the parliamentary expedition for the reduction of this island. As soon as the parliamentary forces, under the command of General Mytton, appeared on Penmaen-Mawr, the greatest demonstrations of defiance were made by the inhabitants of this place, by whom they were desecrated from Beaumaris Green; but, after a slight skirmish near Cadnant, with Major Hugh Pennant's troop of horse, General Mytton advanced with his forces, without further opposition, to Orsedd Migin, where they held a rendezvous the morning after their landing, and whence they marched immediately upon Beaumaris, by way of Red Park, and drew up in order of battle upon the hill. The islanders, commanded by Col. Bulkeley and Col. Roger Whiteley, drew up in the fields below the hill, assisted by the town's company, commanded by Captain Sanders. The parliamentary forces began the attack, but were resolutely repulsed by the town's company, and at the same time charged by the cavalry; but the rest of the infantry on the side of the royalists soon fled in disorder, and the remainder being overpowered by numbers, and the town being closely pressed, the islanders were dispersed, and the royalist commanders, with most of the officers, retired into the castle. Captain Lloyd, of Penhênllŷs, who had been ordered to defend the church, locked his men within it, and ran away, taking the key with him; but the men, notwithstanding, climbed upon the roof and the steeple, and, firing upon the assailants, killed a considerable number, among whom were three of the parliamentary officers. General Mytton, having at length entered the town, immediately despatched a messenger to the castle, to demand the persons of Colonels Bulkeley and Whiteley, threatening, unless they were given up to him, to put to death all the prisoners he had taken in the course of the day, about four hundred in number; and these officers, to prevent the effusion of blood, immediately surrendered themselves, and remained prisoners at the Old Place, in Beaumaris, the seat of the Bulkeley family, till they were ransomed. The garrison, unable to withstand the superior force of the enemy, soon afterwards capitulated on honourable terms; and General Mytton, who was appointed governor by the parliament, made Captain Evans his deputy-constable of the castle, and lieutenant-governor of the town. After the death of General Mytton, the constablenesship was given to Hugh Courtney, who was succeeded in that office by Colonel John Jones, a zealous puritan, and one of the parliamentary commissioners for the reduction of the island; and his successor, Sir John Carter, of Kinmael, in the county of Denbigh, who received his appointment from General Monk, held it till the Restoration, when Viscount Bulkeley, who had been ennobled, in reward for his sufferings and attachment to the royal cause, was appointed to that office, which was held by his descendants till the death of the last Lord Viscount Bulkeley, in 1822.

The town consists of several streets, of which that leading to the castle is spacious, and contains some handsome houses. Considerable improvements have been made within the last few years, among which may be noticed the levelling, widening, and paving of the streets, and the erection of several handsome modern buildings, both in the town and neighbourhood; and others are now in progress, which, when completed, will render Beaumaris one of the most elegant towns in the principality. A new line of road, leading from Bangor ferry to Beaumaris, was constructed in 1805, by Lord Viscount Bulkeley, which, passing through the woods and plantations of Baron Hill, that nobleman's seat, at a considerable elevation above the shores of the Menai, and continued for near five miles in length, forms one of the most picturesque drives in the country. This road was thrown open to the public in the following year, since which time it has been extended to the Menai bridge at one extremity, and connected at the other with a recently-formed entrance into the town of Beaumaris. The ancient walls by which the town was defended are, in several parts, still remaining entire; but, on the side towards the sea, a considerable portion was taken down during the summer of 1831, in order to furnish materials for building a new hotel, and for completing other improvements. In front of the town is the fine open bay called Beaumaris Roads, formed by the bold curvature of the strait, the shores of which are here composed of a fine, firm, level sand, affording a pleasant marine promenade, much frequented by the inhabitants, and by the numerous visitors, who, during the summer season, resort to this place for the purpose of sea-bathing. Warm and cold baths have been erected, and bathing-machines are ranged along the beach. The delightful situation of the town, the salubrity of the air, and the numerous objects of grandeur, beauty, and interest, which impart to the surrounding scenery a charming variety, and combine in forming a splendid and richly diversified landscape, have made Beaumaris the favourite residence of many families during the summer season, and contributed to render it one of the most fashionable bathing-places in North Wales. The view from the Green is one of the most extensive and magnificent in the principality. Among the numerous striking objects which it embraces are, the Irish sea, the noble æstuary of the Menai strait, Beaumaris Roads, the city of Bangor, the suspension bridge, Port Penrhyn; the village, church, and waterfall of Aber; the stately castle, park, and grounds of Penrhyn; Puffin Island; Penmon Point; the priory of Penmon, and the friary of Llanvaes; Great Orme's Head, the summit of Penmaen-Mawr, and the other stupendous mountains of Carnarvonshire; the castles of Beaumaris and Llienog, the luxuriant plantations of Baron Hill, and other seats in the vicinity; and numerous other objects, which contribute to enrich and beautify the scene. A considerable portion of the bay is left dry when the tide is out; and this tract, which extends for several miles along the opposite coast, is called the Lavan Sands, and is supposed to have been once inhabited, prior to its being inundated by an encroachment of the sea, in the sixth century. Its ancient name, Traeth Lavan, or Traeth Wylovain, of which the present is a contraction, signifies the place of weeping, and appears to have reference to the lamentations of the inhabitants when their lands were overwhelmed. Over these sands is a ferry to Aber, in Carnarvonshire, a distance of four miles: it originally belonged to the crown, and, in the reign of Edward II., an order was given to Robert Power, chamberlain of North Wales, to inspect the state of the boat, which was then out of repair, and either to repair it, if practicable, at the expense of the bailiwick, or to build a new boat, at the expense of the crown. It appears that the inhabitants paid annually into the Exchequer the sum of thirty shillings, for the privilege of this ferry, which was granted to the corporation, by charter of Elizabeth, in the fourth year of her reign. These sands, at low water, are firm and safely passable on foot; but, during certain intervals of the tides, they are extremely hazardous, and consequently great precaution is necessary, in order to pass them with safety. The passage may be effected in the interval between two hours before, and two hours after, low water, but at other times it is attended with difficulty and danger, and several persons have perished in the attempt. During foggy weather, the great bell of Aber is rung to direct passengers to the point of their destination, from which they would be otherwise in danger of wandering, and probably of being overwhelmed by the influx of the tide.

The port, which is the principal in North Wales, has jurisdiction over those of Aberconway, Amlwch, Barmouth, Carnarvon, Holyhead, and Pwllheli, and all other harbours in this part of the principality are creeks within its limits. The situation of the port is extremely advantageous for commerce: its central position, with respect to the whole of North Wales; its intimate connexion with Liverpool and the principal manufacturing districts, and its proximity to the Irish coast, afforded it every facility of extending its trade; but, since the growth and increase of Liverpool, its commercial importance has materially declined, and at present its chief trade arises from the importation of the supplies requisite for the mineral works of the island, and the exportation of their produce: the principal articles of importation are coal, timber, and general merchandise; and the chief exports are copper-ore, marble, and slates. The number of registered vessels belonging to it is three hundred and eighty-nine, of the aggregate burden of twenty-two thousand and seventy-six tons. In the year ending January 5th, 1831, five hundred and sixty vessels entered inwards, and seven hundred and ninety-five cleared outwards, at this port. A regular and expeditious communication by steam-packets has been established between Beaumaris and Liverpool, Carnarvon, and Dublin. The harbour is accessible, at low water, to vessels of four hundred tons' burden, which can approach close to the walls of the town; and the bay affords good anchorage and secure shelter to numerous vessels which occasionally ride here in safety during the severest gales. Extensive sea walls have been constructed for the protection of the pier, and spacious and commodious quays and warehouses have been erected, with every requisite accommodation for facilitating the business of the port. The custom-house, which is situated on the Green, near the water's edge, is a commodious building, well adapted to the purpose. The markets, which are abundantly supplied with corn and provisions, at a very moderate price, are held on Wednesday and Saturday; and four fairs for cattle, and various articles of general merchandise, are held annually on February 13th, Holy Thursday, September 19th, and December 19th.

Corporate Seal.

The inhabitants received their first charter of incorporation, in the same year in which the castle was completed, from Edward I., who conferred upon them considerable privileges, and assigned to the corporation the estates of four of the principal proprietors of land, whom he removed by exchange, on the erection of the castle, to be held by them in capite; and, among various other immunities, he granted them a free prison within the castle, with descent of property to their heirs, whether they died testate or intestate. The charter of Edward I. was confirmed and extended by one of Elizabeth, in the fourth year of her reign, under which the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and twenty-one capital burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, coroner, clerk of the market, water-bailiff, two serjeants at mace, two constables, and other officers. The mayor and bailiffs are annually chosen from among the capital burgesses by the corporation, on the Monday before the feast of St. Michael, and sworn into office on the Monday following; and, with the exception of the recorder, who holds his office for life, all the other officers are appointed by the corporation at the same time. The elective franchise was conferred in the 27th of Henry VIII., and the first return was made in the 33rd of the same reign, in conjunction with Newborough, to which town the assizes and sessions for the county were removed in the reign of Henry VII., upon a false representation to this monarch, after they had been held at Beaumaris for two hundred and fifty years previously. In the second of Edward VI., Newborough was exempted from contributing to the support of a parliamentary representative, the privilege thus becoming limited to Beaumaris; and by statutes of the 2d and 3rd of this monarch, the great and quarter sessions, together with the county court, for Anglesey, were removed back to this town, after they had been held at Newborough for forty-five years. The burgesses of Newborough, nevertheless, still claimed a share in the return of the member for Beaumaris, which, however, they seem henceforward never to have exercised; and, in 1709, it was decided by the House of Commons, that this right was vested in the mayor, bailiffs, and capital burgesses of Beaumaris only. By the act for amending the representation of the people in England and Wales, recently passed, the newly created boroughs of Amlwch, Holyhead, and Llangvni now share with Beaumaris in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in the former constituency, who are resident within the limits of the borough, or within seven statute miles from the place where the poll is taken, if duly registered according to the provisions of the act; and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: there are, within the town, about one hundred and ten houses of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, and some more within the borough, of which the commissioners for ascertaining the boundaries of boroughs, under the late act, were unable to obtain the exact number: the mayor is the returning officer. The freedom is obtained only by grant of the corporation. The mayor, recorder, and bailiffs, are justices of the peace, and exercise exclusive jurisdiction within the borough and liberties, which latter comprise, besides the chapelry of Beaumaris, the whole of the parish of Llanvaes, about one-half of that of Llaniestyn, and part of the parishes of Llanddona, Penmon, and Llanvihangel-Din-Sylwy. They hold quarterly courts of session for determining on all offences within the borough, except capital charges; and occasionally hold a court of record, for the determination of pleas and the recovery of debts to any amount, in which the mayor and bailiffs preside, assisted by the town-clerk, with power to issue process to hold to bail in all actions for debt, to any amount. The town-hall, erected by the corporation in 1790, and situated in Castle-street, nearly in the centre of the town, is a commodious and handsome building, containing on the basement story the public office, shambles, and market-house, above which are a noble room and other apartments, appropriated to the holding of the borough sessions and the transaction of municipal business, and occasionally to the holding of assemblies: the great room, which is the most spacious in the county, is the most splendid ball-room in North Wales. Since the decline of Newborough, Beaumaris has been the county town of Anglesey, as it more anciently was, and the assizes and general quarter sessions for the county, and the election of knights for the shire, still take place here. The county-hall, erected in 1614, is a small edifice without any pretensions to architectural character, but recently much improved in its adaptation to the holding of the assizes and sessions, and the transaction of the public business of the county. The common gaol and house of correction for the county, a large and commodious building, erected in the year 1828, comprises twenty-three wards, six day-rooms, and six airing-yards; but the number of prisoners tried at the assizes and sessions is very inconsiderable, not amounting to more than four or five annually.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llandegvan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and elegant structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned with crocketed pinnacles. It consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles, and was greatly embellished in 1825, at considerable expense: each of the aisles is separated from the nave by an elegant range of lofty clustered columns and gracefully pointed arches; and the east window of the chancel is of elegant and elaborate design, and is embellished with some remains of beautiful ancient stained glass. The north aisle is called St. Mary's chapel, and the south St. Nicholas': in the former there is a beautiful altar-tomb, bearing recumbent figures of a knight and his lady, in white alabaster, removed from the priory of Llanvaes, on the dissolution of that house: the tomb is decorated with diminutive figures of monks and knights, finely sculptured, and with shields of armorial bearings; but the latter are so obliterated, that they afford no means of ascertaining the persons whose memory the tomb was intended to perpetuate. On the south side of the altar is a tablet to the memory of Sir Henry Sidney, Lord Deputy of Ireland, who died in 1586; Sir Anthony St. Leger, also Lord Deputy, and others; and above it is a mural monument, of black marble, in memory of Thomas, sixth son of Sir Julius Caesar, Master of the Rolls, who was rector of Llanrhuuddlad, in this county, and died in 1632. Near the castle was formerly situated an ancient chapel, or oratory, dedicated to St. Meugan, of which there are no vestiges. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded in 1609, by David Hughes, of Woodrising, in the county of Norfolk, who gave the house which he had lately built at Beaumaris for the use of a grammar school, and endowed it with all his lands in the county of Anglesey, for the payment of the salaries of the master and usher, for the maintenance of scholars in that establishment, and for keeping the building in repair; directing his trustees to appropriate the surplus in placing one or two of the scholars in either of the universities of Oxford or Cambridge, and in erecting an almshouse for eight indigent persons, who have two apartments each, an allowance of six shillings per week, and six yards of frieze annually on St. Thomas' day; three of the almsmen to be chosen from the parish of Llantrisant, where the founder was born, two from that of Rhodogeidio, two from that of Llêchynvarwydd, and one from that of Ceidio; and after providing for these, if any thing remained, the founder directed that it should be distributed among the poor of the parish of Llantrisant. The founder's intentions respecting the forwarding of boys to the university, and otherwise, were carried into effect by the trustees, who paid £20 with every scholar who entered there, and also apprenticed several others, according to the state of the funds, till the year 1826, since which time the affairs of this charity have been under the investigation of the Court of Chancery, and the exhibitions and apprentice fees have been suspended. The present income is £600 per annum, out of which the salaries of the master, usher, and writing-master are paid: there are sixty boys on the foundation, who are gratuitously instructed in the classics and in writing and arithmetic, and are eligible to one of two fellowships founded in Jesus' College, Oxford, by Dr. Henry Rowland, Bishop of Bangor, in 1616; to certain exhibitions, of £10 per annum each for four years, founded by Dr. Lewis; and to others founded by Dr. Meyrick, in Jesus' College, Oxford, to all which boys from this school have the preference. A National school was founded in 1816, and the school-rooms, with houses for the master and the mistress, were built by subscription, at an expense of £550, on a plot of ground given by the late Lord Bulkeley, by whom, during his lordship's lifetime, it was supported; but since his decease, in 1822, it has been maintained by voluntary contributions, the principal of which is an annual donation of £30 by Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart.: it is conducted in a most praiseworthy manner, and affords gratuitous instruction to one hundred and twenty boys and the same number of girls. Mrs. Elizabeth Gould, in 1780, bequeathed £50, directing the interest to be annually divided among aged widows, decayed housekeepers of Beaumaris; and there are several other charitable donations and bequests, which are judiciously distributed among the poor, according to the intention of the several benefactors. Of the numerous benevolent societies formed in this town, the most remarkable for the extent of its charitable benefactions is the Society of Ancient Druids, established here in 1772, and patronised by many of the principal nobility, clergy, and gentry of the neighbourhood. It consists of an Arch-Druid, and Sub-Druid, who are annually elected, and an unlimited number of brethren, who celebrate their anniversaries in September, and upon those occasions vote various sums of money for benevolent purposes. The principal of these are donations to the hospitals, infirmaries, and dispensaries in the neighbouring counties both of Wales and England; premiums for apprenticing poor boys; rewards for humane and meritorious exertions in saving from destruction the lives and property of shipwrecked seamen, and for various other laudable objects; to which beneficent purposes various sums, amounting to nearly £2000, have been appropriated from their funds within the last thirty years.

The site and remains of the once important castle of Beaumaris were purchased from the crown in 1816, and are now the property of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart., who has made great improvements in the grounds, by laying out walks, ornamented with plantations and shrubberies, and has thrown them open to the public as a promenade. The splendid remains of the castle, though less conspicuous from the lowness of its situation than those of Carnarvon and Aberconway, prove that it was scarcely inferior in beauty and extent to either of those structures: it consisted of two courts, the outer comprehending a spacious quadrilateral area defended by fourteen circular towers, of which those at the angles are much larger than the rest, and having the principal entrance towards the sea, flanked by two strong round towers, between which is a pointed archway defended by a portcullis. Near this entrance is a long, narrow, advanced work, with a platform, called the Gunners' Walk, which was anciently carried over the moat by a lofty arch, still remaining, and near which is one of the iron rings anciently used for mooring the vessels that delivered their supplies under the castle walls. Within the outer wall, and equidistant from it in every part, is the inner quadrangle, one hundred and ninety feet in length and nearly the same in breadth, surrounded by the principal range of buildings, which are much loftier than those of the outer court, and defended by ten circular towers, of which those at the angles are also more massive than those in the centre, and are in nearly a perfect state. Within this quadrangle are the principal state apartments: on the north-west side is the great hall, seventy feet in length and twenty-four in width, of lofty dimensions, and lighted by a noble range of five lofty windows, embellished with tracery. To the east is the chapel, an elegant structure in the early style of English architecture, and nearly perfect: the roof is elaborately groined, and is supported on arched ribs, springing from clustered pilasters richly ornamented. The walls are embellished with a series of twenty-one elegantly canopied niches, between which are lancet-shaped windows of peculiar delicacy, and behind them are recesses gained in the thickness of the walls, and probably appropriated to the principal officers of the garrison, or to persons of rank residing at the castle. A narrow corridor, formed within the walls, is carried nearly round the whole building, with the exception of the north-west side, affording communication with the principal state apartments, which, though unequal in splendour to those of Carnarvon and Aberconway, display abundant evidence of departed grandeur. Within the area are a tennis-court and a bowling-green, which are open to the public; and the pleasantness of the situation, and the taste with which the grounds have been laid out, render this place a favourite resort of the inhabitants of the town. Baron Hill, the seat of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart., originally built, in 1618, by Sir Richard Bulkeley, a distinguished personage in the reign of James I., and afterwards much enlarged and improved by its late possessor, under the superintendence of the late Mr. Samuel Wyatt, architect, is beautifully situated on an eminence above the town, to which it is open in the front, from which an extensive lawn slopes gradually towards it, and is sheltered in the rear and on each side by extensive woods of luxuriant foliage. The view from this mansion is justly esteemed one of the finest in the principality, extending over the bay of Beaumaris, with the grand opening of the Menai strait, bounded by a noble range of rocks and mountains, rising in the form of a vast amphitheatre, and including some of the principal mountains of Snowdon, whose summits of varied form soar in romantic grandeur above the surrounding heights, and whose verdant and well-cultivated bases slope gradually to the margin of the water. The great promontory of Penmaen-Mawr, and the vast rock of Llan-Dudno, or Great Orme's Head, of barren and rugged aspect, form a striking contrast to the milder features of the scenery in the neighbourhood of this noble mansion, and aid in producing that picturesque and pleasing variety which constitutes its superior richness and beauty. Within the grounds is the stone coffin in which the princess Joan, daughter of King John, and wife of Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, was interred in the priory of Llanvaes, from which place, after the dissolution of that establishment, it was removed, and, after lying neglected on a farm near the spot for many years, was brought by the late Lord Bulkeley, and placed under a temple which that nobleman erected in the park, in honour of her memory. Among the other seats in this neighbourhood may be enumerated Red Hill, the residence of W. W. Sparrow, Esq.; Hênllŷs, belonging to J. H. Hampton Lewis, Esq., anciently the seat of Gweirydd ab Rhŷs Gôch, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, and of his posterity until the conquest of Wales by Edward I., who removed them to Bôdlewyyddan, in the county of Flint, together with other ancient freeholders, by an exchange of property, granting their estates to the corporation; the Friary, the residence of Lady Williams; Plâs Llangoed, the seat of Mrs. Hughes; and Cadnant, the residence of J. Price, Esq. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £669. 10.

BEESTON, or BISTON, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile (S. W.) from Wrexham, containing 106 inhabitants, who are assessed separately for the maintenance of their own poor, according to a regulation entered into in 1830.

BEGELLY (BUGELI), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Narberth, on the road to Tenby, containing, with the chapelry of Williamston, which supports its own poor, 996 inhabitants. The substratum of the soil in this parish is coal, of excellent quality, and in great request for the drying of malt and hops by the proprietors of breweries and distilleries: it is chiefly procured by a company under Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart., and J. M. Childe, Esq., who are the chief proprietors of the soil, and receive one-sixth part, as their share of the produce: there are also some smaller proprietors, who exact one-fifth, and even one-fourth, part from those who work only on a limited scale. A railway has been commenced from the mines, leading over King's Moor to Saundersfoot, in the parish of St. Issels, which is now in progress, and which, when completed, will greatly contribute to promote the interests of the surrounding neighbourhood. Iron-ore is also found, both above and below the strata of coal, and, during the existence of the Pembrey Iron Company, was procured in great quantities and with considerable benefit to the proprietors; but, since the stoppage of those works, the search for it has been discontinued. The shale which is found with the coal exhibits many interesting specimens of the fern and reed plants, and pyrites of iron have also been discovered. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 19. 2., and in the patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart. The church is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty tower, and is pleasantly situated near Begelly Hall, by the trees surrounding which it is partly concealed. The chapel of Williamston is a rude structure without a tower, standing in the hamlet of that name. The parsonage-house is situated on part of a stratum of coal, which has been wrought all round it, and, if the excavation had been continued, it would have endangered the stability of the building. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Near the parsonage-house are the remains of a cromlech, which has been thrown down; and in its vicinity is a tumulus, supposed to have been raised to the memory of some unknown chieftain. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £84. 16.

BEGUILDY (BUGEILDY), a parish in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Knighton, comprising the upper and lower divisions, and containing 1043 inhabitants, of which number, 591 are in the upper, and 452 in the lower, division. This parish is situated on the river Teme, and, towards the north, borders on the county of Montgomery: it is in general mountainous, but there is a long narrow tract of great fertility, affording good pasturage for cattle, and on the hills are fed vast numbers of sheep, which form the principal dependence of the farmers, very little of the land comparatively being in a state of tillage. The neighbourhood abounds with pleasing and picturesque scenery, and the higher grounds command extensive and finely varied prospects over the counties of Radnor, Montgomery, and Salop. Part of the borough of Cnwclas is within this parish, the remainder being in that of Heyop, and the court-house in which the burgesses of that place are elected is situated in the township of Beguildy. The parish comprises four townships, namely, Beguildy, Crûg y Byddar, Mudwalledd, and Pennant; which are distinct as regards the collection of the county stock and the repair of the roads, but are united for the maintenance of the poor. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, consists of a nave and chancel, but is not remarkable for any architectural character. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists at Velindre, in this parish. The free school is endowed with a rent-charge of £10, given by Lord Robert Wharton, on an estate called Maesgwynne, formerly the property of the noble family of Harley, but sold by the late Earl of Oxford. The Rev. John Davies, in 1741, bequeathed £100, now secured on a tenement called Pen y Garragl, to poor housekeepers of this parish; the Rev. Vavasour Griffiths, in 1741, bequeathed £20; and there are also some other charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. Here are the remains of an ancient British fortification, said to have been occupied by the renowned Uthyr Pendragon; and at the foot of a hill is a place called the Bloody Field, where a battle is said to have been fought. On the south-western border of the parish is the site of Cnwclas castle, on the summit of a conical artificial mound. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £363. 16.

BERRIEW (ABER-IW), a parish partly in the hundred of CAWRSE, liberties of the borough of WELSHPOOL, but chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Welshpool, containing 2429 inhabitants. This place derives its name from being situated at the junction of the river Rhiw with the Severn, from which point the village is distant about three quarters of a mile, on the banks of the Rhiw, on the road between Welshpool and Newtown. The parish is very large, and wholly enclosed; the waste lands, amounting to about fifteen thousand acres, in the manor of Cedewain, having been allotted pursuant to an act obtained in 1796. Flannel is manufactured to a limited extent. The Montgomeryshire canal passes through the parish, and is carried over the Rhiw, near the village, by an aqueduct of four arches. The high grounds, especially the Byrwydd, about three miles north-west of the village, command very extensive and richly diversified prospects of the fertile vales of Severn, Montgomery, Salop, and Manavon, watered by their respective streams, and studded with numerous villages and mansions, and of the principal mountains in North Wales, Salop, &c. The village presents a cheerful and pleasing appearance, containing several good houses and neat white-washed cottages. The ancient mansion of Vaenor occupies an elevated situation in a park tolerably well wooded: it formerly belonged to the family of Price, an heiress of which being married to George Devereux, Esq., in the seventeenth century, it became the property of the Viscounts Hereford, but is now in the possession of Mrs. Winder, relict of the late John Winder, Esq. There are also several other genteel residences in the parish, among which are, Glân Severn, the property of W. Owen, Esq., a handsome stone edifice, situated among grounds beautifully laid out, through which the river Severn pursues a winding course; and Bôd Heilin, the seat of John Humphreys, Esq., occupying a romantic situation on the slope, and near the summit, of a hill, which is well wooded, and commands a delightful view of the vales of Severn and Montgomery. The petty sessions for the lower division of the hundred are held at Berriew on the first Saturday in every month.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is a neat modern structure with a square tower, surmounted with pinnacles. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Humphrey Jones, Esq., of Garthmael, by will dated February 26th, 1652, devised to trustees the rectory of Bettws, and certain lands and tenements, called Cwm Madoc Ucheldre, in the parish of Trêgynon, which he held as a security for the sum of £400 advanced on mortgage, for the foundation and endowment of a free school at Berriew, but, in the event of the mortgage being redeemed, the testator directed that the sum should be invested in the mortgage of other premises, for that purpose. This having taken place, the sum of £400 was, in 1754, together with £50 belonging to the poor, expended in the purchase of an estate, called Penarth, in the parish of Llanvair, now producing about £70 per annum to the charity. The old school-house, being in a dilapidated state, was pulled down in 1819, and a neat and substantial structure was erected at an expense of £1400, defrayed partly from the funds of the charity, which had accumulated during a suspension of the school, and partly by subscription: at present about forty boys are instructed. Various minor bequests have also been made for the benefit of the poor, to be applied in the distribution of bread and clothes, and in apprenticing children. This is one of the parishes incorporated, by an act passed in the 32nd of George III., for the maintenance of their poor in a house of industry erected at Forden. In the township of Allt, between the road leading to Welshpool and the canal, there is a tumulus; and on the top of Cevn yr Allt are the remains of a British encampment: there is also an encampment near the road from Berriew to Castle Caer-Einion, in the township of Frith. Maen Beuno, a stone pillar bearing the name of the patron saint of the church, is still standing in the township of Berriew, between the road to Welshpool and the river Severn. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £996. 13.

BERSHAM-DRELINCOURT, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Wrexham, containing 1240 inhabitants. There are extensive paper-mills in this chapelry, situated upon the river Clywedog, affording employment to a considerable number of persons; and the whole of this district abounds with valuable and extensive mines of iron, lead, and coal, for working which several establishments have long been formed on a large scale. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £16 per annum private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The chapel, known by the local name of "Capel Madam," is situated at the south-western extremity of the township of Broughton. Attached to it is a school for the instruction, clothing, and maintenance of ten poor female children, founded in 1762, by Anne, the Hon. Dowager Viscountess Primerose, who endowed it with lands, &c., in the vicinity, under the superintendence of trustees, including the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and others. That celebrated relic of Anglo-Saxon antiquity, Wat's Dyke, passes in the vicinity, nearly in a direction from south to north, and is perfect throughout the whole of its course here. The inhabitants are assessed separately for the maintenance of their poor, pursuant to an arrangement made in 1830.

BERWICK, a hamlet in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, containing 802 inhabitants. Here was formerly an ancient chapel, which is now in ruins.

BERWYN, a joint township with Croes, in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (E. by S.) from Trêgaron. The population is returned with Croes. In this wild and mountainous district is the small lake Llŷn Berwyn, from which issues a stream, called the Berwyn, which, after joining the Croes, falls into the Teivy, a little below the town of Trêgaron.

BETHGELART (BEDD-CELERT), a parish partly in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, Eivionydd division, and partly in that of ISGORVAI, Arvon division, of the county of CARNARVON, and partly in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 16 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carnarvon, and containing 777 inhabitants. This very extensive parish, anciently called Llan Ybor, derived its present name from a priory of Black canons, of the order of St. Gilbert, founded, according to some writers, about the year 1198, and dedicated to St. Mary, by Llewelyn the Great, in gratitude for the preservation of his infant son from the attack of a wolf, which, during the absence of the family upon a hunting excursion, had entered the house, and which his favourite greyhound Celert had killed, while attempting to seize the child in its cradle. According to the well-known legendary story, Llewelyn, on his return from the chase, perceiving the mouth of the dog stained with blood, hastened to the nursery, and finding the cradle overturned, and the floor streaming with blood, hastily concluded that his son had been killed by the hound, and instantly drew his sword and stabbed the faithful animal, while caressing his master. But, on removing the cradle, he found his child unhurt, and sleeping quietly by the side of the wolf, which the watchful Celert had slain. Stung with remorse, Llewelyn erected a tomb over the dog's grave, on which spot the conventual church was afterwards built; and from this circumstance the priory obtained the appellation of Bedd Celert, or "the Grave of Celert." But Mr. Rowlands has traced the existence of this monastic establishment to a period long anterior to the above, even prior to the reign of Owain Gwynedd, from whom it received an endowment of lands, &c., which was augmented by Llewelyn. The priory having been nearly destroyed by fire, about the year 1283, was repaired by Edward I., assisted by Anianus, Bishop of Bangor, who granted ample indulgences to all who should contribute towards the rebuilding of it; and in his edicts for this purpose, he describes it as being, with the exception of those of Bardsey and Bangor Iscoed, the oldest religious establishment in the principality. The priory flourished till the time of Henry VIII., who annexed it to the abbey of Chertsey, in the county of Surrey, and it was subsequently, together with that establishment, given by the same monarch to Bisham abbey, in the county of Berks: its revenue, at the dissolution, amounted to £69. 3. 8. There are no remains of the building, the materials of which are supposed to have been used in the erection or repair of the parish church; nor can its site be at present distinctly ascertained. All the lands in the county of Carnarvon, belonging to the priory, were granted to Robert and Henry Bodville, by Edward VI., in the second year of his reign.

The parish is situated in the heart of an extensive mountainous district, abounding with strikingly romantic and with grand and magnificent scenery, richly diversified with lofty mountains of various elevation and character, luxuriant vales, expansive lakes, woods, groves, and plantations of the richest verdure, and comprehending an almost endless variety of views and prospects of surpassing beauty and interest. Its limits reach to the summit of the towering Snowdon, including nearly the whole of its southern side and base, as well as the mountains Moel Hebog, Aran, Graig Gôch, and Myn-

ydd-Mawr, with part of Siabod, all of which, though secondary to Snowdon, are mountains of lofty elevation. The village, which is small, but in which a spacious and commodious inn has been built, for the accommodation of the increased number of persons who visit this interesting neighbourhood, is delightfully situated at the confluence of the rivers Glâslyn and Colwyn, which rise in the adjacent mountains, and consists only of a few scattered cottages, principally inhabited by shepherds, whose flocks feed upon the neighbouring mountains. To the north-west of it the road passes between the small lakes Llŷn y Cader and Llŷn y Dywerch, beyond which is the broad lake Llŷn Cawellyn, at the base of Mynydd-Mawr, a mountain of lofty and precipitous elevation, which in this part, receding in a semicircular curve, forms a bold and rugged barrier to this fine sheet of water, which is more than a mile and a half in length, and about three quarters of a mile broad: the water is beautifully transparent, and abounds with red char, a fish peculiar to mountain lakes. At the extremity of the lake, and upon a bold rocky precipice in the mountain, are the ruins of Castell Cidwm, a fortress erected by Cadwaladr, to defend this important pass into the regions of Snowdon, which from the earliest ages had been the secure retreat of the native Welsh, in cases of extreme danger, and the rallying point of their efforts in repelling the invaders of their country. To the west is the mountain pass called Drws y Coed, where are some productive copper mines, and beyond are two fine lakes adjoining each other, called Llŷniau Nantlle, from which spot is obtained a view of the summits of Snowdon, all of which are seen through a vista between the intervening mountains, with singular grandeur of effect. To the north-east of the village, an opening between the mountains forms the beautifully romantic pass of Nant Gwynant, memorable for the sanguinary battle which was fought between the forces of the Earl of Pembroke and those of Ieuan ab Robert, in the reign of Edward IV. Through this delightful vale, the name of which implies the vale of waters, passes the road to Capel Curig, extending for five or six miles through a continued succession of richly varied scenery, unsurpassed for picturesque beauty and sublimity. In some parts are seen alternately clear and expansive lakes, reflecting either the rugged and sterile precipices, or the richly wooded sides, of the lofty mountains by which they are enclosed; and luxuriant meadows and fertile plains, intersected by numerous rivulets; and in others craggy cliffs, over which the mountain torrent forms frequent cataracts, barren rocks, and the most dreary sterility. On the margin of Llŷn Gwynant, one of the principal lakes in this romantic vale, are the ruins of a small ancient chapel, called Capel Nant Gwynant, formerly belonging to Bethgelart; and not far distant is the isolated rocky eminence called Dinas Emrys, celebrated as the spot where Vortigern is said to have assembled his council of wise men, or magicians, in 449, and also as the residence of the renowned Merlin. The summit of this rock forms an extensive area, which is defended with walls of loose stones, and accessible only on one side: the entrance appears to have been guarded by two towers, and within the area are the foundations of circular buildings of loose stones, the walls of which are about five feet in thickness. The road to Capel Curig extends beyond the point of the mountain Sia-

bod, where it joins the pass of Llanberis, through which a road to Carnarvon was opened in 1831. To the south of the village is the pass of Pont Aber Glâslyn, the entrance to which is somewhat narrow, but becomes gradually more contracted by the approach of the mountains, leaving scarcely room for the river, which rushes with violence through its rocky channel. The scenery in this vale is rudely magnificent: the mountains rise to an amazing height, and towards the vale present a series of huge precipices, towering above each other at irregular intervals, and rugged masses of projecting cliffs, threatening every moment to detach themselves from their lofty heights, and fall into the vale. At the extremity of the pass is Pont Aber Glâslyn, a bridge of one arch, thirty feet in the span, thrown over a chasm of tremendous depth between two steep precipices, which here bounds the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, and forms the principal communication between them. This spot is celebrated as the place where the princes of Meirion received the sign of the cross from Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, when preaching the crusades throughout the principality. Near the bridge is a cataract, formed by a mountain torrent obstructed in its descent by shelving ledges of projecting rock. The lake Glâslyn, or the Blue Lake, so called from the transparency of its waters, is the source of the river of that name; and within the parish are numerous other lakes, besides those already described, among which may be noticed Llyn Cwmstrallyn, Llyn Dinas, Llyn Llydaw, Llyn yr Adar, and Llyn Duwaunydd. A little to the south of the village, and near Pont Aber Glâslyn, copper-ore has been found in great abundance, and mines of it have been worked for many years; but the copper was so intermixed with other ores, as to render it very difficult of separation with any advantage to the proprietors. About the year 1800, the high price of ore induced some adventurers to renew the works, from which great quantities of ore were obtained for some years; but they were again discontinued, and remained in a neglected state till 1819, when they were re-opened, and since that period many hundred tons have been procured annually. The principal mines are those of Drws y Coed, at the base of Mynydd-Mawr, in the district of Llyniau Nantlle, which afford employment to four hundred men: the ore obtained here is of very good quality, and is sent in great quantities, by means of a rail-road leading from the works, eight miles in length, to the wharfs at Carnarvon, from which it is shipped to Swansea, Staffordshire, and other parts of England. Fairs are held here on August 18th and September 23rd and 27th.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Priestly. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a lofty and spacious structure, containing some portions in the early style of English architecture: in the north wall are two lofty sharply pointed arches, which appear to have communicated formerly with some other building, probably a chantry, and at the east end is a good lancet-shaped window of three lights; these are evidently of much older date than the rest of the building, being probably parts of the ancient priory. There is in the village a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, who have four others in various parts of the parish, in which also are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. W. Wynne bequeathed a rent-charge of £2. 13. for providing coats for six poor men of this parish, and other uses; Maurice Wynne gave a rent-charge of £2. 13. 4. for educating one poor boy in the school at Bangor; and Mrs. Jones, in 1743, bequeathed £50, directing the interest to be distributed annually among ten poor widows. Some beautiful quartz crystals are found in the mountains in this parish, more particularly in Snowdon, of a clear diamond-like transparency, and in the form of a regular hexagonal prism, which are known by the appellation of Welsh diamonds. In the township of Nanmor resided two distinguished bards of the fifteenth century, Rhys Gôch o Eryri, the favourite bard of Owain Glyndwr, and Davydd Nanmor, both of whom were natives of the parish, and were interred in the churchyard. Bethgelart is principally the scene of Dr. Southey's poem of "Madoc." At Dôlvriog, in the vicinity, considerable plantations have been formed within the last thirty years, by W. M. Thackeray, Esq., M. D., which are now in a flourishing state. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £377. 14.

BETTESFIELD, a township in the parish of HANMER, hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Ellesmere, containing 359 inhabitants. It is situated on the border of Shropshire, and the road from Ellesmere to Whitchurch passes through it. This was the ancient residence of the family of Hanmer, and the birthplace of Sir Thomas Hanmer, Speaker of the House of Commons in the reign of Queen Anne, who died in May 1746, and was interred in the family burial-place in Hanmer church, where a monument has been erected to his memory: a superb edition of Shakspeare's Plays, with annotations by Sir Thomas, was published in six volumes by the University of Oxford, to which he presented the manuscript. The tithes of Bettesfield were bequeathed by Sir John Hanmer, Bart., in 1624, to the support of a learned preacher in the parish church of Hanmer. This township separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £199. 5.

BETTWS, a parish in the hundred of ISKENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, comprising the upper and lower divisions, and containing 830 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated within a short distance of the turnpike road leading from Llandilo-Vawr to Swansea, is about five miles in extent, from east to west, and about a mile and a half in breadth. A considerable portion of the surface is mountainous, and coal is supposed to abound in various parts, but very little of it has hitherto been worked. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llandebye, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. David. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £117. 8.

BETTWS, a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Bridgend, containing 362 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Ogmor, not far from its confluence with the Severn, and is watered by the rivulets Llynvi and Garw, which bound it on two sides. The surrounding scenery is pleasing and picturesque, and in the immediate neighbourhood are some handsome seats. Coytrehene, the seat of Morgan Popkin Traherne, Esq., is a handsome mansion, occupying a retired, but agreeable situation on the declivity of a hill, surrounded with luxuriant plantations, with the river Ogmere flowing at its base, and commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country, and of the confluence of that river with the Severn in the distance: it was anciently the property of the Powells, from whom it passed by marriage to the families of Popkin and Traherne. Within half a mile of Coytrehene, a small, but elegant residence, in the Elizabethan style of architecture, has been recently erected, under the direction of Mr. Traherne, for his sister, the widow of the late George Jenner, Esq., of Doctors' Commons. The parish abounds with excellent coal, which till lately was procured only for the supply of the inhabitants of the district; but a vein has recently been opened by John Edwards Vaughan, Esq., of Rheola, in the Vale of Neath, which is worked on a more extensive scale, and for the readier conveyance of which a tram-road has been constructed by that gentleman, communicating with the rail-road leading from Bridgend to the shipping-place at Porthcawl. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of New-castle, which is endowed with the rectorial tithes of this parish, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural features. There is a place of worship for Unitarians, which has a small endowment. The Coytrehene estate is charged with an annual payment of £2, and £1. 10. per annum is secured by a deed poll on the Bridgend turnpike trust, for distribution among the poor. Dr. Richard Price, an eminent nonconformist divine, and moral and political writer, was born at Tyn-ton, in this parish, in February 1723; he died at Hackney, in Middlesex, on the 19th of April, 1791, and was interred in the burial-ground in Bunhill-Fields. As one of the staunchest advocates of civil and religious liberty, his publications on the events of the American and French Revolutions acquired for him a high reputation as a political writer, besides various honours from public societies, and distinguished him for a soundness of judgment and power of observation and reflection, which were equally conspicuous in his theological and metaphysical productions. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £122. 13.

BETTWS, a township in the parish of LLANVAWR, hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish.

BETTWS, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Newtown, containing 890 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated on the small river Bechan, which falls into the Severn at Aber-Bechan. The western branch of the Montgomeryshire canal to Newtown passes through the eastern part of the parish, which is also intersected by the turnpike road from that town to Welshpool; another road from Berriew to Llanwnnog passes through the village. The parish contains about six thousand acres of land, all enclosed, the commons having been divided pursuant to an act for enclosing the waste lands within the manors of Cêdewain, Hopeton, and Gorddwr Uchâv, obtained in 1796. The road leading from Brynderwen Bridge to Garthmael is beautifully picturesque; the high grounds on the north side are richly planted, from the base to the summit, with trees and shrubs of various kinds, and the scenery, which is enlivened by the meandering of the river Severn and the canal, presents, especially in the Autumn, when every variety of tint is seen to advantage on the wood-crowned heights, one of the most pleasing and interesting spectacles in this part of the principality. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, a saint of the sixth century, originally belonged to the ancient nunnery of Llanllugan, founded prior to 1290, for sisters of the Cistercian order, and endowed with a revenue amounting at the dissolution to £22. 14. It is a plain neat structure, with a handsome tower, which was built in the year 1531, by John ab Meredith, whose effigy, engraved on a brass plate bearing a Latin inscription, ornaments a tablet of porphyry erected to his memory on the north side of the chancel. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. An almshouse was founded and endowed in 1709, for four poor persons of this parish, and for four of the adjoining parish of Trêgynon, by Arthur Weaver, Esq., who also left £4 per annum to keep it in repair, and to purchase fuel for the use of the inmates. About half a mile to the north-west of the village is Pen y Gaer, a British camp defended by a triple intrenchment; there are also several smaller encampments in various parts of the parish. On the summit of a lofty conical hill of steep ascent, commanding an extensive prospect of the Vale of Severn and the surrounding country, is Castle Dôl y Vorwyn, or the Castle of the Virgin's meadow. The name is supposed to allude to the traditionary story of Havren, daughter of Locrinus, the son of Brutus, first king of Britain, by Essylt, daughter of the king of Germany, whom Locrinus had taken captive in his wars against Humyr, king of the Huns. Locrinus, having espoused Essylt, in violation of a former pledge given to Gwenddolau, daughter of Corineus, who had accompanied Brutus into Britain, was compelled by a threat of hostilities to fulfil his engagement to the latter; and, concealing Essylt, whom he pretended to have banished from the kingdom, married Gwenddolau, according to his engagement. On the death of Corineus, which followed soon after, Locrinus divorced Gwenddolau, and declared Essylt queen; but, on the death of Locrinus, Gwenddolau assumed the government, and in retaliation caused Essylt and her daughter Havren to be drowned in the river Severn. From this circumstance the river is supposed to have derived its name, originally "Ys Havren," and by contraction Savern, from which are deduced the Latin name Sabrina and the English Severn. The castle is said by Camden to have been originally built by Prince Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, between the years 1063 and 1073; but Dugdale refers its erection to Davydd ab Llewelyn, about the year 1245. In the Welsh Chronicle (Brût y Tywysogion) it is said to have been taken by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, in 1269. It was besieged in the year following by the Earl of Lincoln and Roger Mortimer, to whom the garrison, being in want of water, surrendered it: the latter, in 1278, obtained from Edward I. a grant of it, together with the castles of Cêdewain and Kerry. The castle was of a quadrangular form, about fifty yards in length, and twenty-five in width, and built of the small ragstone found in the neighbourhood: a small portion of the north wall, with some parts of the interior, are the only remains. On the more accessible sides of the hill on which the castle is built it is defended by deep intrenchments cut in the solid rock, and the base is surrounded by a deep dingle, thickly planted with wood, in which rises a small stream, which, after pursuing a course of nearly a mile, falls into the river Severn. A brass pot, an earthen jug, and some other ancient relics, were dug out of the ruins, some years since, and are at present preserved at Gregynog. In the township of Dôlvorwyn there is a mineral spring, strongly impregnated with sulphur and iron, which is esteemed highly efficacious in cutaneous diseases. The ancient mansion of Gregynog, in this neighbourhood, was the residence of the late Arthur Blayney, Esq., who was distinguished for his hospitality to strangers of every degree, his unwearied endeavours to promote the prosperity and comfort of his tenantry, and his public-spirited encouragement, regardless of the sacrifices made by himself, of every undertaking calculated to advance the interests, or conduce to the convenience, of the county. His house was always open for the hospitable reception and entertainment of travellers; his tenants were aided in every suitable attempt to improve their farms, which were invariably held at a moderate rental, and their convenience was carefully studied in the construction and alteration of the farm-houses and offices; the habitations of the cottagers on his estates were always comfortable, and had a small plot of ground attached, for the support of a cow during summer, for which he gratuitously supplied them with hay in the winter; and the roads in the neighbourhood were greatly improved, and the churches repaired and embellished by him; whilst his beneficence was extensively diffused among the poor, rather in the more praiseworthy solicitude to seek for and relieve deserving objects, by affording them that timely assistance which might enable them to provide for themselves in future, than in indiscriminate almsgiving to idle vagrants and clamorous mendicants; his object in mitigating the pangs of distress being to foster industry, and to discourage idleness by withholding relief. This benevolent man died at Gregynog, at an advanced age, in the year 1795. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £529. 9.

BETTWS-BLEDRWS, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Lampeter, on the road to Trêgaron, containing 235 inhabitants. At a short distance from the road is Dery Ormond, the seat of John Jones, Esq., an elegant modern mansion, erected in 1827, and beautifully situated under the shelter of a lofty hill covered with luxuriant plantations: the grounds, which are tastefully laid out, are ornamented with a small sheet of water, formed by the expansion of a rivulet by which they are intersected, and over which there is a bridge of handsome design. Though not upon a very large scale, this is one of the best houses in the county, and forms an interesting feature in the scenery of the place. Lead-ore is supposed to lie under the surface of this parish, but no attempt has been hitherto made to work it. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Bleddrws, is a very neat well-built edifice, altered and repaired in 1831, with a tower surmounted by a well-proportioned spire cased with slate: the interior is appropriately fitted up, and furnished with ranges of seats with high backs, elevated above each other, instead of pews, similar to the chapel of St. David's college, Lampeter, which were erected at the expense of John Jones, Esq., of Dery Ormond. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Between Dery Ormond and the Teivy there is an ancient intrenchment, called Castel Goeddrêv, situated on a farm to which it gives name. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £89. 17.

BETTWS-CLYRO, or CAPEL-BETTWS (BETTWS-CLAERWY), a chapelry in the parish of CLYRO, hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Hay, containing 250 inhabitants. This place partakes, in common with the parish in which it is situated, of the scenery by which this part of the principality is characterized: the views embrace a pleasing variety of landscape, enlivened by the windings of the river Wye. The chapel is distant about two miles from the church of Clyro. There is a separate assessment for the support of the poor: the average annual expenditure amounts to £158. 14.

BETTWS-DISSERTH (BETTWS-DISERTH), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. E.) from Builth, containing 141 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated near the source of the river Edw, or Edwy, and on the turnpike road leading from Kington to Builth. It is of considerable extent: the soil is various, but in general fertile and productive, and the substratum in some parts of the parish has been thought to consist of coal; but an endeavour to procure this fossil, made some time since, on a farm called Tyncoed, was unattended with success, and though a shaft was sunk to a considerable depth, no indications of coal were discovered. The surrounding scenery, though generally pleasing, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature from that which prevails throughout this part of the principality. The living is a rectory not in charge, consolidated with that of Dissertth, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. This is one of the parishes from which a child is to be annually apprenticed, under the will of the Rev. Rees Powell of Boughrood, with a premium of £5. Mrs. Elizabeth Lewis, in 1746, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2, on a farm called Gwern-Vawr, in this parish, to be given to the poor at the discretion of the minister and six of the principal inhabitants. A rent-charge of £1 was bequeathed by an unknown benefactor; and Elizabeth Jones, in 1746, bequeathed £40 in money, of which the interest was paid for some years by the executor, but was afterwards discontinued. There are some sulphureous springs in the parish, but they are not strongly impregnated, nor are they used for medicinal purposes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £56. 17.

BETTWS-GARMON, a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Carnarvon, on the road to Bethgelart, containing 128 inhabitants. The scenery in the neighbourhood is magnificently grand and strikingly varied : part of the base of Snowdon is within the limits of the parish, and, previously to the foundation of the new line of road to Llanberis and Capel Curig, the principal ascent to that mountain was from this place, at which was a small house, occupied by a guide, who was constantly in attendance to conduct the adventurous traveller to its summit. Behind the parish church is the mountain Moel Eilio, which rises to the height of two thousand three hundred and seventy-seven feet above the level of the sea; and on the south of it is Mynydd-Mawr, of less elevation, though seen to greater advantage from the road: both these mountains abound with copper-ore, but, from the great influx of water, the expense of obtaining it is too great to allow an adequate remuneration. On the summits of both mountains are the remains of watch towers, or exploratory stations, erected to defend the pass; and at the foot of Mynydd-Mawr is a bold rock, called Castell Cidwm, supposed to have been the residence of some ancient British chieftains. The abrupt and mountainous elevations, which form so prominent a feature in the scenery of this district, are finely softened and contrasted by divers lakes within the parish, which are much resorted to by tourists and by artists, who find, in the beautiful scenery around them, some of the finest subjects for the pencil. Of these, the principal are Fynnon Lâs, Llŷn Cŏch, Llŷn y Nadroedd, and Llŷn Fynnon y Gwâs, which are the several sources of the river Avon, or Tarddeni. Llŷn Cawel-lyn, one of the most celebrated lakes in this part of the principality, is partly within this parish; in which also is Nant Mill, remarkable for its beautiful cascade, which has engaged the attention and employed the pencil of numerous artists. Fairs are held here on August 17th and September 22nd and 26th. The living, usually styled a perpetual curacy, is vicarial, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Newborough. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, is a small edifice, in a dilapidated condition, romantically situated in a vale bounded by lofty mountains. On the side of a hill, about one mile to the west of it, there is a fine spring of water, called St. Garmon's well, of reputed efficacy in the cure of rheumatic and eruptive disorders. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £38.

BETTWS-GWERVIL-GŌCH, a parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.N.W.) from Corwen, containing 273 inhabitants. The village is situated on the road from Bala to Ruthin, and on the small river Alwen, over which there is a bridge of three arches. The vale of Alwen is pleasingly picturesque, particularly at Point Llŷn y Gigvran, where the hills along the banks of the stream, from the base to the summit, are thickly clothed with trees: the Alwen is here crossed by a bridge of one wide arch. The parish is about ten miles in circumference, and not more than one-half is under cultivation: it forms part of the district which is noted for the knitting of woollen hose. A farm, called Bot-tegŷr, in the county of Denbigh, is within its limits, and was the residence of Col. William Salusbury, who bravely defended the castle of Denbigh, for fourteen weeks, against a besieging body of parliamentarians under Major-General Mytton, and then surrendered only upon the most honourable terms. Fairs are held here on June 22nd, August 12th, September 16th, and December 12th, for horned cattle, horses, sheep, and pigs; that in August is one of the largest lamb fairs in North Wales. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the early style of English architecture: near the entrance there is a piscina. Close to the church is a well, called St. Mary's. It is in contemplation to erect a National school, for the benefit of poor children of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £107. 9.

BETTWS-IEUVAN, or EVAN (BETTWS-IEUAN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROED-YRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 386 inhabitants. This parish is situated a short distance to the east of the turnpike road leading from Cardigan to Aberystwith. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed, with that of Brongwŷn, to the vicarage of Penbrŷn, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. John, has been recently repaired, and has received two hundred and fifty additional sittings, of which one hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the building and enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £25 towards defraying the expense. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £124. 6.

BETTWS-LEIKE (BETTWS-LEICI), a chapelry in that part of the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI which is in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 381 inhabitants. It is situated in the pleasant vale of the Aëron, and on the left bank of that river. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Perpetual Curate of Llandewy-Brevi. This chapelry separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £59. 9.

BETTWS Y COED, or BETTWS-WYRION-IDDON, a parish in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S.) from Llanrwst, on the road to Holyhead and Dublin, containing 348 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from an ancient religious establishment, called Bettws Wyrion Iddon, or "the bead-house of the children of Iddon," on the site of which the present church was built; and was formerly only a township in the parish of Llanrhy-chwyn, from which it was separated in the sixteenth century. The village is delightfully situated in a beautiful vale, surrounded on all sides by the Carnarvonshire and Denbighshire mountains, and near the confluence of the rivers Conway and Llugwy. Over the former of these rivers, about half a mile above the church, is an iron bridge of one noble arch, beautifully ornamented with the rose, thistle, and shamrock, with an inscription in Roman capitals, purporting that it was constructed in the year in which the battle of Waterloo was fought, and thence called Waterloo bridge; and over the latter is a bridge of singular construction, called Pont y Pair, consisting of four arches resting upon masses of rugged precipitous rocks of romantic appearance, which in high floods exhibit below the bridge several beautiful cataracts of striking magnificence. This picturesque structure was projected and partly raised by one Howel, a mason from Penllŷn, who, about the year 1468, had previously erected a bridge over the Lleder, at a spot where his passage had been obstructed by a flood, whilst on his journey to Aberconway, to attend the Merionethshire assizes, to which place he removed, and, having built the bridge at his own expense, received no other remuneration than the voluntary donations of travellers: he then removed to this place, where he commenced Pont y Pair bridge, but died before its completion. The scenery around this spot consists of rocky mountains fringed with wood, in the fissures of which are found trees of stately growth, and the whole neighbourhood abounds with strikingly magnificent and finely contrasted features. The three rivers, Conway, Llugwy, and Lledr, unite within the parish, and, in their course through the mountainous districts, form numerous and majestic cataracts, for which this parish is celebrated. Of these the principal are the falls of the Conway, Machno, and Llugwy: the first, rushing with impetuosity through rocks of tremendous height, which contract the passage of the waters, after descending from a great height, forms four smaller falls, which are seen in succession from the same spot; and just below the confluence of the Conway and the Lledr there is a deep, wide, and still piece of water, called Llŷn yr Afanc, or "the beavers' pool," from its being the resort of that animal, the skin of which was anciently prized more highly than that of the ermine. About two miles from the village is the cataract of Rhaiadr y Wenol, or "the waterfall of the swallow," formed by the river Llugwy, which, after pursuing its course for a considerable distance through a strait rocky channel, along narrow meadows enclosed by mountains of majestic elevation, falls into a hollow of amazing depth, the sides and summit of which are shaded with trees, that have taken root in the fissures of the rocks. The whole of the neighbouring mountains abound with lead-ore, but none of the mines have been worked for some time, on account of the great reduction in the price of that article, which has recently taken place: a few of the inhabitants are engaged in the spinning of woollen yarn and the knitting of stockings. A considerable variety of quartz chrystal, of a beautiful whiteness, is found in the parish. Fairs are held here annually on May 15th and December 3rd. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Willoughby de Eresby. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small, but interesting edifice, romantically situated near the confluence of the Conway and Llugwy, and occupying the site of the ancient religious house before noticed: the interior contains, among other ancient monuments, an altar-tomb to the memory of Gruffydd ab Davydd Gôch, son to Davydd Gôch, natural son of Davydd, brother of Llewelyn, the last prince of Wales, on which is a recumbent effigy in plate armour, with an inscription in a very perfect state: this beautiful relic, which is the production of the thirteenth century, is injudiciously concealed by the erection of a pew over the monument. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A charity school, open to all the poor children of the parish, was founded in 1821, by the Right Hon. Lord Willoughby de Eresby, and is supported solely at his lordship's expense. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £152. 12.

BETTWS-YN-RHÔS, otherwise BETTWS-ABERGELAU, a parish in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Abergele, containing 912 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated at the base of a lofty mountain, by which it is sheltered on one side, and has a fine opening towards the north, commanding a full view of the Irish channel. Coed Côch, the seat of John Lloyd Wynne, Esq., is a splendid mansion, with an elegant portico of five fluted columns of Penrhŷn slate stone. Fairs are held on February 20th, May 8th, August 15th, and November 20th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was, previously to the Reformation, a chapel of ease to Abergele. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school has been erected by subscription, aided by a grant of £39 from the National Society, in which about fifty children from the adjoining parishes at present receive gratuitous instruction. The school is supported partly by subscription, and partly by a rental of £10 issuing from a tenement called Aelwyd Uchâv, assigned on the enclosure of waste lands: the master also receives £13. 10. per annum from the rental of three other tenements, called Gydar, Dôlwyd Bâch, and Rhŷd y Saeson, in the parish of Llansaintfrïd Glan Conway, amounting to £35. 10., of which the remainder is divided among the poor in clothing and money on St. Thomas' day. A rent-charge of ten shillings on Pen y Bryn farm is also applied for the benefit of the poor. About a quarter of a mile from the village there is a copious chalybeate spring, which was much resorted to a few years since, but its efficacy has been greatly weakened by the influx of other waters. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor is £561. 16.

BISHOPSTON, or LLAN-DEILO-VERWALT, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Swansea, containing 476 inhabitants. This place derives its name from having formerly belonged to the bishops of Llandaf, who held the manor in free alms. The custom of the manor is that copyholds not only descend to the youngest son or daughter, but also in the collateral line, to brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, &c.; and there is an ancient tenement, called Culver House, which is held by service of grand serjeantry at the king's coronation, the tenure having been recognised by the last court of claims. The village is pleasantly situated in a fertile vale near the sea. Lead-ore is found in the parish, and was formerly procured in great quantities: within the last few years the mine was re-opened, when the implements of the former miners were discovered; several tons of good ore were raised, but the works have again been discontinued. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, has no particular claim to architectural description. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Mrs. Catherine Rees, in 1728, bequeathed £100 to be invested in the purchase of land, out of the rent of which £2. 5. is now appropriated to the instruction of children, and the remainder is distributed among the poor of the parish. The small village of Caswell, in this parish, gives name to Caswell bay, remarkable for the grandeur of its rocky scenery, and for the variety and beauty of the shells thrown up on the shore. A spring of water, issuing from a rock close to the beach, which is covered by the sea at high water, is said to retain its freshness, perfectly free from any saline mixture, when the sea retires. Here was formerly a chapel, which has long since fallen into ruins. The Rev. Edward Davies, the learned author of the Celtic Researches and the Mythology of the Ancient Britons, was for many years rector of this parish, where he died and was buried, in January 1831. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £108. 16.

BLAENAËRON (BLAEN-AËRON), a township in the parish of TRÊGARON, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.W.) from Trêgaron, containing 304 inhabitants.

BLAENAU, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVIHAN-GEL-CWM DÛ, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Crickhowel, containing 216 inhabitants. This place is situated at the upper extremity of the vale of Cwm dÛ, among the Black mountains.

BLAENAU, a hamlet in the parish of LLANNON, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (S. E. by E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated near the source of the Gwili stream, at the head of which coal abounds, and contiguous to the southern declivity of the Mynydd-Mawr mountain, over which the road from Llanelly to Llandilo-Vawr passes, after proceeding through this place. An old rail-road is carried along its western division from the above mountain to the sea-coast.

BLAENAU, a joint hamlet with Tîr Rosser, in the parish of LLANDEBYE, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the parish. The eastern part of the lofty mountain of Mynydd-Mawr, which abounds with coal and limestone, is situated within this hamlet. A small stream which falls into the Loughor river passes through it, on the banks of which some pleasing cottages and well-wooded knolls are discernible. There are numerous coal-pits in this district.

BLAENAU, a joint hamlet with Llan, in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish, of which it forms the north-western portion; the road from Llangendeirn to Carmarthen passes through it.

BLAENCARON (BLAEN-CARON), a township in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Trêgaron, containing 94 inhabitants. The name of this township is expressive of its situation at the head of the river Caron.

BLAEN-CLOWON-VACH, a township forming the upper division of the parish of LLANDYSILIO-GOGO, lower division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by N.) from Lampeter. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated near the source of the river Clettwr. There are some agreeable residences scattered over the township, which is in general rather undulating than mountainous.

BLAENEGAL, a joint hamlet with Caegurwen, in the parish of LLANGUICKE, hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7½ miles (N.) from Neath. The population is returned with the parish.

BLAEN-GLESYRCH (BLAEN-GLÂS-ERCH), a township in the parish of LLANWRIN, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Machynlleth. The population is returned with the parish. This place takes its name from the small stream called the Glesyrch, which falls into the Dylas within a few miles of the junction of that river with the Dovey: it comprises the upper and northern part of the parish, where the ground is elevated, and commands fine views of the mountains in North Wales and the pleasing vale of the Dovey, with that river winding through it.

BLAEN-GLYN-TAWE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See CAPEL-CALLWEN.

BLAEN-GWRACH, a chapelry in the parish of GLYN-CORWG, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. E. by E.) from Neath, containing 414 inhabitants. The village is situated near the head of the vale of Neath, which is here seen in all its varied and romantic beauty: the striking character of its scenery, abounding with luxuriant verdure, is heightened by contrast with the sterile brow of a lofty mountain, which towers above the neighbouring hills, and the rocky declivities of which are indented by numerous deep fissures, through which, after heavy rains, or rapid thaws, the waters rush down in impetuous torrents, exhibiting a scene of awful grandeur and sublimity. The river Gwrach, from which the village takes its name, swollen with the mountain streams that augment its waters, frequently overflows its banks, and inundates the adjacent meadows, which become one entire sheet of water. Ynislaes, an elegant cottage built by the Hon. Windham Henry Wyndham Quin, now Earl of Dunraven and Mountearl, and for some time his own residence, occupies a beautiful situation, commanding a delightful view of the rich vale of Neath, through its whole extent. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Glyn-Corwg, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £800 royal bounty. There is a place of worship for Independents, which is one of the oldest in the principality. Dr. Abraham Rees, for many years minister of the Independent congregation meeting in Jewin-street, London, and author of the most voluminous Encyclopædia ever published, and probably the most extensive work ever completed by an individual, was born in this chapelry, while his father, Mr. Lewis Rees, was pastor of the Independent congregation here. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £160. 17.

BLAEN-HONDDAN, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1¼ mile (N.) from Neath, containing

BLAEN-PENAL, a chapelry in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $10\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 543 inhabitants. It is situated at the extremity of the beautiful vale of Aëron, which river rises from a mountain near the village, in which and the surrounding district are several pleasing and ornamental residences. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Perpetual Curate of Llandewy-Brevi. The chapel is dedicated to St. David. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. This chapelry separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £82. 4.

BLAENPORTH (BLAEN-PORTH), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Cardigan, on the road to Aberystwith, containing 695 inhabitants. The lands in this parish are nearly all enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. The living, formerly a prebend in the college of St. David's at Llandewy-Brevi, and rated as such in the king's books at £6, is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Lisburne and J. V. Lloyd, Esq., who are impropiators of the tithes of the parish, and pay £8 per annum to the curate. The church, dedicated to St. David, consists only of a nave, chancel, and porch, and has a bell suspended at the west end of the roof. About two hundred yards to the north of it is an ancient fortress, called "the Gaer," and in some authorities "Castel Gwythan," which is said to have been thrown up by Gilbert Earl of Strigyl and the Flemings who settled in this part of the principality, and to have been besieged by Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, in the year 1116, who, after repeated assaults, took it, with the loss of only one of his men, and burnt it to the ground: it was defended by a single ditch and rampart, still plainly distinguishable, and at one extremity is a lofty mound, on which probably was a watch-tower. At a small distance from the site of this post, which occupied the summit of an eminence, is a smaller camp, called "Caer Sonydd;" and on the sea-coast is another of small extent, but of great strength, called "Tudor's Castle." At Tyllwyd, in this parish, the property of J. V. Lloyd, Esq., there is a chalybeate spring, the water of which is, however, but seldom used. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £167. 19.

VETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E. by E.) from Llangadock. The population is returned with the parish. The name signifies the head of the Sawdde, or Sawddwy, which stream pursues its course through the hamlet, having its source in a beautiful and romantic lake on a declivity of the Black mountain, near the confines of Brecknockshire. This hamlet is assessed jointly with that of Maes y Fynnon for the support of the poor: the average annual expenditure is £98. 15.

BLETHERSTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Narberth, containing 300 inhabitants. The living is a consolidated vicarage with Llawhaden, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's. Several silver coins were found here about ten years ago, but they were immediately sold at Haverfordwest, and smelted; so that nothing is known of their date or history. There is an estate in this parish, called Langridge, which belongs to the Bishop of St. David's. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £133. 16.

BLETHVA (BLEDDVA), a parish partly in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, and partly in that of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Knighton, containing 233 inhabitants. This parish is situated within the boundaries of the forest of Blethva, and near the river Lug, and is intersected by the high roads from Knighton in this county, and from Builth in the county of Brecknock, to Newtown in Montgomeryshire. Its aspect is barren and uninviting: a great part of it being little better than a dreary unproductive waste, agriculture is here in a rude state; the mountains, however, afford pasturage for large flocks of sheep. The petty sessions for the hundred are occasionally held here. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a large structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, but without any claim to architectural notice. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £114. 6.

BÔDAIOCH (BÔD-AIOCH), a township in the parish of TRÊVEGLWYS, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Llanidloes. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the left bank of the river Tarannon, which flows into the Severn a few miles distant.

BÔDEDERN (BÔD-EDEYRN), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (E. by S.) from Holyhead, containing 1085 inhabitants. This parish derived its name from having been the residence of Edeyrn, a bard, who flourished about the middle of the seventh century, and who, having embraced a religious life, presided over the church at this place. The village, which is one of the most extensive in the county, is pleasantly situated on the old Holyhead road: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. The principal seats within the parish are, Presadded, a fine ancient family mansion, of which the estate was held in fee by the service of attending at the coronation of the Princes of Wales, and supporting the right side of the canopy during that solemnity; and Tre' Iorwerth, the property and residence of the Rev. H. Wynne Jones, a good family mansion, beautifully situated in the midst of luxuriant and extensive plantations. Near the latter seat is Llyn Llwenmyn, a fine lake, from which issues a small rivulet, on the banks of which, within the parish, are the scattered ruins of two cromlechs. The spinning of woollen yarn is carried on in the village, for which purpose there are two mills, set in motion by water, attached to which are dye-houses and a fulling-mill. There is a branch establishment under the post-office at Bangor; and fairs, principally for cattle, are held on March 13th, April 16th, May 5th, June 9th, Whit-Tuesday (for hiring servants), August 16th, September 14th, and December 1st and 22nd. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here once a month, and district meetings take place quarterly at the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Edeyrn, is a small ancient structure, displaying some good architectural details, and containing some fine monuments to the memory of deceased members of the Presaddved and Tre' Iorwerth families. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school was erected in 1822, by the voluntary contributions of the gentry in the neighbourhood, and is supported by subscription: about seventy children of the parish receive gratuitous instruction in it. Dr. Gwynn gave a portion of tithes, producing £2. 10. per annum, Mr. Edmund Griffith and Mrs. Jane Wynne gave certain portions of land; and Mrs. Roberts assigned the moiety of the interest of £100, to the poor of this parish; the produce of which benefactions, together with that of some other charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed, according to the directions of the several benefactors. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £309. 12.

BÔDEWRYD (BÔD-EWRYD), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Amlwch, containing 35 inhabitants. This small parish was formerly comprehended in that of Llaneilian, from which it was detached, and formed into a parish of itself, within the last thirty years. It consists only of two farm-houses, one of them anciently the mansion of the Wynne family, with their respective farms, and has no parochial officers, either ecclesiastical or civil: in levying the county rate it is, with the parish of Gwredog, considered as a fourth division to the three contained in the parish of Amlwch. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed, in 1722, with one hundred and twenty-one acres of land, and a rent-charge of £2, by Dr. Wynne, Chancellor of Hereford, and subsequently with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir John Thomas Stanley, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small ancient edifice, containing some monuments to the Wynnes, proprietors of the parish, and a brass recording the munificence of Dr. Wynne, above noticed, who lies entombed in the church. A parochial school has been founded, and is supported at the expense of Lady Stanley, for the education of female children of this and the adjoining parishes.

BODIDRIS (BÔD-IDRIS), a township in the parish of LLANARMON, partly in the hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, and partly in that of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W. by N.) from Wrexham. The population is returned with the parish. This place derives its name from Idris, son of Llewelyn Aurdorchog, or "of the golden torquis," one of the ancient lords of Yale. The mansion, which is large and of considerable antiquity, was formerly the residence of the Lloyds, the last of whom, Sir Evan Lloyd, Bart., dying without male issue, the estate descended to Evan Lloyd Vaughan, Esq., in right of his mother, daughter of Sir Evan, and subsequently, by maternal descent, to Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart., who, dying unmarried, left it, with the bulk of his extensive landed possessions, to his sister's son, Edward Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq. Here is a charity school, but it has no particular endowment.

BÔDVAEN (BOD-VUAN, or BÔD-VUAN in LLEYN), a parish in the hundred of DINLLAEN, LLEYN division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Pwllheli, containing 378 inhabitants. This small parish is situated in a very extensive plain, near the base of Carn Bôdvan, and abounds with fossils, of which great quantities, chiefly oyster and muscle shells, are found imbedded in a soft limestone rock, near the church, and in a very perfect state. Bodvaen Hall, now the property and occasional residence of Lord Newborough, is a handsome mansion, occupying a pleasant situation within its limits. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Buan, a handsome modern edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, was erected in 1765, at the expense of the Misses Catherine and Elizabeth Wynne, of Bôdvaen Hall, and contains some good monuments to different members of that family. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. William Lloyd, Esq., in 1784, bequeathed £100 for educating poor children of the parish, of whom twenty-five are gratuitously instructed from this fund during the summer months. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £94. 6.

BÔDVARI (BÔD-FARI), a parish partly in the Caerwys division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, and comprising the township of Aber-Whielor, which supports its own poor, in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E.) from Denbigh, on the road from Holywell to that town, and containing 873 inhabitants. This place is, from its name, supposed to have been the Roman station Varis, and the opinion has been in some degree confirmed by the recent discovery of urns, ornaments, fragments of weapons, and other relics of Roman antiquity, in the grounds of Pontrifith, and some coins near the junction of the rivers Clwyd and Whielor, the supposed site of the Roman station. The supposition is further corroborated by the direction of the Roman road from Chester, which, uniting with the north-east branch of the Watling-street, continued to Bôdvári, whence, crossing the county of Denbigh, it passed over the Conway to Caerhên. The village is delightfully situated near the confluence of the two rivers, and the surrounding country is remarkably picturesque and beautiful. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 5. 2½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Stephen, and situated on a gentle eminence, is a neat edifice with a lofty square embattled tower: the interior is neatly fitted up, and appropriately ornamented; the pulpit and reading-desk are of black oak, exquisitely carved, and in the front is the date 1574. To the east of the village is Moel y Gaer, or the "Hill of the Camp," apparently a British work, and probably constructed for the purpose of defending the pass through the Clwydian mountains. Through this pass, which is remarkable as being the only natural break in this chain of mountains, extending for more than twenty miles in a direction from north to south, flows the river Whielor, near the bank of which an excellent turnpike-road has been constructed, winding round the base of a hill, called Moel y Parc, and connecting the counties of Denbigh and Flint. The tithes of the township of Aber-Whielor belong to the Bishop of Bangor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £508. 6., of which sum £124. 14. is assessed on that part of the parish which is in the hundred of Rhuddlan.

BÔDVERIN (BÔD-FERIN), a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Llein division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 14 miles (W. by S.) from Pwllheli, containing 56 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, and is of very small extent: it contains within its limits two small creeks, called Porth Verin and Porth Iago, and there is a well, called Fynnon Bibau, near Trêvgrraig, which is the source of the river Daron. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llaniestyn, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The ancient church, dedicated to St. Merin, fell into decay after the Reformation, and the site of the building and the churchyard, which were visible within the last few years, have been recently obliterated by the plough. The inhabitants attend divine service in the parish church of Llangwnadl, where all the ecclesiastical rites for this parish are performed. On the side of a hill, called Mynydd Moelvre, or Mynydd yr Ystum, are the ruins of an ancient chapel, named Capel Odo; and in the vicinity there is a tumulus, called Bedd Odo, or Odo's grave, which, according to tradition, covers the remains of a giant of that name. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £24. 1.

BÔDWROG (BÔD-TWROG), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Llangevni, containing 312 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, to whom the tithes and advowson were appropriated by Dr. Wynne, Chancellor of Llandaf, in 1648, subject to the payment of £1. 5. per annum to the poor of this parish, and who generally present a scholar of that college to the living. The church, dedicated to St. Twrog, is a small edifice, situated on an eminence at a considerable distance from any human habitation. There is a small bequest of £12, given by Mr. John Lloyd, for the benefit of the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £99. 10.

BONVILSTON, otherwise BOLSTON, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from Cowbridge, on the road to Cardiff, containing 247 inhabitants. The village, which is pleasantly situated, is ornamented with several neat cottages, and with the ancient residence of the family of Bassett, and has a prepossessing appearance of cheerfulness and gentility. Limestone of good quality abounds in the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £6. 9. 2., and endowed with £15 per annum, principally issuing out of the small tithes, and £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John James Bassett, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat and appropriate structure. Grace Aubrey, in 1678, bequeathed £100, Mrs. Loughor £50, and Mr. David John, in 1776, £10, for the use of the poor, making together the sum of £160, to which £3 per annum has been subsequently added, arising out of two deed polls, purchased with ten years' arrears of Grace Aubrey's donation, according to an inscription on a tablet in the church. There is said to have been formerly a castle here, the site of which is still pointed out, but no account of its foundation, nor any particulars of its history, have been recorded. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £115. 16.

BORRAS (BWRAS), a township comprising the division of Borrás-Bovah in the parish of WREXHAM, and that of Borrás-Rifrey in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Wrexham, containing 86 inhabitants, of which number, 45 are in the division of Borrás-Bovah, and 41 in that of Borrás-Rifrey. This township, which comprises a small agricultural tract, lying near the river Dee, supports its own poor, according to an arrangement made in March 1830.

BORVA, a joint township with Bareland, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (E.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with the townships of Evenjobb and Newcastle. This township, situated on the border of Herefordshire, is extremely well wooded. Offa's Dyke passes through it, near which are the remains of an ancient camp.

BOSHERSTON, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Pembroke, containing 222 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, by which it is bounded on the south, and the rocks on this part of the coast are, by the repeated action of the sea, worn into caverns of considerable depth, and of singular and romantic appearance. Of these, Bosherton Meer, about a quarter of a mile from the sea, is the most remarkable: at the entrance it presents only a small opening on the surface of the ground, but gradually expands into a spacious cavern of increasing depth, which has never yet been explored. Previously to the commencement of a storm, the confined air is greatly agitated, and the most terrific noises issue from the cavern, which are heard at a great distance: during the violence of the tempest immense columns of spray are occasionally thrown up, and so great is the force of the receding current of air, that animals near its mouth are drawn into the cavern and engulfed in its vortex. By far the greater part of the land in this parish is enclosed and in a state of cultivation, but there is a considerable portion forming an extensive expanse of open downs. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £11. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat edifice, and was handsomely ornamented by John Campbell, Esq., a member of the Cawdor family. A little to the east of Bosherston Meer, and also within the parish, is the hermitage of St. Gawen, situated in a fissure of the rock, apparently formed by some violent convulsion, and about half-way between the summit and the base. A flight of steps, rudely cut in the rock, forms an ascent to the small chapel, which is about twenty feet in length and twelve feet wide, with an altar formed of a coarse stone slab, harmonizing with the rude and simple character of the place. On one side a door, opening from the chapel, leads into a small cell, cut in the rock, in form resembling the human body, which is said to have been the solitary retreat of St. Gawen. Beneath the hermitage is St. Gawen's well, formerly in great repute for the miraculous efficacy, in the cure of diseases, superstitiously ascribed to it through the influence of the saint, and still held in veneration by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. The scenery around this sequestered spot is of the wildest and most romantic character: large fragments of rock, scattered in confused heaps, lie around it in every direction, and huge masses of rugged cliffs, threatening to detach themselves every moment from the higher precipices, which impend over the sea-worn base of the rock, give to the bold sublimity of the scene an appalling grandeur of effect. St. Gawen, from whom the promontory called St. Gawen's Head derives its name, though popularly regarded as a saint and anchorite, is said to have been the nephew of the renowned King Arthur, and one of the knights of his round table; and Hoole, in one of the notes attached to his translation of Orlando Furioso, asserts that on "a beach of the sea, near Milford Haven, is a natural rock, shaped into a chapel, which tradition reports to have been the burying-place of Sir Gawaine, King Arthur's nephew." The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure of £84. 9.

BOTTWNOG (BÔD-WYNNOG), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, Llein division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Pwllheli, containing 179 inhabitants. The village is situated in an extensive plain, but neither it nor the surrounding district possesses features worthy of particular notice. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Meylltyn, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is a small edifice, in a very dilapidated state. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The grammar school was founded in 1616, by Dr. Henry Rowlands, Bishop of Bangor, who endowed it with a farm, called Llŷslew, at Porthamel, in the county of Anglesey, now producing £200 per annum, of which sum £100 per annum is paid to the master (who, according to the will of the founder, must be an Englishman, and have taken the degree of master of arts at the University of Oxford), and £40 per annum to an usher, and £10 is allowed annually for coal; the remainder has been suffered to accumulate, and at present amounts to £550. There are fifty-four boys on the foundation, who are instructed in the general branches of an English education, and in the classics, when required. An excellent house was built in 1817, as a residence for the master, and the school-room and house for the usher are in very good repair. Bishop Rowlands also bequeathed to the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, all his lands in Erianell, in the county of Anglesey, for the foundation of two fellowships in that college, one fellow to be from the school of Bottwnog, and one from that of Bangor, or of Beaumaris; and he charged his estate of Tyddyn y ddreinioes with the payment of £6 per annum for two poor boys in the school of Bottwnog. The average annual expenditure to support the poor is £35. 7.

BOUGHROOD (BÂCH-RHYD), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Hay, containing 354 inhabitants. It is beautifully situated on the eastern bank of the Wye, across which there is a ford, from which the name of the place, signifying "the little ford," has been derived, where a boat and horse are in constant attendance, and on the western bank of which passes the road from Hay to Builth. The village is delightfully embowered in wood, and sheltered by hills of moderate elevation; and on the opposite bank of the Wye, which just below the ferry-house makes the most remarkable horse-shoe bend in the whole of its course, gliding along its smooth bed in unruffled tranquillity, strongly opposed to the impetuosity which characterizes the earlier part of its course over its rocky channel, extends a more elevated ridge of hills, clothed to the summit with majestic timber. The parish is almost equally divided between hilly and level ground: the soil is very light on the hills, but rich and clayey on the banks of the Wye: the small stream called Bâch-wy empties itself into the Wye near the village. Of the ancient castellated mansion, called Boughrood Castle, the only remains are the moat and part of a wall: a spacious modern house, bearing the same name, was erected nearly on its site by the late Francis Fowkes, Esq., which, together with the estate, has recently been sold to Walter Wilkins, of Maeslough, Esq. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's, who also presents to the prebend of Boughrood, otherwise Llanbedr-Paincastle, in Christ's College, Brecknock, which is only rated at 13s. 4d. The church, dedicated to St. Cynog, consists of a nave and chancel, and, like most of the village churches in this part of the country, is kept neatly white-washed. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. A Sunday school is superintended by a few of the parishioners. A rent-charge of £1. 4. on a tenement in this parish is annually distributed among the poor; and £5 per annum is received from the charity founded by the Rev. Rees Powell, for apprenticing poor children. This pious and benevolent individual, who was vicar of this parish, from which his benefactions to this and divers other parishes have been called the "Boughrood charity," died in 1687, and lies buried in the priory church of Brecknock, in the account of which town his charity is described. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £186. 6.

B Boulston, otherwise BULSTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Haverfordwest, containing 302 inhabitants. This parish was for many generations the residence of the ancient family of the Wogans, by whom the church is supposed to have been originally built. It is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Cleddau, and the surrounding scenery, which in some parts is richly wooded, is pleasingly and agreeably diversified. Culm abounds in the parish, but it has not been worked; and a vein of iron-ore has been discovered, but no preparations for procuring it have been made. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Robert Innes Acland, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, ornamented on the outside with the arms of the family of Wogan, above the chancel window, and contains several monuments to different members of that family. There are several tumuli in the parish, one of which was opened by Mr. Fenton, in his tour through this county, and found to contain a rudely-formed kist, in which were some human bones half calcined, intermixed with pieces of charcoal. Some of the remains of the ancient family mansion of the Wogans, on the bank of the river, are still preserved, as a picturesque ruin, in the beautiful grounds of an elegant mansion, the seat of R. I. Acland, Esq. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £71. 16.

Brawdy, a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E.) from St. David's, containing 768 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to St. David's, is, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, consisting of hills and moors, enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. Jointly with the parish of Haycastle, it constitutes the endowment of a prebend attached to the decanal stall in the cathedral church of St. David's, the deanery being annexed to the bishoprick. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Haycastle annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. David. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians, and one each for Independents and Methodists. It is related of the Rev. Mr. Wilcocks, the present respected vicar of this parish, that, prior to entering into holy orders, he paid two masters, during twelve years, out of his earnings by daily labour, to teach all the poor children of Brawdy and Haycastle; and that the parishioners were so impressed with a sense of his meritorious conduct and love of learning, that he was ordained at their request. On Brawdy farm there is a râth, or British encampment, defended by a triple rampart. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £249. 3.

Brechva (BRECHFA), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N. E.) from Car- marthen, containing 93 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Cothy, a stream abounding with excellent trout, and in a beautifully romantic valley, surrounded on all sides by lofty hills of varied aspect, among which there is plenty of game. The soil is fertile; and the lands, which are all enclosed, are in a good state of cultivation. A turnpike road, connecting the counties of Cardigan, Carmarthen, and Glamorgan, has been constructed, which, passing through the parish, has materially contributed to the increase of its population. A fair, principally for cattle, is annually held on the 3rd of October. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of George Morgan, Esq., and the representative of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Hughes, the latter having the next presentation. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, and situated at the extremity of the parish, upon the little river Pib, is a small plain edifice, without either tower or spire. There is a place of worship for Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £15. 8.

Brecknock, a borough and market town, having exclusive jurisdiction, locally in the hundreds of Merthyr-Cynog, Pencelly, and Devynock, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 171 miles (W. by N.) from London, on the road to Milford, comprising the greater portions of the parishes of St. John the Evangelist and St. David, or Llanvaes, with the chapelry of St. Mary in the lower division of the former (the remaining portions of both these parishes being included respectively within the hundreds of Merthyr-Cynog, Devynock, and Pencelly), and the extra-parochial districts of the Castle and the College of Christchurch, and containing 5026 inhabitants, exclusively of the outportions of the two parishes, of which that of St. John's contains 119, and that of St. David's 115, and the two extra-parochial districts, of which that of the Castle contains 24, and that of Christchurch College 88, inhabitants. The origin of this place is referred to a period of very remote antiquity, having been attributed to the existence of an ancient British city, which, from its position on a moderate eminence within three miles of the present town, and from its commanding situation near the confluence of the rivers Yscir and Usk, may have been a place of considerable importance long before the arrival of the Romans in Britain. Near this place Ostorius Scapula, the first Roman general that penetrated into this part of the country, fixed a station, subsequently called Caer Ban, or Caer Bannau, and the remains of which are now called the Gaer. The Via Julia Montana passed this way, and was here intersected by the Roman road leading from Neath to Chester, now commonly called Sarn Helen. Caer Bannau likewise communicated by a vicinal way with the station Tibia Amnis, situated at or near the modern Cardiff. Its history under the dominion of the Romans, and after their departure from Britain, is involved in obscurity, very few circumstances of importance having been recorded of it. In the fifth century it was under the jurisdiction of a petty chieftain named Brychan, who is celebrated in the Welsh annals chiefly for the number, learning, and piety of his children, and from whom the country derived the appellation of Brecheiniawg, or Brecheinog, which has been altered by the English into Brecknock and Brecon, by which names it is at present known.

In the reign of William Rufus, Bernard Newmarch, encouraged by the success of his countryman, Robert Fitz-Hamon, in establishing himself in the neighbouring territory of Glamorgan, advanced with an army against Bleddyn ab Maenarch, at that time prince of Brycheiniog, and, after an obstinate and sanguinary battle near Caervong, (said by Mr. Jones to be a corruption of Caer Ban), in which that prince was slain, took possession of his dominions. Bernard, disliking the situation of the Roman British capital of the province he had conquered, or probably induced by the superior advantages of the spot which he now chose, demolished Caer Bannau, and employed the materials in building a castle three miles lower down the river Usk, at the influx of the Honddŷ into that river, adjacent to which, in process of time, a town arose, which, from its situation, was called by the Welsh Aber Honddŷ, and, becoming the capital of the ancient principality of Brycheiniog, received from the English the name of Brecknock, or Brecon. Having completed this castle, Bernard made it his chief residence and the head of his lordship marcher. The town, also built of the materials of the ancient capital, was surrounded with walls, enclosing an elliptical area about one thousand and seventy yards in circuit, defended by a deep moat, by which, together with the rivers Usk and Honddŷ, it was completely insulated. The walls were strengthened by ten towers, at nearly equal distances, but varying in form, some being circular and others square; and had five gates, of which two, still partly remaining, appear to have led to the priory. Notwithstanding the care with which the town was fortified, it was, from its situation, but ill adapted for security, being overlooked by numerous heights, from which missiles of every kind might be discharged against it with effect; and Bernard was, therefore, enabled to retain the territory which he had subjugated more by his policy in espousing a Welsh princess, namely Nêst, the granddaughter of Gruffydd ab Llewelyn. Bernard is said to have kept Gwrgan, the eldest son of Bleddyn, in close confinement in his castle of Brecknock, not permitting him to go abroad, unless accompanied by two of his Norman knights; but he nevertheless assigned to him, and also to his brother Caradoc, certain portions of land that remained after his allotment of the rest to his Norman followers. The last expedition of this conqueror for the extension of his territory was into Radnorshire, the result of which was the addition of Elvel, in that county, to his dominions. After this, Bernard appears to have devoted the remainder of his days in atoning for the violence and injustice of the earlier part of his life: by the advice of his confessor, Roger, a monk of the abbey of Battle in Sussex, he founded, without the castle walls, a priory for monks of the Benedictine order, which he dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, and made a cell to that abbey: he endowed it with ample possessions, including the chapel within the castle, and churches, lands, tithes, and various other sources of revenue in several counties, and placed it under the management of Walter, an intimate friend of Roger's, and a monk in the same abbey, who, on the completion of the buildings, was made prior, and charged with the annual payment of twenty shillings, in token of dependence upon the abbey of Battle, to the abbacy of which the priors of Brecknock were eligible, and in the election of whom to that dignity the brethren of this priory had the privilege of voting.

Bernard Newmarch died in the reign of Henry I., and was interred in the cloisters of the cathedral of Gloucester. His son-in-law and successor, Milo Fitz-Walter, resided principally at Gloucester, seldom visiting his Welsh possessions; but his eldest son, Roger, after succeeding to the lordship of Brecknock, was a munificent benefactor to the monks of this priory, to whom he granted five several charters, still extant, conferring many valuable gifts and important privileges. Among the former were the site of the Vasta Civitas, the ancient Caer Bannau, with its dependencies, extending up the northern bank of the river Usk, from the influx of the Yscir to that of the Cilieni; the exclusive possession of all mills in the parish of Brecknock, with the absolute right of prohibiting the erection of others; and the tithes of all cattle arising from the "benevolence or free gift of the Welsh," a sarcastic term, by which the Norman lords designated the annual contribution of a certain number of cattle, which they rigorously exacted from their Welsh tenantry, for the supply of their larder. The lordship and castle of Brecknock, after the decease of the other sons of Milo Fitz-Walter, passed by marriage with his daughter to Philip de Breos, Lord of Builth, whose ancestor had accompanied the Conqueror into England. Philip died in the reign of Henry II., and left his possessions to his son, William de Breos, a man of a fierce and turbulent character, who, from the veneration in which he held the priory of St. John, at Brecknock, granted to all persons belonging to it, as well burgesses as others, exemption from all levies and contributions payable to chief constables, and from all fines for common trespasses and defaults, and to the monks of that establishment the goods and chattels of felons, reserving to himself and to the officers of his court the right of determining and passing all sentences affecting life or limb. William, having summoned Trahearn Vychan, the great grandson of Bleddyn ab Maenarch, and lord of Llangorse, to a conference at Brecknock, in 1198, the latter immediately prepared to obey the injunction of his superior lord, who caused him to be treacherously seized on his way, and fastening him to a horse's tail, ordered him to be dragged through the streets of Brecknock, after which he was beheaded, and his body ignominiously hung up by the feet for three days. This lord was also continually embroiled with King John, to whom, after repeated delays in the payment of a large sum of money, he was obliged to deliver up his castles of Brecknock, Hay, and Radnor; but soon afterwards raising a body of troops in haste, he retook them by surprise, and recovered possession of them. Having committed some devastations in the adjacent country, he was closely pressed by the king's forces, and at last withdrew into Ireland, where he associated himself with the enemies of the English sovereign. He afterwards made a feigned submission to the king, who was preparing to embark for Ireland; but, after again exciting disturbances in Wales, he at length retired into France, where he died in exile, and his estates escheated to the crown. The castle and lordship of Brecknock, with the other portion of the estates in Wales, were restored by King John to Giles Bishop of Hereford, son of William de Breos, on whose death they passed, in 1215, to his brother Reginald, who, having married the daughter of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of Wales, entered, with his father-in-law, into the confederacy formed by the disaffected English barons against that monarch. The English portion of his paternal estates was afterwards restored to Reginald by Henry III., with whom he had entered into a separate treaty. Llewelyn, in revenge for Reginald's desertion from his former alliance, laid siege to Brecknock, intending to demolish it; but, on the petition of the inhabitants, strengthened by the earnest intercession of his nephew Rhÿs, he was prevailed upon to spare the town; and, taking hostages for the future conduct of the burgesses, and a hundred marks as a compensation to his troops, he retired and proceeded across the mountains towards Gower. Reginald, dying in 1228, was interred in the priory church at Brecknock, and his estates descended to his son, William de Breos, who, aiding the English monarch in an expedition into North Wales, was taken prisoner by Llewelyn, and detained in custody, from which he was released on the payment of a large ransom. Llewelyn, after his departure, having, as it is recorded, discovered that during his confinement he had seduced the fidelity of his wife, inveigled him into his power, in 1229, by a friendly invitation to celebrate the festival of Easter at his castle at Aber, in the county of Carnarvon, where, after a sumptuous banquet, reproaching him with his crime, he caused him to be dragged from his presence, and hanged on a neighbouring hill. This prince, in the course of his devastations in the marches, about the year 1231, when he extended his ravages as far as Caerlleon, appears to have made himself master of Brecknock; but in another excursion, about two years after, he was foiled in his attempt to surprise the castle, and, after having besieged it for a month without success, set fire to the town, and retired with his plunder into North Wales.

The lordship and castle, on the death of William de Breos, passed by marriage with his daughter to Humphrey de Bohun, sixth Earl of Hereford, in whose time Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, in the prosecution of his border warfare, came to Brecknock, on the invitation of the inhabitants, who voluntarily tendered their submission; and, notwithstanding de Bohun and he acted in concert on the side of the insurgents under Simon de Montfort, yet in 1267, on the conclusion of peace between Henry III. and Llewelyn, the latter was by treaty permitted to retain the lordship and castle of Brecknock. Humphrey de Bohun, son and successor to the former earl, recovered possession of them, apparently without much opposition from the inhabitants; and, in the 4th of Edward I., confirmed and considerably augmented the privileges conferred on the burgesses by his father, from whom they received the first charter now on record, and invested them with liberties and immunities as ample as he had previously granted to the citizens of Hereford. The hospitality of the de Bohuns, who lived in great splendour in the castle, which, in the reign of Edward III., was considerably enlarged and beautified, in the best style of that age; the grant of an annual fair for sixteen days, commencing eight days before, and continuing for eight days after, the festival of St. Leonard; the great resort of persons to the castle, and the large demand for all kinds of provisions for their supply, contributed to make the town of Brecknock more flourishing than it had ever been, and to render it the grand mart of South Wales. On the elevation of the Duke of Hereford to the throne, in 1399, by the title of Henry IV., the lordship of Brecknock became vested in the crown, in consequence of that monarch's previous marriage with the heiress of the de Bohuns; and, during the war carried on by Owain Glyndwr, in 1404, John Touchet, Lord Audley, was associated with Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick and Lord of Abergavenny, in a commission under that sovereign, to defend for one whole year the castle, town, and lordship of Brecknock, for which purpose one hundred men at arms, and three hundred archers on horseback, with a suitable allowance for their pay, were placed under their control. Henry IV., in the fourteenth year of his reign, granted to the burgesses the first royal charter which they ever obtained: this was confirmed, and some further immunities added, by his son and successor, Henry V. After the death of the Countess Dowager of Hereford, who, during her lifetime, had remained in actual possession of the lordship of Brecknock, Henry granted this domain to Anne, widow of Edmund Earl of Stafford, who no sooner obtained possession of it, than she disfranchised the borough, revoking all the charters which had previously been granted to the burgesses, and entirely annulling their privileges and immunities. Her son, who succeeded to these possessions in 1439, and was created Duke of Buckingham by Henry VI., in the twenty-third year of his reign, granted to the burgesses, in 1448, a charter, in which about seventy-five of them are enumerated, to whom, as being "English people, and to their heirs, being English, both by the father's and mother's side," the privileges were restricted; clearly shewing the policy which prevailed at that period, of excluding the Welsh inhabitants from the exercise of any municipal authority. The duke, who to his Welsh tenantry was an arbitrary master, burdening them with heavy impositions, and requiring the landholders within the lordship to exhibit the title deeds of their estates, was killed at the battle of Northampton, fighting in the cause of Henry VI., and was succeeded by his grandson Henry, then a minor, who, on attaining his majority, lived in retirement in the castle during the greater part of the reign of Edward IV., and, after the death of that monarch, became the confidential adviser of Richard Duke of Gloucester, and the chief promoter of his ambitious designs. In recompense for his services, Richard, on his elevation to the throne, appointed him governor of all the royal castles in Wales, steward of the royal manors in the counties of Hereford and Salop, Chief Justice and Chamberlain of North and South Wales, and Lord High Constable of England. But on the rupture which ensued between

Richard and the duke, the latter withdrew from court to his castle of Brecknock, in which also was confined John Morton, Bishop of Ely, originally a zealous adherent of the Lancastrian party, who, having been pardoned by the Yorkists, attached himself to the family of Edward, and had been committed by Richard to Buckingham's custody. Between the duke and his prisoner a curious conversation is recorded in the Chronicles of Stowe and Speed, the result of which was the departure of Morton to the continent, to concert with the Earl of Richmond a plan for the promotion of his enterprise, by exciting an insurrection in his favour at home. Richard, either having discovered or suspecting the plot, commanded the duke's appearance at court, which being disregarded, he sent orders to Sir Thomas Vaughan, of Trêtower, to raise the country and attack and plunder the castle of Brecknock. The duke, having mustered his dependents, and raised what forces he could, published a vehement manifesto against Richard, and advancing from Brecknock with a numerous, but ill-arranged, body of troops, proceeded upon that expedition to the south-west of England, the issue of which was fatal to his hopes and to his life. On his execution and attainder, Sir James Tyrrel was appointed commissioner for his forfeited estates in Wales, and Sir Ralph Ashton was ordained vice-constable of England, with discretionary power, either to try by the examination of witnesses, or, without trial, to pass sentence upon all persons guilty or suspected of high treason, and on all who were concerned in the insurrection, taking with him only a secretary to make minutes of his proceedings.

On the accession of Henry VII., the lordship and castle, together with the other honours and estates of the late duke, were restored to his eldest son Edward, who considerably improved the castle, and restored to the burgesses the privileges which they had enjoyed under their former charters. In the following reign, this duke was brought to trial for some indiscreet expressions respecting his title to the throne, in the event of Henry's death without issue; and being found guilty, was beheaded. As his offence was rather the effect of inconsiderate levity than of deliberate malice, the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, attributed the refusal of a pardon to the animosity and revenge of Wolsey. With him expired the office of High Constable of England, which had been hereditary in the family, and was never afterwards revived. The lordship escheated to the crown, to which it has ever since belonged, having been granted on lease to divers individuals, and is now held by Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. In the reign of Elizabeth, Mr. Harry Vaughan of Moccas was appointed Her Majesty's lieutenant and steward of the castle and lordship; during whose lieutenancy it appears, from an ancient Welsh manuscript still extant, that there broke out an insurrection of the country people, who are described as coming down from the hills to the number of twelve hundred, armed with bill-hooks, and as making an ineffectual attempt on the castle, without either arms or machines calculated to make any impression upon it. During the parliamentary war, it appears, from a manuscript in the British Museum, by Mr. Simmons, who is supposed to have been an officer in the royal army, that the inhabitants destroyed the castle, which, since the abolition of the lordships marcher, had been suffered to go to decay; and also razed the walls and fortifications of the town, in order to preclude the possibility of their being burdened with the maintenance of a garrison, or compelled to sustain a siege. The king, in his flight after the battle of Naseby, passed through the town, in the year 1645, and remained for one night at the priory house, then in the possession of Mr. (afterwards Sir Herbert) Price, one of his zealous friends and adherents; and from this place he addressed a letter to the Prince of Wales, then in Cornwall, or on his way thence to Bristol.

The town is delightfully situated at the confluence of the rivers Honddû and Tarrell with the Usk. Considerable alterations have been made of late years, with the view of improving the entrances to it, on the line of the principal thoroughfare: at the eastern extremity, the barracks, and a row of genteel houses, called Jeffreys Place, have been erected; and the Usk bridge gate, and several houses adjoining it, nearly in the centre of the town, have been taken down. The bridge over the Usk also was widened, in 1794: it is a substantial stone structure of seven arches, leading to the parish of St. David, commonly called Llanvaes, on the opposite bank of the river, one-half of which forms the lower ward of the borough. At the western extremity, the Tarrell is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of one large arch, with a cylindrical perforation at each end, erected in 1829, at the joint expense of the county and the borough. There are three bridges over the river Honddû, from which advantageous views of the dismantled towers of the castle and the priory groves are obtained: the first, which is of stone, was rebuilt in 1813, and is kept in repair by the inhabitants of the borough; the second, which anciently led to the castle, has two arches, and between them a very massive pier, that anciently sustained a draw-bridge; it is now thrown open to the public, and the expense of keeping it in repair is defrayed by the lord of the manor of Brecknock: the third, which is very near the confluence of that river with the Usk, is an old bridge of stone, consisting of three heavy arches, and is kept in repair by the inhabitants of the borough. The appearance of Brecknock is strikingly picturesque, and the various interesting objects composing the scenery of the immediate vicinity, though not numerous, are pleasingly contrasted and happily combined. The streams which converge to it, as a common centre, with their respective bridges, and the various mills erected on their banks; the venerable ruins of its ancient castle, with its massive towers and ivy-mantled walls; the embattled turret and gateway of the priory of St. John the Evangelist, with its ample and luxuriant groves, fringing the margin of the Honddû, from which in many places they appear to rise; and the magnificent range of mountain scenery to the south of the town, with the almost endless variety of impending heights, which encircle it on every side; unite in forming one of the most beautiful and richly varied views in this part of the principality; and the banks of the Honddû, a wild and rapid stream, present numerous picturesque objects. The town consists chiefly of three principal streets, diverging from the High-street, in the centre, and containing a large proportion of well-built houses of respectable appearance. One of the principal streets leads westward through Llanvaes towards Carmarthen; another takes an easterly direction, nearly parallel with the Usk, towards Abergavenny and London; while the third, called "the Struet," leads north-eastward towards Hay and Hereford: the other streets are in general narrow, but contain many good houses. The whole is lighted with gas, well paved, and supplied with water under the superintendence of commissioners appointed by a local act of parliament. A handsome building was commenced, in 1805, at the east end of the town, at the expense of Government, for the purpose of an armoury, in which for some years fifteen thousand stand of arms were deposited, but they have recently been removed, and the building has been converted into barracks, now occupied by regular troops: it is a handsome structure of red brick, enclosed within a high wall, and forming an ornament to this part of the town: the original expense was £15,000, but a considerable sum has since been laid out upon the building, in altering and improving it; notwithstanding which, however, it will not accommodate more than one hundred and twenty men. In this town are held the meetings of the Brecknockshire Agricultural Society, the oldest institution of the kind in the principality, originally established in the year 1755, and revived in November 1817: the Duke of Beaufort and Marquis Camden are the present patrons; and its affairs are conducted by a president, vice-president, and a committee of subscribers: the meetings usually take place in the rooms of the society, in the months of March and October, when the premiums to be offered for the year ensuing are determined on: the total sum distributed at the autumnal meeting, in 1831, was £53. 0. 6. The theatre, a plain building well adapted to the purpose, and elegantly fitted up in the interior, but occupying an ineligible site, is opened for four months periodically, and the company is occasionally assisted by some of the London performers. Races are held annually in the autumn, generally in the last week of September, or the beginning of October, and are in general well attended: the course is adjacent to the town, and a grand stand is about to be erected, the subscription for which has been entered into. They continue for two days: on the first are awarded the farmers' stakes of one sovereign each, and a cup given by the townsmen of Brecknock; and on the second, the members' plate of fifty sovereigns, a sweepstakes of five sovereigns each, with twenty sovereigns added out of the subscription fund, and a free handicap stakes of four sovereigns each, with thirty sovereigns added. In the assize and race weeks balls are held alternately at the guild-hall and at the Castle Inn; and, until the last winter, a regular course of public balls was supported, which were held once a fortnight during the winter, in the spacious room at the inn above-mentioned. Along the banks of the Usk, and immediately under the old town walls, a beautiful promenade has been formed, commanding a fine and extensive view of the scenery on the south side of that river; and another and more retired walk has been laid out with great taste through the woods of the priory, extending along the declivity of an eminence rising from the bank of the river Honddŷ, and embracing much of the beautiful scenery with which the environs abound. The internal neatness of the town, the pleasantness of its situation, the salu-brity of the air, and the interesting excursions which the neighbourhood affords, render it desirable as a place of residence, and have made it the retreat of many opulent and highly respectable families. The society is remarkably select, and its influence on the poorer classes is obvious in their decent and orderly demeanour, which is fully and frequently attested by the light calendar at the assizes and quarter sessions. This town has at present no manufactures, but from the different companies mentioned in its charter, each of which had a chapel in St. John's or St. Mary's church, in which they met to transact their affairs, it appears formerly to have been of some commercial importance. The trade is now principally in wool, leather, and hops, and in the supply of the neighbourhood with various articles of consumption; and has greatly increased since the construction of the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, which was completed in 1811, and communicates with the Monmouthshire canal, and thence, by Newport, with Bristol and other parts of the kingdom. The whole extent of this canal is forty-five miles, the greater portion of which is a fine level: within a few miles from the town it passes through a tunnel, nearly a quarter of a mile in length, which has been cut through a hill; and on its near approach to Newport, the navigation is partially impeded by the numerous locks, rendered necessary from the inequality of the ground through which it passes. Regular trading boats have been established, which pass weekly between this place and Bristol, and capacious wharfs for coal and lime have here been constructed on the banks of the canal. A tram-road from its head at this town to Kington, in the county of Hereford, thirty-five miles in extent, has been formed, for the conveyance of coal, lime, and other heavy commodities: about three miles from the town it passes through a tunnel, eight hundred yards in length, which has been cut through the solid rock. The markets are on Wednesday for butchers' meat and vegetables, and on Saturday, which is the principal market, for corn and provisions: the charter of this borough also grants another market on Friday. The fairs are on the first Wednesday in March, May 4th, July 5th, September 9th, and November 16th, principally for horses, cattle, sheep, agricultural produce, hops, wool, leather, and pedlery: those in May and November, of which the latter is the larger, are also statute fairs for the hiring of servants. The market-place is under the town-hall, where butchers' meat, salt butter, hops, and leather are sold; but the principal commodities, such as corn, fresh butter, poultry, hardware, &c., are exposed for sale in the streets.

During the existence of the lordship marcher of Brecknock, the inhabitants participated in the privileges and immunities which were from time to time conferred by the lords marcher upon the priors of St. John the Evangelist; but it was not till the accession of de Bohun, sixth Earl of Hereford, to the lordship, in the reign of Henry III., that they possessed any exclusive privileges of their own. This nobleman first incorporated them, and gave them a charter of privileges, which was confirmed and extended by his son and successor, who, in the 4th year of the reign of Edward I., granted them privileges and immunities equal to those enjoyed by the city of Hereford. This charter was renewed and confirmed by his son, Humphrey de Bohun, in the reign of Edward II., but in the following reign was abrogated by his successor, who, upon some offence, disfranchised the burgesses, and kept them in a state of vassalage for the remainder of his life. His nephew and successor, in the 39th of Edward III., restored to them their former privileges, and gave them a new charter of incorporation, which continued in force till the accession of Henry IV., who, in the 14th year of his reign, conferred on them their first royal charter. This charter was annulled by Anne, Countess Dowager of Stafford, who, on being put in possession of the lordship, disfranchised the burgesses; but it was restored in 1448, by her son, the first of that family who became duke of Buckingham. Under these charters the municipal government appears to have been exercised by a bailiff and twenty-four principal burgesses; and, till the union with England, the bailiff appears to have been appointed by the lord, who also appointed a sheriff of the borough, who held his office for life. The bailiff had power to appoint a deputy, and mention is made of a bailiff itinerant, the duties of whose office, though not clearly known, are supposed to have consisted in superintending the municipal government of part of the parish of Llywel, which, though eleven miles distant, is within the jurisdiction of the corporation, and in collecting the fines and other revenues of the borough. There were anciently five guilds, or trading companies, viz., the weavers, tuckers, tailors, shoemakers, and glovers, or skinners: the first four of these for several centuries held their meetings in their respective chapels, in the churches of St. John and St. Mary. The abolition of various Welsh laws and customs, during the reign of Henry VIII., having greatly diminished the revenue of the corporation, they obtained, through the interest of the Earl of Pembroke, a remission from Queen Mary, soon after her accession, of £100 of the fee-farm rent of the borough, which previously amounted to £120, and, by the same influence, in the 2nd and 3rd years of the reign of Philip and Mary, the charter by which the town is now governed, and which seems to have extended the limits of the borough, so as to include the priory precincts and the parish of St. David, as far as the river Tarrell: the borough limits, under its ancient lords, appear to have comprised only the space within the walls. By this charter the government is vested in a bailiff, recorder, two aldermen, and fifteen capital burgesses, including the bailiff and aldermen, assisted by a town-clerk, two chamberlains, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The bailiff, who is also clerk of the market and coroner, and has the return of all writs, and the aldermen, are chosen annually from among the capital burgesses, by the corporation at large, on the Monday next before the 29th of September, and sworn into office on the Monday following. The capital burgesses are chosen from among the burgesses, as vacancies occur, by a majority of their own body; and the recorder, town-clerk, and chamberlains are appointed by the corporation at large, by whom also the burgesses are chosen. The burgesses, whose number is now only seventeen, including the capital burgesses, are exempt from serving the offices of assessors or collectors of taxes due to the crown out of the limits of the borough, and from the payment of toll throughout the kingdom: those residing within the borough are also exempt from serving on juries for the county, and from liability to appear without the walls of Brecknock before any judge or justice appointed by the crown, excepting only the chief justice of the county. The borough first received the elective franchise in the 27th of Henry VIII., since which time it has continued to return one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly vested in the bailiff, aldermen, and resident burgesses. The act for amending the representation of the people, recently passed, has neither altered the limits of the borough nor the number of its representatives, but has extended the right of voting to every male person of full age, occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the law directs: the present number of persons thus qualified is about three hundred and forty, in addition to the former limited constituency: the bailiff is the returning officer. The right of conferring the freedom of the borough upon any of the inhabitants, on their taking an oath to obey the municipal officers in all things lawful, and to defend the liberties and franchises of the borough to the utmost of their power, is vested in the corporation; and the freedom is obtained only by this means. The borough is divided into twelve wards, of which eleven are in the town and immediate vicinity, and include the precinct of the priory of St. John the Evangelist; and the twelfth, called Trêcastle ward, forming that part of the parish of Llywel which lies to the north of the river Usk, is at the distance of eleven miles, in the hundred of Devynock. The bailiff, recorder, and aldermen are justices of the peace within the borough, and the county magistrates have no concurrent jurisdiction, unless in the event of a total failure of municipal justices. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, for deciding upon all offences not capital, at which the recorder presides; a court of record every Monday and Thursday, for the determination of pleas and the recovery of debts to any amount, at which the bailiff, recorder, and aldermen, or any two of them, preside, with the power of issuing process to hold to bail in actions for debt; and, within one month after Michaelmas, a court leet, as lords of the manor, with view of frankpledge, at which also they appoint two constables for each of the twelve wards. The assizes for the county, and the election of a knight for the shire, take place at Brecknock, as the county town. The borough and county hall was rebuilt in 1770, at the joint expense of the corporation and the county, aided by contributions from their representatives in parliament: it is a neat, spacious, and commodious building, in the High-street, having on the first floor a spacious room, in which the public business of the corporation is transacted, and the sessions and courts for the borough, and the assizes and quarter sessions for the county, are held: at the east end is a room for the accommodation of the grand jury, and for the preservation of the public records of the borough: the basement story is appropriated as a market-place, and beneath it are spacious vaults, in which leather and other articles of merchandise are stored: the attic story was used as a receptacle for arms and military stores prior to the erection of the armoury, in 1805. The gaol for the borough is small and inconvenient, being in no wise adapted to the classification of prisoners: it is therefore used only as a prison for debtors under process in the borough court, and as a place of temporary confinement for breaches of the peace, and of prisoners previously to their committal for trial to the county gaol. The common gaol for the county was anciently in the castle, a portion of which was appropriated to that purpose till the year 1690, when a new prison was built in that part of the borough called Watton, which was abandoned some years ago. The present common gaol and house of correction is situated on the east bank of the Tarrell, in the parish of St. David: it is a neat modern building, comprising five divisions for the classification of prisoners, five day-rooms, one work-room, and five airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-wheel, applicable either to the introduction of soft water for the supply of the prison, or to the working of a tucking-mill: the entire building, which is on the plan recommended by the philanthropic Howard, will accommodate twenty-four prisoners, in so many separate cells.

The living of St. John's is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of St. Mary's annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Richard Davies, the present archdeacon of Brecknock. The church, which was anciently the chapel of the priory founded here by Bernard Newmarch, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, chiefly in the early and decorated styles of English architecture, with a low massive central tower, and occupies a beautiful eminence on the western bank of the river Honddŷ, on the north side of the town, near the Priory woods, but has sustained so much unavoidable dilapidation, and undergone so many alterations, that little of its original character remains. It is partly embattled, and on the south side is nearly overgrown with ivy, forming, from its elevated situation and romantic appearance, an interesting object in the view from the adjoining grounds of Marquis Camden's seat: it was formerly surrounded by a strong lofty wall, part of which is still remaining on the western side. The nave, which is one hundred and thirty-six feet and a half in length, and twenty-eight and a half broad, is very lofty, and has been recently ceiled: on each side are portions anciently appropriated to the use of the guilds, separated by partitions of wood, on the front of which emblematical devices, illustrative of their several trades, were formerly partly carved and partly painted. The chancel, which is principally in the decorated style of English architecture, and is sixty-two feet long and twenty-nine and a half broad, is separated from the nave by a screen, formerly the rood-loft, and has a modern ceiling, divided into compartments: on each side are the remains of three light and beautifully clustered springers, which supported the ancient roof, broken off just above the corbels, and at the east end is a combination of five lancet-shaped windows, under a plain pointed arch, divided externally by four mullions and internally by four slender pilasters. Adjoining the chancel is a chapel of large dimensions, much admired for the beauty of its architecture: it was built soon after the incorporation of the town, by one of the family of Havard of Pontwilym, and for the last two or three centuries has obtained the appellation of the Vicar's chapel. Of the cross aisles, or transepts, the northern, called the chapel of the men of Battle, from its having been appropriated to the use of the inhabitants of the neighbouring village of Battle, before that became a distinct parish, is thirty feet and a half long, and twenty-nine broad; while the southern, called Capel y Côchiaid, "the chapel of the red-haired men" (meaning the Normans), is of the same breadth as the other, but extends to a length of thirty-eight feet three inches. The former was lighted at the end by a combination of three lancet-shaped windows, now filled up with boards, and the latter by a corresponding window: the aisles are lighted by a range of four windows in the later English style. Near the western end of the nave is a circular Norman font, the shaft of which is decorated with a series of intersecting arches; and round the edge is an inscription nearly obliterated. The living of St. David's, or Llanvaes, is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 7½., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Brecknock. The church, a small edifice of one aisle, with a tower at the west end, is situated in the suburb of Llanvaes, on the south side of the river Usk. The living of St. Mary's is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of St. John's, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. The chapel, which was anciently parochial, is situated in the centre of the town, and was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VIII.: it is a spacious and handsome edifice, in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, erected in 1515, about ninety feet in height, and containing a ring of eight bells: it comprises two aisles, a chancel, and, on the north-east, the chapel formerly appropriated to the guild of shoemakers, from which a door opens into the vestry-room, now rendered useless by the erection of houses close to its windows, by which it is so darkened that it has been found necessary to transfer the transaction of the parochial business of St. John's to the town-hall. At the western end is a large window of five lights, having cinque-foiled heads, under an ogee arch: the east window of the chancel is of the same kind, but plainer. The pointed arches which separate the nave from the aisle spring from short round piers, such as characterize the Norman style, from which it is inferred that this structure is of much older foundation than is indicated by the prevailing style of its architecture: indeed, a document is extant, recording a grant to this church at the end of the twelfth, or the commencement of the thirteenth century. A handsome brass chandelier was presented to it about the close of the seventeenth century, by Lady Elizabeth Lucy, relict of Dr. Lucy, Bishop of St. David's. In this chapel the consistorial court of the archdeaconry of Brecknock is held every month: its jurisdiction extends over the whole of the counties of Brecknock and Radnor, the parishes of Kerry and Moughtrey, in the county of Montgomery, eight parishes in the county of Hereford, and two in the county of Monmouth. Near Slwch, within the chapelry of St. Mary, formerly stood a chapel, dedicated to St. Elyned; near the eastern entrance into the town, one called St. Catherine's chapel; and adjoining the borough gaol, a third; but there is not at present a single vestige of any of them. There are three places of worship for Baptists, and one each for Welsh Independents, Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, and English Wesleyan and Welsh Wesleyan Methodists. That belonging to the Independents, called Plough Chapel, has two valuable endowments, one a farm in the parish of Merthyr-Cynog, called Ty'n rhŷd y maen, bequeathed by Richard Williams, of Glewly, in 1689, and now producing £20 per annum; and the other a messuage, tenement, and lands, called the Plough, in the town of Brecknock, producing from £25 to £30 per annum. A small tenement, called Bola Maen, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Nant-Brân, has also been left by some unknown benefactor for the support of a Roman Catholic priest in this town, where, however, there are now but very few professing this creed, and these have no chapel.

In the suburb of Llanvaes is situated the College of Christchurch, occupying the site of an ancient house of friars preachers, which existed here before the Reformation, and of which the church, dedicated to St. Nicholas (apparently, from the foundations still remaining, a spacious structure, nearly two hundred feet in length), was demolished in the reign of Charles I., by the parliamentary commissioners, who seized the revenue of the establishment. Its origin may be attributed to Dr. Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, who, in 1283, projected a similar establishment at Llangadock, in the county of Carmarthen, which was frustrated by his death. The original design was revived, in 1331, by Bishop Gower, his successor, who, adopting the same plan, made the church of Aberguilly collegiate for that purpose. The institution thus founded continued at Aberguilly till the year 1531, when, by the influence of Bishop Rawlins, it was transferred to Brecknock by Henry VIII., who assigned for its site the suppressed monastery of St. Nicholas, and granted the revenue of that establishment, in addition to its former possessions, for its better support, ordaining that it should be thenceforward called "the College of Christ in Brecknock." The charter of Henry VIII. assigns, as the causes of its removal, the inappropriateness of its former situation, and the ignorance of the English language that prevailed among the inhabitants of this part of South Wales, which prevented them from understanding, and consequently from obeying, the statutes of the realm. The charter also ordains that the Bishops of St. David's should be deans of the new foundation, and should appoint a schoolmaster, an usher, a divinity lecturer, and a preacher, to be paid out of the revenue of the college, for the gratuitous instruction of the children of the borough. The total amount of the reserved rents of the prebends is £387.2. per annum, out of which are paid annually £30.18.4. to the divinity lecturer, and £20.1.9. to a schoolmaster. The present establishment consists of the Bishop of St. David's, who presides as dean, a precentor, treasurer, chancellor, and nineteen prebendaries. From the college grammar school young men were formerly admitted into holy orders, without graduating at either of the Universities; but of this important privilege it has been deprived since the foundation of St. David's College, at Lampeter. After the Restoration, Dr. William Lucy, being appointed Bishop of St. David's and Dean of Christ's College, restored or rebuilt a portion of the church, as it now appears, consisting only of a choir and chancel, sixty-eight feet in length, and twenty-six in breadth, in which, ranged along each side of the entrance, are the stalls of the dean and prebendaries: the east window is large, comprising a combination of five lancet-shaped windows of elegant design, in a plain pointed arch, and enriched with delicate tracery; and on the north side of the building there is a range of ten lancet-shaped windows. Adjoining the north-west angle are the remains of the Aubrey chapel, an appendage of the ancient church of St. Nicholas; and at the east end is a beautiful stone cross, removed into that situation, in 1806, from the ruins of the Aubrey chapel. Bishop Bull was interred in the present church, which contains monumental memorials of several other bishops of St. David's, who have been buried within its walls. But the most ancient inscription remaining is that on a stone now forming the threshold of the door, in memory of the father of the famous Sir David Gam, who resided at Newton, in the parish of St. David, and was interred here, some time in the reign of Henry V., though the memorial is without date. There is a monument to the memory of Bishop Lucy; but the most costly is an altar-tomb bearing the recumbent effigies of this prelate's eldest son Richard, chancellor of the church, and of his wife, with that of their son, attired in the dress of the time of James II., on a stone tablet at their feet. There are also, within the college precincts, which are extra-parochial, a house, which has been the residence of several of the bishops, some other dwelling-houses, and also vestiges of the ancient conventual buildings, among which are part of the old gateway and the refectory.

The Boughrood charity school, held in the Struet, in the house of the master, who receives a salary of twenty guineas per annum, and enjoys a house and garden rent-free, for the instruction of fifty boys, was established under the will of the Rev. Rees Powell, formerly vicar of Boughrood, Radnorshire, dated 1686, by which he bequeathed the manors or lordships of Upper Elvel, Aberedw, and Garreg, and the castle, common, and forest of Colwyn, all in the county of Radnor, and now producing annually £262.4.4., to various charitable purposes therein named; among which, besides the support of the above-mentioned school, are, £20 per annum for placing out poor children, natives of the town and borough of Brecknock, or of the parishes of St. John the Evangelist, St. David, and Aberyscir, to some lawful trades in the town of Brecknock; £10 yearly towards forming a stock for subsequently establishing the said poor children in business; and £24 per annum to the Principal, or Vice-Principal, of Jesus' College, Oxford, for poor scholars or under-graduates there, natives of the counties of Radnor or Brecknock, with preference to the kindred of the donor: the income of this charity having greatly increased, the surplus is employed by the trustees, either in extending the charity to a greater number of children than is mentioned in the original deed, or in augmenting the sums therein specified. Two Lancasterian schools, for the education of children of both sexes, were established in 1810, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III.: they are kept in two rooms in the same building, erected for the purpose; and on the books are now about one hundred children of both sexes: the master and mistress receive a salary of £40 per annum each. In 1722, Nicholas Jeffreys gave £100, directing the interest to be applied to the use of the charity school of blue-coat boys; in 1724, Mrs. Catherine Games gave £300, to purchase lands, out of the rents of which, £2 yearly was to be paid to the charity school for girls, and the remainder to be yearly distributed in bread, at the discretion of the trustees; and, in 1794, Mrs. Mary Williams devised the interest of £100, to be annually applied towards the support of the charity school of Brecknock: these several bequests are now united, and their produce, jointly with annual subscriptions, and the bequest of Mrs. Collinson, below-mentioned, is applied to the support of the Benevolent or Lancasterian schools, forming a fund out of which the salaries of the master and mistress are paid. Here is likewise a Sunday school supported by subscription. An almshouse for twelve decayed female housekeepers was founded, in 1721, by Mrs. Catherine Games and Mrs. Walker, who bequeathed £620 to be laid out in the purchase of lands for its endowment, and placed it under the superintendence of the proprietor of the Pen Pont estate: the dwellings, to each of which a garden is attached, are situated in Llanvaes, form three sides of a quadrangle, and are comfortably fitted up: the endowment was expended in the purchase of an estate, called Hepsté, in the parish of Cantrêv; but in lieu of the rent of this property, only the interest of the original sum is paid to the poor inmates, at the rate of fifty shillings each per annum. This stipend has, however, lately been augmented by Mrs. Sybil Collinson, late of Brecknock, who by will left £25 per annum, of which £12 is to be equally distributed every year among the inmates of this hospital, the same sum to be appropriated to the Brecknock Benevolent or Lancasterian schools, and the remaining £1 to the county gaol. Numerous other bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor. In 1581, Mrs. William Thomas gave £100, to be lent to five weavers and five tuckers, without interest, for the term of three years, for ever: about the end of the sixteenth, or commencement of the seventeenth, century, Mr. Peter Body gave a messuage and garden of the yearly rent of £1, to be distributed among the poor, which bequest has now become merely a rent-charge; Mr. Lewis Meredith gave a messuage and garden of the same yearly rent, to be applied in the like manner; and Evan Williams Shenkin gave £2 per annum to the poor. In 1612, Sir David Williams, of Gwernyvet, in the parish of Glâsbury, bequeathed the tithes of Gwendwr, in this county, to certain charitable purposes, among which was the sum of forty shillings per annum to the poor of the parish of St. John the Evangelist in this town, which portion, owing to the increased value of the property, now produces £8. 8. 6.: and a bequest of ten shillings by the same benefactor, for an annual sermon to be preached here, has increased to £1. 12. 3. In the same year, Mr. Howel Thomas gave £1 per annum to the poor; in 1657, Mr. Thomas Davies gave funds for furnishing four suits of clothes to four poor tradesmen yearly at Christmas; and, about the same time, Mr. John Williams gave £6 per annum to three poor people of Brecknock, for ever; and Mr. Tobias Williams £1 yearly to the poor, and ten shillings for a sermon on Candlemas-day. In 1674, Edmund Jones, of Buckland, assigned a house, stable, yard, and outhouse, in the High-street, in trust for apprenticing poor boys, natives of the borough, within the same, which premises are now let at the yearly rent of £33. In 1675, Mr. Roger Boulcot gave a house and garden, of the yearly rent of seven shillings and sixpence, for the term of one thousand years, to the poor: in 1683, Mr. William Thomas gave £50, directing the interest to be annually distributed among the poor at Christmas; and in 1685, Mr. Richard Jones gave £40, to purchase lands, and Mr. William Philipps, Sen., gave £30, the produce of both to be paid to the poor annually at Christmas. In 1698, Mrs. Mary Powell gave an annuity of £6, charged on the estate of Dan y Park, in the parish of Llandeulley, one-half to place out three children apprentices, and the other half to six of the poorest housekeepers, with preference to widows. In 1710, Henry Jones gave ten shillings per annum towards clothing two poor persons every year for ever; in 1712, Mr. Thomas Philipps gave £50, and in 1721, William Philipps gave £20, the yearly interest of both to be distributed among the poor. Mrs. Elizabeth Jeffreys, in the latter year, left an annuity of £6, of which fifty shillings was to be given yearly to ten poor men, the like sum to the same number of women, ten shillings for a sermon, and the remaining ten shillings to be distributed at the discretion of the trustees. In 1726, Matthias Berrow devised a rent-charge of £2, issuing out of certain premises in Mount-street, towards apprenticing poor children; and, in 1826, Mr. John Jones, late of Cwm, in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, bequeathed to certain trustees the sum of £50, secured on the Brecknock water-works, directing the interest to be paid annually to five poor widows therein named, and afterwards to others residing in the upper division of that parish, not maintained in the workhouse. Of these bequests, the corporation annually distribute somewhat more than £50; and the recorder of the borough, and the overseers and churchwardens, distribute such others as are now available. In this town, in the month of September, or October, are usually held the meetings for conducting the affairs of the Clerical Charity for the relief of necessitous clergymen, or their widows and orphans, within the archdeaconry of Brecknock, under the control of a president, treasurer, secretary, and a committee of subscribers: on the day of the meeting the subscribers attend divine service, after which a collection is made, and the amount added to the permanent fund, the interest of which, with the amount of the annual subscriptions, is distributed in proportion to the necessities of the parties deriving relief from this benevolent institution: the permanent fund belonging to the society is £368. 19. 11., and the amount of annual subscriptions is usually about £150: the sum distributed for the year 1830 was £116. 13. 5. Voluntary contributions, generally amounting to about £50, are annually raised by the inhabitants of the town, for supplying the poor with soup, which charity has been productive of very great benefit. George Watkins, Esq., of Broadway, in the county of Carmarthen, has made a munificent offer of £1000 to the county of Brecknock, to be expended in the erection of a hospital or public infirmary; and voluntary contributions to a nearly equal amount have also been made for the same object, by other gentlemen of the county; but no application of these sums has yet been made, owing to considerable difference of opinion having arisen as to the propriety of founding a large institution of this nature, disproportionate both to the wants and resources of the county; nor is any likely to be made, unless the principal donor agree to a proposition now brought forward, of erecting only a centre building, to which wings may, if necessary and practicable, be added at a subsequent period, and of laying out the remainder to form a fund for its maintenance, or to form the whole into a public dispensary.

Of the ancient castle, in which the union of the houses of York and Lancaster is supposed to have been projected, by the Duke of Buckingham, and Morton, Bishop of Ely, then a prisoner in the custody of the duke, there are some small remains, consisting chiefly of the keep, in which that prelate was confined, and which, from that circumstance is called Ely Tower; but by far the greater part has fallen into ruin, and an inn, called the Castle Hotel, has been built upon a portion of the site. The outer walls appear, from their foundations, which are still discernible, to have enclosed a quadrilateral area, one hundred yards in length and eighty in breadth, and to have been defended by two watch-towers at each of the angles: on the northern side are traces of the ancient moat, and, further north, of a deep ravine, designed to convey the waters of the river Honddû in that direction, with a view to insulate the whole site of the castle. Their remains, though greatly dilapidated, present a very picturesque appearance, and occupy the brow of an abrupt eminence, on the north bank of the river Usk, just above the influx of the Honddû, which separated the castle from the fortified part of the town: besides the Ely Tower, situated in the beautiful grounds of a villa belonging to Sir Charles Morgan, in the occupation of Thomas Bold, Esq., the ruins consist chiefly of the mutilated shell of two of the watch-towers, now included in the garden of the Castle Hotel. The remains of the Benedictine priory of St. John the Evangelist, founded by Bernard Newmarch in the reign of Henry I., consist principally of the church of St. John, before mentioned, a portion of the outer walls and of the gateway, and some of the out-buildings, now converted into farm-offices: the revenue of this establishment, at the dissolution, amounted to £134. 11. 4. The site was granted to Sir John Price, a native of this county and an eminent lawyer, whom Henry VIII. appointed a member of his council in the court of the marches, and who was highly instrumental in effecting the union between England and Wales. The estate was subsequently purchased from one of his descendants by Sir John Jeffreys, whose granddaughter conveyed it by marriage to John Pratt, Esq., of the Wilderness, in the county of Kent, whose only son, dying without issue, bequeathed it to its present noble owner, Marquis Camden. The Priory house, which is the property and occasional residence of this nobleman, and in which Charles I., on his flight from the disastrous battle of Naseby, and George IV., on his return from Ireland in 1821, each spent one night, is a spacious and ancient structure. In the immediate vicinity is Frwdgrêch, the seat of Samuel Church, Esq., an elegant modern mansion, surrounded by extensive grounds, which are disposed with great taste: on the east a lofty eminence, crowned with thriving plantations, slopes down to the house, from which the ground rises on the south-west into the stupendous heights called the Beacons, the summits of which, while the sun is shining brightly on all the country around them, are frequently enveloped in thick mists, and showers often descend upon them and the intermediate vales, when others in the vicinity are perfectly dry: to the north are the luxuriant woods about Pennoyre, the seat of J. L. V. Watkins, Esq. Lower down upon the Usk, about a mile from the town, stands Dinas, the property and residence of John Lloyd, Esq., who erected it in 1826, in a style resembling that which prevailed in the reign of Elizabeth: it occupies a remarkably picturesque situation near the extremity of a lofty mountainous ridge, beautifully clothed with trees, the grounds commanding a fine view of the fertile and richly-cultivated Vale of Usk. In the vicinity are also several ancient mansions, now no longer inhabited by families of distinction: of these, Hoelvanog, more correctly Aelvanog, signifying "the lofty brow," and Newton, both in the parish of St. David, were in the possession of the Havards: this family were also owners of Pont Wilym, an ancient seat situated nearly on the opposite side of the town, and now occupied as a farm-house; and Court Sion Young, situated at a short distance on the road from Brecknock to Battle, of which there is now scarcely a vestige.

The hamlet of Venni Vâch, in the parish of St. John, which contains the site of the ancient Roman city and British capital of Brycheiniog, now called "the Gaer," occupies a situation of extreme beauty under the richly-wooded hill of Venni, not far from the banks of the Usk, and embraces delightful prospects of a smiling, fertile tract, bounded by a noble range of lofty mountains: it contains several small cottages of superior neatness, and a handsome farm-house. The ancient station was situated on an angle between the rivers Yscir and Usk: the defensive mounds are still visible, enclosing a quadrilateral area of about eight acres, extending in length, from east to west, six hundred and twenty-four feet, and in breadth, in a transverse direction, four hundred and fifty-six. The foundations of the walls encompassing it are still entire, and in some places, especially on the north and south sides, portions of the walls are remaining, from three to six feet high, and seven and a half in thickness, having the facing still perfect, consisting of square stones, a foot in diameter, and the intermediate space filled with rubble and cement, the whole being similar to those of Caerlleon and Caerwent, in Monmouthshire. A farm-house and offices have been built with the ruins of the ancient wall, the remains of which are now in many places overgrown and almost concealed with underwood. The entire area was, some years ago, covered with fragments of bricks; and both here and in the vicinity some coins and numerous other Roman antiquities have been discovered, including many fragments of figured stones, urns containing ashes, and other relics. At a place called Pen y Crûg, or "the summit of the hill," about a mile from "the Gaer," and the same distance north-west from Brecknock, is another British military work of the same class, and one of the most curious and best preserved remains of the kind in the principality: its form is oval, its longest diameter being six hundred feet, and its shortest four hundred and thirty: the area is surrounded by three ramparts, raised to the height of about eighteen feet. On a hill opposite, called Slwch, and sometimes Pen cevn y Gaer, or "the Camp Ridge," is another British camp, similar in form, but not of equal dimensions, encompassed by a double foss, in some places nearly destroyed. There are other vestiges of British intrenchments in the vicinity, but much inferior in extent to the above. Of the numerous Roman roads that converged to this point, the only vestige is a causeway leading from "the Gaer," in a line nearly at right angles with the course of the Yscir, which is conjectured to have been a branch of the Via Julia: it appears to have been originally about forty feet wide, raised above the surface of the ground adjacent, and constructed of large round pebbles of various sizes, which might have been collected from the beds of the neighbouring rivers. Though much dilapidated and overgrown with brushwood, it may still be easily traced; and upon it is a remarkable stone, first introduced to public attention by the eminent Welsh antiquary, Mr. Lhuyd, in his communications for Bishop Gibson's edition of Camden's Britannia, which is an undoubted relic of Roman antiquity. It is about six feet high, and has sculptured upon it, in bas relief, the figures of a man and woman, about three feet in height, popularly supposed to represent two females; and hence it is called Maen y Morwynion, or "the Maids' Stone." It bears a Latin inscription partially obliterated, of which various readings have been given by different antiquaries; but the only words now legible are CONJUNX EJUS H.S. EST; from which it is conjectured to have been erected in memory of some Roman citizen and his wife. In addition, it may be mentioned that the Via Julia Montana anciently crossed the site of the town of Brecknock, in the direction of the street called, from this circumstance, the Struet; and that, about two miles to the south-east of the present town, the remains of a Roman bath were discovered in 1783, in a field in the parish of Llanvrynach, in the account of which place they are described.

The celebrated Sir David Gam, who attended Henry V. to the battle of Agincourt, resided at Newton, in the parish of St. David. He displayed the greatest gallantry during that action, in which he is said to have saved the king's life, by the sacrifice of his own and those of his son-in-law and one of his kinsmen, and was knighted by that monarch on the field of battle, while expiring of the wounds he had received in the engagement. Dr. John David Rhys, author of Linguae Cymraeae Institutiones, or Institutes of the Welsh or Cymraeg Language, resided here during the latter period of his life, in a cottage called Clyn-hir, under the Brecknock Beacon, and near the small lake Llyn Cwm Llwch. Among the distinguished natives of this place were, Dr. Hugh Price, founder of Jesus' College, Oxford, who was the son of a tradesman of this town, took his degree of "Doctor of the Canon Law" at Oxford, in 1525, was subsequently prebendary of Rochester and treasurer of St. David's, and, dying in 1574, was buried in the church of St. John the Evangelist; the late unrivalled tragic actress, Mrs. Siddons, who was born here on July 14th, 1755, whilst her parents were on a professional tour; and Mr. Theophilus Jones, the industrious and sagacious author of the History of Brecknockshire, whose father was the Rev. Hugh Jones, successively vicar of Llangammarch and Llywel, in this county, and prebendary in the collegiate church of Brecknock. In the grammar school connected with that establishment Mr. Theophilus Jones received his education, on the completion of which he was articled to a solicitor, and for many years pursued that profession, having been appointed deputy-registrar of the archdeaconry of Brecknock. Having embraced the design of writing the history of his native county, he retired from business, and devoted himself with great ardour to the prosecution of his undertaking, for the accomplishment of which he visited every part of the county. The first volume of his work was published at Brecknock in 1805, and the second and last in 1809: he died in 1812, and was interred in the parish church of Llangammarch. Brecknock gives the inferior title of earl to Marquis Camden. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1540. 17., of which the proportion of St. David's parish is, £180.1. for the upper division, and £179. 17. for the lower, and that of St. John's is £492. 2., exclusively of the chapelry of St. Mary, the average annual expenditure for which is £688. 16.

BRECKNOCKSHIRE, an inland county of SOUTH WALES, bounded on the north by Radnorshire, on the west by the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, on the south by Glamorganshire and the western part of Monmouthshire, and on the east by the English counties of Monmouth and Hereford: it extends from 51° 45' to 52° 17' (N. Lat.), and from 3° 2' to 3° 50' (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of about eight hundred square miles, or five hundred and twelve thousand statute acres. The population, in 1831, was 48,325.

At the period of the conquest of Britain by the Romans, this county formed part of the territories of the Silures, a people who pre-eminently distinguished themselves, under their leader, the celebrated Caractacus, in the strenuous opposition which they manifested to the progress of the Roman forces under Ostorius Scapula: the scene of their struggles was the country of the Ordovices, now almost wholly included in North Wales; and the Romans, though at last victorious, do not appear to have penetrated into this quarter until after the defeat of Caractacus. Mr. Theophilus Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, considers that the Roman military works, of which there are still some vestiges, were for the most part formed during the lifetime of Ostorius: but it does not appear that the Silures were totally subdued until after the arrival of Julius Frontinus, about the year 70. The Romans had two principal stations within the limits of the county, one called the Caer or Caer Bannau, about three miles from Brecknock, and the other, also called the Gaer, situated near Llanvihangel Cwm dû, in the hundred of Crickhowel: the principal road was the Via Julia Montana, a branch of the Via Julia Maritima, which traversed the county from east to west, and other vicinal ways in connexion with the stations. Nothing relating peculiarly to this county is recorded until after the withdrawal of the Roman forces from Britain, when the country became divided into petty states, each governed by its own prince, or regulus: of these, with some little variation from the limits of the modern county, this territory formed one, under the name of Brycheiniog, derived from one of its first independent princes, called Brychan, and since altered by the Welsh into Brecheiniawg and Brecheinog, and by the English into Brecknock and Brecon. Brychan is chiefly distinguished in the Welsh annals for the number, learning, and piety of his children, many of whom became the tutelar saints of the parochial churches, and thus imparted their names to the respective parishes. The entire family of this sovereign was designated in the British triads as one of the three holy families in Britain. After his death, his dominions were divided, according to the custom of inheritance among the Britons, resembling the gavelkind of the Saxons, between his two sons, Cledwyn and Rhain, who, unlike all the rest, had not entered into holy orders; but Caradog Vreichvras, or Caradoc with the Brawny Arm, grandson of Brychan, who lived near the close of the fifth, or in the early part of the sixth, century, re-united the whole principality under his government, and is distinguished in Welsh history as one of the knights who fought under the British hero, Arthur: this chieftain appears also to have extended his dominion over the territory called Ferregs, lying between the rivers Severn and Wye, and including the present county of Radnor. Caradog was succeeded by his son Cawrdav, called in the Welsh triads one of the three prime ministers of Britain; but little is known of his descendants and successors until the reign of Teithwalch, about the beginning of the eighth century, which is memorable for the first invasion of South Wales by the Saxons, under the command of Ethelbald, King of Mercia, between whom and the Britons a sanguinary battle was fought at Carno, in the parish of Llangattock: this event is placed by the Welsh chronicle, Brût y Tywysogion, in the year 728. Teithwalch was succeeded by his son Tegyd, whose territories, however, were considerably diminished by the conquest of the principal and most fruitful parts of Ferregs by Offa, the Anglo-Saxon monarch, who separated them from the rest of the British territories by constructing that huge work called Offa's Dyke, extending northward from the river Wye, in Herefordshire, across the marches. The next prince of Brycheiniog, of whom history relates any thing worthy of notice, was called Hwgan, a name Latinized into Huganus, who, determining to embrace the opportunity afforded him by the troops of Edward the Elder being fully engaged in repelling a formidable invasion of the Danes, mustered all his forces, and led them against the Saxon frontier; but being unexpectedly opposed by a powerful army, under the command of Edward's sister, the heroic Ethelfleda, he was overthrown in a sanguinary engagement; and Ethelfleda, taking advantage of her success, advanced with the utmost expedition into the heart of Hwgan's dominions, stormed his castle, and carried off his wife and her attendants: the situation of this castle, called by the Anglo-Saxon historians Brecenanmere, is not now precisely known, but has been conjectured to be at Blaenllynvi, near Savaddan lake. The British prince fled to the camp of the Danes at Derby, where he fell in attempting to defend the town against the assaults of the Saxon forces. Hwgan was succeeded by his son Dryfin, whose territories were successfully invaded by Athelstan, the Saxon sovereign; and he was not only compelled to pay tribute, but even deprived of what remained to him of the country of Ferregs. About the year 982, Brycheiniog was invaded by Alfred Earl of Mercia, who laid waste nearly the whole country, but was at last routed with the aid of the other Welsh princes. In the reign of Dryfin also, about the year 944, a survey was made of the territory of Brycheiniog, in common with the rest of Wales, by order of Hywel Dda, who had established supreme authority over all Wales, and who, in the division of this sovereignty among his three sons, included this district in the kingdom of Dinevawr, or South Wales. The hundred of Buellt, or Builth, however, seems not to have formed part of the territory of Brecknock at this time, but to have been included in the kingdom of Powys. Bleddyn ab Maenarch, the grandson of Dryfin, who married the sister of Rhys ab Tewdwr, the reigning sovereign of South Wales, was the last British prince of Brycheiniog.

Rhys ab Tewdwr, according to the conjecture of Mr. Jones (which, however, so far as concerns that chieftain, is at variance with that held by most other writers, who are of opinion that Rhys was slain at the battle of Hîrwaun), having been defeated in the northern part of Glamorganshire, chiefly by the prowess of the Norman mercenaries under Robert Fitz-Hamon, fled with the small remains of his adherents to the territory of his brother-in-law Bleddyn; while the success of the Normans in seizing the county of Glamorgan for themselves encouraged others of their countrymen, under the sanction of their sovereign, to whom they were to pay homage for the territories thus acquired, to undertake similar conquests. One of these was Bernard Newmarch, who, about the year 1088, with a large body of followers, entered the territories of Bleddyn, whom, with his brother-in-law, he defeated in a great battle fought near Caer Bannau, on the banks of the Usk, the issue of which was gloriously favourable to the Normans, Bleddyn having been slain gallantly defending himself in his own residence, and Rhys ab Tewdwr, according to the authority above-mentioned, in the retreat. Bernard, having thus obtained entire possession of the ancient principality of Brycheiniog, erected it into a lordship marcher, apportioning the greater part among his followers, but reserving to himself the largest allotment, with the feudal superiority over the whole: he also granted the sons of Bleddyn several portions of land for their support, and treated Gwrgan, the eldest of them, with much respect; and, with the view of acquiring some degree of popularity, the politic baron espoused a member of a Welsh royal family, named Nêst, granddaughter of Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales. He destroyed Caer Bannau, the ancient capital of his newly-acquired province, and with the materials erected the castle of Brecknock, which he constituted his residence, and which thenceforward continued to be the seat of government for the lordship. Among the last acts of his life was a praiseworthy endeavour to atone for the deeds of violence, atrocity, and plunder, which he had perpetrated, by ample donations to religious houses: the year of his death is not recorded, but that event is supposed to have happened in the reign of Henry I., and his remains were interred in the cloisters of Gloucester cathedral. Mahel, the eldest of the sons born to him by his wife, was disinherited, in consequence of the latter declaring him, in the presence of Henry I., to be the offspring of adultery; and Sybil, his eldest daughter, whom her mother acknowledged to be legitimate, succeeded to the lordship of Brecknock, which she conveyed by marriage to Milo Fitz-Walter, constable of Gloucester, who, for his eminent services in support of the cause of the Empress Matilda, was afterwards created Earl of Hereford. He was succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son Roger, who to his patrimonial inheritance of this lordship added the lands of Ewyas in Herefordshire, by marriage with the daughter and heiress of Payne Fitz-John, lord of that territory. This nobleman died without issue in 1156, and his possessions were inherited by his brothers William, Henry, and Mahel, successively: on the death of the last-named the lordship of Brecknock and some other possessions devolved, by right of his second sister, to her husband, Philip de Breos, or Braiosa, lord of Builth, whose family had accompanied the Norman Conqueror to England, and who died soon after the accession of Henry II., leaving all his possessions to his son William. The latter has acquired an inglorious distinction in history for his atrocious cruelty, first in treacherously murdering some Welsh chieftains, whom he had invited to an entertainment at his castle of Abergavenny in Monmouthshire; and secondly, for a similar outrage on the person of Trahaern Vychan, a descendant of Gwrgan ab Bleddyn, and a man of great influence in the territory of Brecknock, who, coming to hold a friendly conference with William, agreeably to summons, was seized by order of the latter, fastened to a horse's tail, and in this ignominious manner dragged through the streets of Brecknock, after which he was beheaded, and his body hung up by the feet. The former act of cruelty was avenged by the men of Gwent on the castle of Abergavenny; and the punishment for the latter was undertaken by Gwenwynwyn, Prince of Powys, who invaded de Breos' territories; but the blow fell upon a district included in the present county of Radnor. The latter part of this baron's life was passed in continual contention with King John, and on his death, in 1212, his estates escheated to the king, by whom a great part of the Brecknockshire lands was granted to Peter Fitz-Herbert, grandson of Milo Fitz-Walter; but the family of de Breos recovered the whole of its Welsh possessions through the exertions of Giles Bishop of Hereford, its chief representative, on whose death they devolved to his brother, Reginald de Breos, who married Gwladis, daughter of Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, and leagued with his father-in-law against the English monarch. King John chastised the defection of his vassal by marching an army into his territories, and burning his castles of Radnor and Hay; and Henry III., on his accession to the throne, succeeded in dissolving the confederacy, by engaging to restore to de Breos the English possessions of his family, on the condition of his returning to his allegiance. Rhÿs son of Rhÿs Vychan, a chieftain of South Wales, in company with his brother, immediately attacked Reginald's possessions in Builth, where they were soon joined by Llewelyn, who, highly incensed at his kinsman's defection, led a powerful force towards the town of Brecknock, which he threatened with destruction, but spared at the supplication of the inhabitants. De Breos, however, fearing the effects of his resentment, became again reconciled to him, an act which once more involved him with the king, who deprived him of the lordships of Blaenllynny and Talgarth, which were a second time given to Peter Fitz-Herbert. Reginald died in 1228, leaving his honours and the remaining Welsh estates to his eldest son, William de Breos, who was one of the foremost to aid the English monarch in a formidable expedition into North Wales, in the course of which he was taken prisoner by the Welsh, and, according to the Welsh Chronicle, Brût y Tywysogion, purchased his release by the surrender of the castle and territory of Builth, in addition to the payment of a large sum of money. It appears, nevertheless, that he was put to an ignominious death by Llewelyn, who subsequently laid waste his territories with fire and sword, passing by Brecknock and Caerleon into Glamorganshire, and soon after his return made an attack on the castle of Brecknock, which proving unsuccessful, he fired the town, and then withdrew into North Wales.

On the death of William de Breos the lordship passed, by marriage with his second daughter Eleanor, to Humphrey de Bohun, sixth Earl of Hereford of that name, whose castles of Hay and Brecknock were taken by Prince Edward, son of Henry III., in 1265: about this period, too, the territory of Builth appears to have been in the hands of the Welsh, as, in the early part of the reign of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, it was taken by that leader from Rhÿs Vychan, and given to his brother, Meredydd ab Rhÿs. On the death of Humphrey de Bohun, the lordship descended to his son Humphrey, who now became Earl of Hereford and Essex, and was involved in a quarrel with the Earl of Gloucester, concerning the exact limits of their domains (those of the latter nobleman in Glamorgan adjoining the lordship of Brecknock), the settlement of which King Edward I. took upon himself, commanding both parties to postpone further hostilities until he should investigate the affair and give his decision. But the tenants and vassals of the Earl of Gloucester entered on the lands of the Earl of Hereford, and were carrying off some cattle and other plunder, when the vassals of the latter assailed them and recovered the stolen property. The king, on being informed of these outrages, issued special commissions to examine into the conduct of the contending parties, the result of which was a decree, ordaining that the liberties of Glamorgan and Brecknock should be forfeited to the crown, during the lives of their actual possessors, who were commanded by the king himself to be imprisoned during his pleasure; but these sentences were soon commuted for the payment, by the Earl of Gloucester, of ten thousand marks, and by the Earl of Hereford of one thousand. Although the latter nobleman appears in English history as one of the most powerful and spirited barons of his time, yet none of the other remarkable events of his life have any particular relation to his lordship of Brecknock: the northern part of the county was, however, in his time the scene of one of the most tragical events related in Welsh history. Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last native Welsh chieftain who wore the ensigns of royalty, having been engaged in ravaging the territories of the King of England's friends in Cardiganshire, directed his course towards Builth, in the vicinity of which town he had engaged to meet some of his allies of the neighbouring country, to concert measures for their future proceedings. Having arrived on the banks of the Edwy, there is every reason to suppose that he was betrayed by the very persons with whom he came to consult; for, after departing from his forces, they were attacked by John Giffard and Sir Edmund Mortimer, at the head of a body of troops from Herefordshire. On this unexpected onset, Llewelyn fled to Builth, whence, failing in his attempt to procure aid from the garrison, he advanced westward up the Irvon, on the south side, for about three miles, where he crossed that river by a bridge called Pont y Coed, and stationed the few troops that accompanied him on an eminence on the north side of the river, to defend the pass. The English, foiled in their attempt on the bridge, crossed the stream by a ford at a short distance, and, coming behind the Welsh, attacked them unawares. By the latter they were received with a shower of arrows and other missiles, which was returned by a body of archers placed among the English horse: on the English gaining the summit the armies closed, and the action was maintained on both sides for more than three hours, with great valour and obstinacy, until at length the Welsh were entirely defeated and put to flight, leaving two thousand men, a third of their number, dead upon the field. The prince himself was closely pursued by Adam de Franc-ton, an English knight, who, seeing him to be a Welshman, and not knowing his quality, plunged his spear into his body, and then rejoined the ranks of his comrades. The heat of the battle being over, Adam de Franc-ton returned to strip the person whom he had wounded, and, recognising him as the Welsh prince, cut off his head, after he had breathed his last, and presented it to the king, who was then residing in the abbey of Aberconway. The day of Llewelyn's death is stated to have been the 10th of December, 1282, at which time the ground was covered with snow; and the spot is still called Cevn y Bedd, or Cevn Bedd Llewelyn, "the Ridge of Llewelyn's Grave." A traditionary account of this event is preserved by the inhabitants of Builth, and its neighbourhood, which differs in some particulars from that given by the historians. The former, owing to their alleged base conduct on this occasion, in not affording that shelter to the Welsh prince which they were able to do, have ever since borne the reproachful appellation of Bradwyr Buellt, or the "traitors of Builth." Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, was succeeded by his son of the same name, who distinguished himself in opposition to the government of that weak monarch Edward II., and joined in the rebellion of several of the lords marcher, to oppose the claims of the younger Spencer to the lordship of Gower, in Glamorganshire: he was killed in the battle of Boroughbridge, in 1321, and his Welsh property, being confiscated, was given by the king to the younger Spencer, on whose execution, however, it again reverted to the family of de Bohun, in the person of John de Bohun, after whose death it was successively inherited by his brother and his nephew, both named Humphrey de Bohun, the latter the son of John's brother William. Humphrey de Bohun left issue two daughters, the youngest of whom, Mary, espoused Henry Earl of Derby, afterwards King Henry IV., upon whom was settled the reversion of the lordship of Brecknock after the decease of the Countess Dowager of Hereford, which by this means became vested in the crown.

This county, amongst others, suffered from the devastations made in South Wales, during the reign of Henry IV., by that renowned Welsh chieftain, Owain Glyndwr, to whom is ascribed the final destruction of the castle of Hay. Shortly after the death of the Countess Dowager of Hereford, Anne, daughter of Eleanor de Bohun, the eldest daughter of the last Humphrey de Bohun, who was married first to Thomas of Woodstock, sixth son of Edward III., and afterwards to Edmund Earl of Stafford, but was at this time a widow, petitioned the king for that portion of her grandmother's possessions which rightfully belonged to her, and amongst those relinquished to her and her son was the lordship of Brecknock. She died in 1439, and her inheritance passed to her son, Henry Earl of Buckingham, afterwards, in the 23rd of Henry VI., created Duke of Buckingham, who is chiefly distinguished in the Welsh annals for his tyrannical treatment of the tenants of this lordship. This nobleman was slain fighting on the side of the Lancastrians, at the battle of Northampton, in 1460; and his only son Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, having previously fallen at the battle of St. Alban's, he was succeeded in the dukedom of Buckingham, and all his other honours and estates, by his grandson Henry, who being at that time in his minority, Sir William Herbert, afterwards created Earl of Pembroke, was appointed steward of the lordship of Brecknock, and entrusted with the management of the duke's other possessions in Wales. After he had attained his majority, this duke became, on the death of Edward IV., one of the most staunch partisans of Richard III.; but that usurper, having gained the object of his ambition, refused to fulfil his engagements with him, in consequence of which the duke retired from court, determined on revenge. Arriving at his castle of Brecknock, he released from confinement Morton, Bishop of Ely, whom Richard, on account of his known attachment to the cause of the murdered princes, the sons of the late King Edward, had committed a close prisoner to his charge. Morton immediately departed for the continent, to inform the Earl of Richmond of Buckingham's designs in his favour, and for the dethronement of the usurper, and at the same time to concert measures for the execution of their enterprise, while Buckingham proceeded with the necessary preparations at home. The latter speedily raised a large body of troops from his lordship and other domains in this quarter, and commenced his march towards Shrewsbury, to join the partisans of the same cause assembled there. The unfortunate issue of this expedition is well known: the Severn, being swollen by a prodigious flood, delayed his advance, and his troops, probably ill-provided, soon began to desert in such numbers, as to oblige him to seek safety in flight and concealment; but being betrayed into the power of the sanguinary Richard, he was immediately beheaded at Salisbury, without even the form of trial, and his titles and estates were forfeited to the crown. Richmond, with a small body of French troops, landing soon after at Milford Haven, and being joined by Rhŷs ab Thomas, the most opulent and influential subject in South Wales, the latter, according to preconcerted measures, had the beacons lighted, to give notice to his friends of the arrival of the earl, and pursued his line of march through Carmarthenshire and Brecknockshire, his standard being joined by great numbers in every part of his progress. On reaching Brecknock, Rhŷs found it necessary to make some selection from among the multitude that had collected around him: he first of all formed a chosen body of two thousand horse, to be commanded by himself; and next, a corps of five hundred infantry, which he placed under the command of his younger brothers David and John, for the protection of his own estates, and the security of the persons and property of those who had declared in favour of the earl: the rest he dismissed with acknowledgments for their readiness to serve under him, and then proceeded with his two thousand chosen men towards Shrewsbury, to rejoin the earl, who had taken a different route. On the accession of the latter to the throne of England, by the title of Henry VII., he restored all the possessions and honours of the late Duke of Buckingham, including the lordship of Brecknock, to the family of that nobleman, in the person of his son Edward, who was afterwards created constable of England, and was the last who held that high office. On the execution of this nobleman for treason, in the reign of Henry VIII., the dukedom of Buckingham became extinct, and the lordship of Brecknock, with all the territories and revenues appertaining to it, again escheated to the crown, in whose possession it thenceforward remained for a considerable period.

This county is one of those formed, by the act of the 27th of Henry VIII., out of the marches, or intermediate border lands between England and Wales; at which time also it was enacted that, in the whole of Wales, law and justice should be administered in the same form as in England; while the lords marcher, who had before exercised an almost regal authority within their respective domains, were reduced nearly to the condition of ordinary manorial lords. At the commencement of the civil war of the seventeenth century, a troop of horse was raised by Mr. Jenkin Jones, of this county, at his own expense, in support of the parliamentary cause. In 1617, the lordship of Brecknock was assigned on lease by James I. to Sir Francis Bacon, Sir John Dacombe, and others, in trust, for the use of Prince Charles, afterwards King Charles I., who, in the seventh year of his reign, conveyed the fee to trustees for the use of Sir William Russell, reserving to the crown only a fee-farm rent of forty-four pounds and one halfpenny per annum. Sir William Russell sold his interest to the Earl of Pembroke, and that nobleman disposed of it to William Morgan, Esq., of Dderw in Brecknockshire, on whose death it was inherited by his daughter Blanch, who conveyed it by marriage to William Morgan, Esq., of Tredegar, in Monmouthshire, in whose family it has ever since remained, being at present in the possession of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. The lordship, or manor, of Brecknock is that part of the county which, since the erection of the castle of Brecknock, has been continually appendant to that fortress, and comprises nearly the whole of the hundred of Merthyr, or Merthyr-Cynog, that part of the parish of Llywel which is situated to the north of the river Usk, and the parishes of Llanspythid, St. David, and Cantrêv, to the river Cynrig. The lordship of the Great Forest, in the south-western part of the county, is also held on lease from the crown by Sir Charles Morgan, together with the lordship of Brecknock, but under somewhat different circumstances. The lordship of the Great Forest, or at least a great part of it, having been acquired by the successors of Bernard Newmarch in the lordship of Brecknock, subsequently to the total subjugation of Wales by Edward I., never formed part of the lordship marcher, but was held by the lords of Brecknock, like all other territories in Wales, except the marches, as a fief under the crown of England. While these possessions continued in the same hands, they were properly called conjointly the great lordship of Brecknock; but after the attainder of the last Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, when they were dissevered, the application of this term to either became erroneous. The lordship of the Forest comprises a much more extensive tract than the lordship of Brecknock, and should rather be called the manor of the Great Forest, or of the Great Forest of Devynock, within the county of Brecknock. In the 10th of George I., this manor was demised by the Prince of Wales to William Morgan, of Tredegar, Esq., to hold for twenty-one years, at the yearly rent of £20. 6. 8.: this lease has since been constantly renewed, and under a late grant from the crown is held by Sir Charles Morgan, Bart.

This county is in the diocese of St. David's, and province of Canterbury, and is comprised in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, forming the four deaneries of Builth, and the first, second, and third parts of that of Brecknock, and part of that of Hay: the number of parishes is sixty-six, of which twenty-four are rectories, eighteen vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the six hundreds of Builth, Crickhowel, Devynock, Merthyr-Cynog, Pencelly, and Talgarth. It contains the borough and market town of Brecknock, or Brecon; and the market towns of Builth, Crickhowel, and Hay. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for the borough of Brecknock. The county is in the South Wales circuit: the assizes and quarter sessions are held at Brecknock, where stands the county gaol and house of correction. There are forty-three acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £20,928, and the expenditure to £20,651, of which £17,450 was applied to the relief of the poor.

Nearly the whole county is occupied by several ranges of mountains, with their diverging hills, intersected in various directions by fertile and romantic valleys; and its outskirts on every side consist for the most part of lofty and barren mountains, excepting only where it is separated from Radnorshire on the north-east by the river Wye. In the lower parts of the county the less elevated hills are cultivated to a considerable distance up their sides, and some of them even to their summits; but the higher mountains, more especially those in the northern part of it, are in general uncultivated, and of little value, except as sheep-walks. The principal mountain chain is that called, through a considerable part of its extent, the Black Mountains, which commences on the western border of the county, in the two conspicuous summits called Bannau Sir Gaer, or the Carmarthenshire Beacons, and thence stretches eastward across the entire breadth of Brecknockshire, terminating in Monmouthshire on the southern side of the Usk, below the town of Crickhowel, which is situated near the south-eastern confines of this county. The westernmost of these two heights, which, viewed from the surrounding country, are remarkably picturesque objects, is in Carmarthenshire, and is separated by a deep and narrow chasm from the other, which is in Brecknockshire, and of rather superior elevation: the latter is sometimes called Trêcastle Beacon, from the neighbouring village of Trêcastle, and rises to the height of two thousand five hundred and ninety-six feet above the level of the sea. But the most elevated summits of the chain, and the highest points of South Wales, are two contiguous peaks situated about five miles to the south west of the town of Brecknock, which rise two thousand eight hundred and sixty-two feet above the sea, and, towering above the lofty hills which compose their base, form a striking and even sublime object from very distant parts of South Britain, and command a prospect of vast extent and variety. These heights are sometimes designated, in the singular number, the Van, or Beacon; but more commonly, and with greater propriety, are called Bannau Brecheiniog, or the Brecknockshire Beacons: they are also known to the Welsh by the name of Cader Arthur, or Arthur's Chair. On the summit is a small stagnant pool, which wholly evaporates in seasons of drought; and at some distance below, under their northern declivity, lies a small lake, about a mile in circumference, called Llyn Cwm Llŵch, which is the source of the small river Tarrell, and contains great numbers of the lacerta aquatica, or water-lizard: by the peasantry of the surrounding country this pool is believed to be of unfathomable depth. That peak of the Carmarthenshire beacons which is situated within the bounds of Brecknockshire has a similar lake, called Llyn y Van, which is the source of the Usk, and is of much larger extent, being upwards of a mile in length: its waters have a dark and gloomy aspect, and contain no fish. From the upper end of the Vale of Tawe the chain of heights, including Bettws mountain, extends south-westward into Glamorganshire; and the higher parts of all these mountains, being too elevated, steep, and rocky for cultivation, form a vast extent of wastes, which is also continued, with the same characteristic features, but gradually diminishing in altitude and extent, from the border of this county, through that of Carmarthen, towards the mouth of the Towy. Southward from the Black Mountains, beyond a narrow range of limestone mountains, of which the lofty Cribarth, a mile or two above the head of the Swansea canal, is the most distinguished summit, the rest of the county is formed of the high, steep, and barren hills of the great coal and iron tract of South Wales: the limestone hills above mentioned, in the eastern part of the county, form a lofty parapet on the southern side of the Vale of Usk, extending as far westward as the Llangynider rocks. At Talgarth, approaching the eastern confines of the county, rises another mountain chain, called in Brecknockshire the Black Mountains, and in Welsh Mynydd y Gader, or "the chair mountain;" but extending eastward into Herefordshire, it is there commonly designated as the Hatterell hills: the loftiest summit, second in altitude only to the Brecknockshire Beacons, is called Y Gader Vawr, or "the great chair." The third and last mountain range, requiring particular notice, is that called the Eppynt hills, which extends with a tolerably uniform outline, and in a direction from west to east, from the north-eastern confines of the county of Carmarthen, where they are connected with the great chain separating the vales of the Towy and the Teivy, to Lyswen, on the banks of the Wye, and separates nearly the whole of the hundred of Builth from the rest of the county: the mountain called Drugarn, near the confines of Cardiganshire, to the north-west, rises to the height of two thousand and seventy-one feet above the level of the sea. The Eppynt hills are connected with the Plinlimmon mountains, on the south-western border of Montgomeryshire, by a transverse cluster of mountains extending several miles in every direction, and constituting the most dreary wastes of the counties of Brecknock, Radnor, and Cardigan: they form no regular chain, those above mentioned, and, like the other mountain wastes, can be turned to little profit, except as summer pastures for almost innumerable flocks of small hardy sheep. Various chains of hills of lower elevation diverge in different directions from the several principal ranges, but none of them are remarkable for their extent. The principal lake, and one of the largest in South Wales, is Llyn Savaddan, a few miles eastward from the town of Brecknock: this, sometimes also called Llangorse mere and Brecknock mere, is about three miles long and one broad: its general depth is from three to four yards, though in some places from twelve to fifteen yards; and its principal fish are, pike, sometimes weighing upwards of thirty lb.; perch, from a few ounces to three lb. weight; and eels of such an extraordinary size, as to have given rise to the adage, Cyhyd a llysywen Savaddan, "as long as a Savaddan eel:" this otherwise fine sheet of water is, however, bordered on the south side by low marshy grounds, overgrown with rushes and other aquatic plants of no value.

The vales, owing to their inland situation, are subject to a greater degree of cold and frost in winter, and of heat in summer, than those of most parts of the principality. Opening inland also, and the south-western vapours from the ocean being frequently arrested and dissipated by the western mountains, their climate is consequently drier, the grain which is cultivated on them fills better in the ear, and the arable lands are not so apt to be overrun with natural grasses. But on the mountains the climate is cold, wet, and tempestuous, and the loftier elevations are often capped with snow until late in the spring. The climate of the slate hills of the hundred of Builth combines, with its unfertile soil, to render them the most desolate parts of the county. The wheat harvest in the vales generally commences in the first week of August; sometimes in the last week of July.

No county in the principality contains a greater variety of soils than Brecknockshire. The northern part of it, lying beyond a line drawn from the banks of the Wye, below the influx of the Radnorshire river Edow, obliquely across the Eppynt hills to Cwm y Dwr, on the road between Trêcastle and Llandovery, on the border of Carmarthenshire, is included in the great slate, or rather shale, tract of South Wales: here peat generally occupies the hollows, and sometimes the slopes, of the hills, under which, however, clay generally abounds near the surface, rendering the ground wet, and unproductive of any but the poorest herbage. The banks of the Wye and the Irvon, nevertheless, are composed of land of a much richer quality, where a sound loam abounds to the depth of from one to six feet. The soils of the coal tract, which includes a narrow district along the whole southern side of Brecknockshire, are for the most part of the same poor quality as those of the uplands of the slate district, having in like manner clays near the surface, which do not absorb the water, and consequently render them very wet: their natural grasses are also the same. The clayey soils of the latter district are capable of much greater amelioration in the progress of agriculture, owing to their being impregnated with a fine silex, which renders them friable under the action of the atmosphere, and to their proximity to lime. The middle part of the county is wholly occupied by soils which derive an uniformly red colour from a substratum of red sand-stone, and communicate it to the water precipitated upon them by every heavy shower. The red lands are bounded on the north by the slate tract and the river Wye, on the south by a line extending from east to west in the latitude of Glyn Collwyn to the south of the town of Brecknock, and on the east and west only by the confines of the county: their breadth, from north to south, from Llangynog chapel, near Builth, to Glyn Collwyn, is about nineteen miles. The Usk and most of its tributaries have their sources in this red tract; and their deposits, being originally derived from the red sand-stone, have rendered the soil of the Vale of Usk, although fertile, of a very light sandy texture: however, by good husbandry, the crops of grain are abundant, but those of hay, in dry summers, are extremely small on its meadow lands. The lightness of the soil of this vale, in the year 1810, subjected its wheat crops to alarming depredations from the pupæ of the cockchafer, more particularly in that part of it which extends from Brecknock to the south-eastern border of the county; and these insects still appear occasionally, in detached spaces, in soils favourable to their settlement. The soils of the side-land declivities are generally of a stronger staple, and, having more argil in their composition than that of the vale, produce, under good tillage, greater crops of grain. As the Wye and its principal tributaries in the higher part of its course flow for many miles through the shale tract, their waters, in time of flood, bear with them argillaceous particles, which improve the staple of the red sandy soils through which they pass for so many miles before quitting the principality: hence the superior tenacity and productiveness of the lands of the vale traversed by that river below the town of Builth. The level part of the hundred of Talgarth, from Savaddan lake to Aberllynny, has been said to derive the superior quality of its soil for the culture of wheat from a tenacious sediment peculiar to the tract, and the deposition of which it is difficult to account for in the ordinary course of nature. The more elevated parts of this red tract, which comprise the Beacons of Brecknockshire and Carmarthenshire, are far superior in soil and produce to those of the slate district, and sheep brought to them from the latter, having their wool kempy, or intermingled with long coarse hairs, soon lose their kemps; and vice versa. The soil of the narrow limestone district, extending quite across the county between the red soil and coal tracts, is for the most part rendered very arid by its elevation, especially on the northern side, its want of depth, and the absorbent quality of the substratum. Consequently, white clover, a plant natural to limestone soils, is never found in the more elevated regions; but lower down, in the vicinities of Vainor and Penderyn, the soil is so favourable to the growth of this sweet grass, that, after being ploughed for a crop of grain, in the following year it spontaneously produces an abundant crop of hay almost wholly composed of it.

Mr. Clark, in his agricultural report of Brecknockshire, published by the Board of Agriculture in 1794, estimates that nearly two-thirds of it were then enclosed; and in these enclosures the "good land" formed one-fourth of the county, the "middling land" rather more than one-fifth, and "poor mountainous land" another fifth. Since the date of that publication, however, this proportion has somewhat increased, nearly all the commons on the low lands having been successively enclosed. The systems of agriculture are of course very various on such a variety of soils and in such different situations, and, though frequently exhibiting considerable skill, are in many instances very defective. All the ordinary kinds of grain are cultivated, as also are peas, vetches, turnips, and potatoes. The produce of wheat on the poorer soils of the slate tract is extremely small, being even somewhat more on the poorest cultivated soils of the red lands: though the crops on the uplands of Llywel and the Eppynt hills are frequently not more than from seven to ten bushels per acre: the smaller valleys of this district, namely those of the rivers Honddû, Esgair, Brân, &c., generally produce from fifteen to eighteen bushels per acre; the Vale of Usk from seventeen to twenty-one bushels; and the flat part of the hundred of Talgarth, forming an opening through the hills between the Vales of Usk and Wye, and the richer parts of the romantic valley of the Wye itself, from above Llanggoed castle to the town of Hay, from eighteen to twenty-three bushels per acre, though sometimes thirty. On the uplands the produce of barley varies from nine to twenty bushels per acre; on the strongest soils it averages from fifteen to twenty-three bushels, in the Vale of Wye from twenty to thirty, and in the Vale of Usk something more than twenty. The cultivation of oats is extensive only on the highest cultivated lands, where other grain would seldom ripen: the produce varies from fifteen to twenty bushels per acre. Rye is but little grown. The reaping-hook and sickle are the instruments in common use for cutting corn: the cradled scythe is occasionally employed. Although the amount of arable lands is greater than in most Welsh counties, yet the exports of grain are very inconsiderable, and those wholly to the collieries and iron-manufactories of the adjoining counties of Monmouth and Glamorgan, excepting only small quantities of barley, which are sometimes conveyed by means of the Newport canal to the Bristol market. Few peas are sown in the Vale of Wye, or on the stronger soils of the hundred of Talgarth; but the Vale of Usk affords excellent crops of both white and grey peas, the produce being generally from fifteen to twenty-five bushels per acre. Potatoes are most extensively cultivated on the southern side of the county, in and near the coal district. In the lower part of the Vale of Wye, in this county, are several extensive hop-yards, under similar cultivation to those of the neighbouring English counties. The most common artificial grasses are clover and ryegrass. The enclosed grass lands, which are of very considerable extent, are also of various quality: those of the Vale of Usk, from above Brecknock to Buckland House, and from below Bwlch Arllwys to the border of Monmouthshire, present pastures which, owing to the lightness of their soil, have less richness than beauty. The produce of the natural meadows, except in some peculiarly favoured situations on the banks of the Wye and the Usk, is no where luxuriant; but on many farms great pains are taken to increase their fertility by manures and by irrigation. Lime is extensively employed as a manure in the southern and south-eastern parts of the county, where it is conveniently obtained from the limestone strata hereafter mentioned, being burned in the more easterly districts with the slack, or refuse, of the running and coking coal, and westward of the Neath river with culm, which is the refuse of the neighbouring mines of stone coal. Braes is a manure peculiar to the coal district, consisting of ashes and coal dust, the refuse of the coking hearths, where coal is charred for the use of the blast furnaces of the iron-works. Ashes of all kinds are also extensively employed in the vicinities of the iron-works and of the towns. Most of the ploughs in common use are large and heavy, being about thirteen feet and a half long, with an acute pointed share, a straight mould-board, from three to three and a half feet long, and a chwelyd, or round staff of wood, gradually rising from the base and gradually projecting from the mould-board, to turn over the plit. The Rotherham plough is also very common, and is here called the Whitchurch plough, though sometimes the Crickhowel plough, the latter town having a long-established manufactory of implements of this kind. Carts and waggons are the most common agricultural vehicles in most parts of the county; but in the more mountainous regions the Welsh car, or sledge, drawn by one horse, is still used. The usual teams in tillage consist of four or five horses drawing singly, six oxen in pairs, or two pairs of oxen led by one horse: great power is applied to the working of the heavy plough, but the lighter English ploughs are commonly drawn by a pair of horses driven by the ploughman.

The native breed of cattle is the small hardy black kind, which still occupies the western and mountainous parts of the county, and is of the sort so prevalent in the adjoining counties of Carmarthen and Cardigan; but the white-faced Herefordshire cattle now occupy the Vale of Usk and all its numerous ramifications, as far as Treacastle, and the Vale of Wye, as far as the wilds of Irvon, in Builth: on the richer pastures, near the English border, these cattle equal in excellence those of Herefordshire itself, but, advancing towards the mountains, they gradually diminish in size. There are also various intermixtures between these two breeds. The sheep are of the small mountain breed, and are remarkably numerous: the rams have horns, as have also some of the ewes and wethers; they have generally white faces and legs, those of a different colour having acquired it by foreign intermixtures; their wool is short, and its fineness varies with the soil, climate, and aspect of their walks, but in proportion as it is coarser, so also is it longer: it is chiefly used in the manufacture of flannels, blankets, ordinary cloths, and felt hats: the average weight of the ewes is from six to nine lb. per quarter, and that of the wethers from eight to twelve. The instincts of these sheep are very remarkable: while fed in enclosures they have a mischievous activity, which almost baffles human ingenuity to counteract; but when driven on the mountain wastes, their natural abodes, they continue in one favourite spot, from which they cannot be removed without difficulty. The shepherds sometimes avail themselves of this circumstance, where there is a right of intercommonage (which is frequently the case), to prevent a newly-introduced flock from depasturing on the same bank, or hill, with "the old settlers:" coming to the spot at nightfall, or in the middle of the night, they make a noise and disturbance, which is particularly disagreeable to their own flocks, as well as to the new comers; but the latter, not being so much accustomed to the place, abandon the walk to the sole possession of its former occupiers. The sheep are also generally considered to have a full presentiment of the approach of severe weather, more particularly of snow storms, sometimes so fatal to them; and, a day or two before the commencement of the latter, they are observed to avoid the ditches and other situations where drifts are likely to be formed, and have sometimes, though seldom, been known to quit the elevated wastes entirely on such occasions, and, overleaping all fences, to descend into the valleys. Sheep of the same untractable disposition, bred in Glamorganshire, are often sold in great numbers into this county, where their purchasers are obliged to watch them for a considerable time with greater care than the native flocks: the vulgar notion is, that when the wind blows from the south they recognise their native air, and immediately meditate an escape: certain it is that, on such occasions, they may be seen standing on the highest eminences, snuffing the gale, and then at length, if no insurmountable impediment occurs, suddenly to scour away, stopping not until they have reached their former haunts. A few hogs are sold from this county to the interior of England. Considerable attention has for a long period been bestowed on the breeding of good horses, both for the saddle and the plough: for agricultural purposes preference is given to various crosses between the native small breed and the Suffolk "punches." The Brecknockshire farmers have an inclination to work oxen instead of horses, but their being generally situated at a considerable distance from coal and lime, compels them to have at least one horse team, besides which the larger farmers have generally two teams of oxen, which draw in yokes.

Brecknockshire contains many thriving orchards in the vales, which produce excellent cider, chiefly for home consumption. Apple trees are also sometimes planted in intermediate rows in the hop-yards, and among forest trees on warm declivities. The natural woods of the slate and coal tracts are the same; and rough declivities, waste corners, &c., when surrounded with fences, are soon crowded with oak, ash, and alder, the different species predominating according to soil and aspect, but oak being by far the most abundant: the less common native trees of these districts are birch, mountain ash, and wild cherry on the uplands, and wych-elm, aspen, sycamore, maple, lime, and wild crab trees, in more sheltered situations. The patches of dry sandy soil, formed in some places by the decomposition of the siliceous strata of the coal measures, also produce beech wood, which is never found indigenous in the slate tract; but, like the various other kinds of trees above mentioned, is a natural production of the red soils, in some places in such abundance as to have caused small tracts of them to be called Fawyddog, or beechy. The woods in the neighbourhood of Llangoed castle are particularly extensive; and in the vicinities of Trevecca, Penpont, and Abercamlais, are numerous Scotch firs of artificial plantation, and remarkably fine growth. Poplars sometimes attain an amazing size by the sides of the rivers and brooks, and are more particularly numerous in the Vale of Usk. The open wastes and mountains subject to common rights occupy about one-third of the county. The principal stock upon these is sheep, with some horned cattle and horses in summer; but the number of the latter is not considerable, the farmers not having a sufficient stock of food for them in winter: owing to this circumstance, also, the commons in many places are capable of supporting more than three times the amount of the stock that the parishioners have to turn upon them. Some individuals, however, have flocks of the small mountain sheep, amounting to many thousands: in the hundred of Builth the flocks of the small farmers vary in number, from one hundred to five hundred, and of the large farmers from one thousand to five thousand: the sheep graziers in general pay little attention to the cultivation of their enclosed lands, which are commonly of very small extent, obtaining most of their corn at the nearest market town. The wastes may be divided into three grand districts, viz.:—First; the Talgarth Black Mountains, with their branches, on the eastern side of the county, and connected with the Hatterell hills of Herefordshire: these mountains, which reach in this county from Hay on the Wye to Crickhowel on the Usk, are elevated and extensive, nearly twenty thousand acres of them being claimed as sheep-walks by the inhabitants of one parish only: their soils, resting upon red sand-stone and a narrow line of detached limestone rocks, are productive of good herbage for sheep and young cattle, and their outskirts are susceptible of advantageous cultivation. Secondly, the mountains, composed of limestone and red sand-stone, extending westward from the Bloreng mountain in Monmouthshire, and including the Brecknockshire and Carmarthenshire Beacons, the most elevated western summits of which are called the Black Mountains, probably from the dark and frowning aspect which they assume when their covering of heath is out of bloom: some of the lower parts of these vast tracts are susceptible of agricultural improvement, but the rest is by far too elevated, steep, and rocky for cultivation. The mountains of the coal tract, on the southern border of the county, produce an abundance of coarse grasses, which support vast numbers of cattle and sheep. On these and the above-mentioned range, in the south-eastern part of Brecknockshire, adjoining the counties of Glamorgan and Carmarthen, lies the Great Forest of Brecknock, the wastes of which, by actual admeasurement, contain forty-one thousand three hundred and twenty-four acres, and were lately sold to different purchasers by the Commissioners of Crown Lands. The third division comprises the Eppynt hills, above described, and the dreary hills of shale to the north of them. The former, having for the most part substrata of red sand-stone and grey mountain rock, produce better herbage for sheep than the hills of the blue shale. The dry parts of the latter are covered with heath, or till, a hungry light mould; the wet flats, with rushes on clay, or peat: the herbage is altogether the coarsest of any extensive tract in the county; and the wool of the numerous flocks of small and hardy sheep which it supports is equally coarse, being interspersed with numerous kemps, or coarse long hairs: the improvement of these wastes by cultivation is rendered impossible by every natural disadvantage, to which it may be added, that lime is not to be procured within a shorter distance than from thirty to forty miles. The peaty soils found on all the wastes, except those having a limestone substratum, but to the greatest extent on these in the northern part of the county, present in some places extensive meadows, called in Welsh rhôsydd, and productive of a species of short hay, denominated, in the dialect of the country, gwair mân, or small hay, and which the farmers gather for the winter support of their horned cattle: so slender and small is the blade of this grass, that, in some cases, it cannot be removed to the homestead except in baskets, or large sheets, provided for the purpose. Coal is the common fuel of the southern parts of the county, where it is most easily procured, and peat in the northern and north-western districts, where coal can only be obtained by a tedious and difficult land-carriage, while peat of good quality is abundant. The Brecon Agricultural Society was the first of the kind instituted in Wales, and one of the earliest in Britain, its articles having been printed in April 1755.

The geological features of Brecknockshire are striking and interesting, and its mineral productions of great importance: these consist, for the most part, of coal, iron, limestone, and building stones of various kinds. Beginning with the lowest rocks in geological position, the whole country to the north of the Eppynt hills, and the bases of those hills themselves, are composed of a perishable argillaceous shale, rab, or roch (as it is variously denominated by different writers), of no value, being scarcely fit for repairing the roads, as a little heavy carriage and wet weather soon reduce it to its primitive clay: the strata, which are generally very thin, dip towards every point of the compass, according to the undulations of the surface: in some places they are sufficiently indurated to be used as flag-stones, under cover from the weather, and in the erection of buildings intended to be rough-cast or stuccoed. Here and there they are intersected by ranges of what is commonly termed grey mountain rock, or whin-stone, of various texture and degrees of hardness, some rocks affording excellent building stones, while others, bearing marks of marine exuviae, and effervescing with acids, perish by the action of the atmosphere: their line of bearing is from north-east to south-west. One of these enters Brecknockshire in crossing the Wye from Radnorshire, near the junction of that river with the Elain, and stretches across the hundred of Builth to the river Irvon, being seen to advantage between Llanwrtyd wells and the church of that parish: the stratification is in some places irregular, but in others regular, so as to form quadrilateral columns, nine or ten feet long, and from nine to fourteen inches square, which incline considerably to the north-west, and on that side support the argillaceous shale, or slate. About three miles south-westward of this ledge of whin-stone is a ridge of pudding-stone, resting upon the shale, and blocks of breccia are found in different directions. The grey mountain rock is every where covered with a more grateful soil than the surrounding hills of blue shale. To this shale, proceeding southward, immediately succeeds the red sand-stone strata, which sustain the great tract of red soils above described, and the northern limit of which extends from the banks of the Wye, below the confluence of the Edow, obliquely across the Eppynt hills, and northward from Llangynog chapel to Cwm y Dwr, on the border of Carmarthenshire: their southern boundary reaches from Llanelly, on the south of the Usk, near Crickhowel, directly westward to the southern foot of the Carmarthenshire Beacons. Though the rocks of this tract exhibit few anomalies, they are in themselves of three varieties; namely, the lower, the middle, and the upper strata. The stone of the first is of a greyish blue colour, and breaks into splinters, exhibiting no particles of sand or mica, and, though difficult to dress, makes excellent building stone. The middle stratum consists of micaceous schistus, the thinner sort of which is converted into roofing tiles, and those from two to six inches thick into flags, milestones, &c. The interior of the tile, or flag, is a compact sand-stone of various colours,—brown, greenish, or grey, the cleft in the rock being occasioned by a thickly bespangled bed of mica. The upper stratum consists simply of reddish sand-stone, which is convertible to few uses, but which has contributed to the colouring of the soil of the whole district. The mountains of this tract are the highest in South Wales, and are for the most part covered with vegetation, excepting only such declivities as are perpendicularly steep, and in these situations the regularity of the stratification is strikingly exhibited, more particularly in the rocks in the vicinity of Crickhowel. A remarkable range of the grey mountain rock crosses the Wye into this county from Radnorshire, a little below the town of Builth, and pursues the south-westerly direction which it had held through the shale of that county, for a considerable distance, into the red sand-stone of Brecknockshire, passing through the parish of Crickadarn, and across the valleys of the Honddû and the two Esgairs, to the extremity of the parish of Merthyr-Cynog, where it terminates in the craggy intrenched height of Corn y Van. This grey rock, and its accompanying grey soil, are about a mile and a half broad in the valley of the Honddû, from the north of Castle Madoc to Tenerddi brook, southward of Capel Isâr: this range affords excellent building stones, of which the town of Builth and its bridge over the Wye present good specimens. The Brianog mountain, in the red soil district, near the town of Crickhowel, contains a stratum of compact greyish freestone, of which furnace hearthstones, rollers, cisterns, &c., are made; as also a bed of inferior sandy limestone. Along the north-western base of the red sand-stone of the Black Mountains of Talgarth is a range of detached limestone rocks, which extends for several miles, from Llanigon to Cathedine, near Savaddan lake, and thence turning more directly westward is found on both sides of the Vale of Usk: on the north it appears occupying a considerable tract at Llanvillo and Llanthew, to the north-east of the town of Brecknock, and further on, at Venni Vâch wood, and other places about two miles westward of Brecknock; while on the southern side of the vale it is seen at Aber Cynrig, opposite to Llanhamllêch, and a mile or two further westward at Frwd-grêch, opposite to Brecknock. The lime from this stone is for the most part of a strong gritty quality, and used only in the immediate vicinity: at the north-eastern extremity of the range it is rendered expensive by the great distance from which coal must be brought to burn it: the lime of the Venni Vâch and Aber Cynrig rocks cements in water.

and within a few miles of the anomalous limestone rocks just mentioned, succeeds a range of primitive or mountain limestone, which commences on the east in the higher strata of the Bloreng mountain to the south of Abergavenny in Monmouthshire, whence, stretching first north-westward and then westward, its bold steep forms a lofty parapet on the southern side of the Vale of Usk, as far as Llangynider; hence, proceeding westward, it loses much of its boldness of aspect by reposing on the base of the loftier red sand-stone of the Brecknockshire Beacons. Some of the lower strata of this limestone are of such extraordinary thickness as to appear almost like primitive rocks: one bed at Clydach is of a bluer colour than the others, and is used with the Aberthaw lias limestone of Glamorganshire, as a cement for works under water. A singular section of the various strata is exhibited at the cataract of the Clydach rivulet, at Pwll y Cwn, where the water is precipitated over a ledge of perpendicular rocks, consisting at the top of limestone for about fourteen yards; then of a bed of a heterogeneous quality, about five feet thick, sandy, of a magnesian texture, and difficult of calcination; next, for several feet, of beds of laminar schist, still more argillaceous; and then again of limestone, down to the pudding-stone base which immediately rests upon the red sand-stone: in this pudding-stone are cemented large quartz pebbles of various colours. In the parishes of Penderin and Ystradgynlais the limestone occasionally departs from its usual regularity of stratification; and at Craig y Dinas, as if by some vast convulsion, the whole mass of the rock is thrown southward several hundred yards into the coal measures, with which it intermingles. Between the rivers Neath and Tawy, at Penwyll, the strata recover their regularity of bearing and inclination, which is again disarranged to the north-west of the Tawy, where the lofty conical mountain of Cribarth seems to have been thrown further southward than the neighbouring regularly stratified limestone rocks. About the centre of the Cribarth rock is a bed of freestone, which has limestone both above and below it, and is traversed by fissures in every direction: there is also a vein of fine red viscid clay. Marble, of a dark colour, is found in this limestone at Craig y Nôs, near the head of the Swansea canal, in this county. The most striking peculiarities of this limestone range are, frequent concavities in the surface, caused by a depression of the strata; swallows, or places where streams of water are engulfed, making for some distance a subterraneous passage; and extensive caverns, beautifully studded with crystals, stalactites, &c.: the lime obtained from its rocks, which are quarried in many places, is of a very fine and pure quality. This mountain limestone range forms part of the northern rim of the great mineral basin of South Wales, which contains all its treasures of coal and iron. Next to it, proceeding southward, and resting upon it in geological position, occurs a stratum of chert, about four feet thick, which is succeeded by a bed of limestone about forty-five feet thick, of a whiter colour than any in the rocks above mentioned, and having a few marine exuviae. Next occurs chert, about four feet thick; then coarse-grained chert, inclining to burr, about sixty feet thick; to which succeeds a pudding-stone of about the same thickness, the quartz pebbles of which are smaller and finer than those of the bed above mentioned, and upon which immediately rest coal measures, or such substances as accompany coal without containing either iron-ore or coal worth the working: these are about a hundred feet thick, and support a hard rock about forty-five feet thick, the base of all the coal and iron strata, called by the Welsh colliers Quar Cymraeg, and sometimes farewell rock, as, wherever it "bassets out," it is useless to search for coal beneath it: it is also severally denominated Carreg Wyllt, Nicholas' Rock, and Roken Cymraeg. These various strata, and many of those of the really valuable coal measures, are exhibited to advantage along the bed of the Clydach river, and in other deep dingles, where they are seen dipping, with a regular inclination of about one yard in twelve, southward towards the centre of the basin. The strata of coal and iron-ore which "crop out" on the southern side of Brecknockshire are the lowest in the basin, and occur only in the three following places: first, from the small river Twrch across the river Tawy and the Drim Mountain to the Great Forest of Brecknock; secondly, a corner of territory from Blaen Romney, at the junction of the three counties of Brecknock, Glamorgan, and Monmouth, to the northern side of Brÿn Oer; and thirdly, from Rhÿd Ebwy and Beaufort iron-works, through Llÿn y Pwll, near Tavern Maid Sur, to where this district adjoins the Earl of Abergavenny's mineral property. The coal measures may be best described by taking a section of the strata in the mines of Cyvarthva and Dowlais, near Merthyr-Tydvil, on the southern border of the county: in the former are twenty-two beds of coal, varying in thickness from sixteen inches to nine feet, making a total of fifty-eight feet eight inches; twenty-eight beds of iron mine, making a total thickness of nine feet three inches; three beds of fire clay, being collectively seven feet four inches thick; and forty-eight beds of blue cleft, or clunch, freestone rock, bind, &c., amounting in all to six hundred and fourteen feet six inches. In the Dowlais section of the strata are seen thirty-six beds of coal, making a total of only fifty-six feet eight inches thick; fifty-eight strata of iron mine, being collectively eleven feet nine inches thick; three beds of fire clay, making together a thickness of eight feet six inches; and one hundred and eight beds of the various contiguous substances above mentioned, which together make a thickness of five hundred and twenty-six feet seven inches. The three uppermost coal strata of the Cyvarthva section, and nearly all those in the south-eastern part of the county, eastward of the Blaen Romney iron-works, are of a bituminous binding quality, called by the Welsh glo rhwym, and sometimes glo rhing, probably an abbreviation of the English running coal, or glo cwlwm, from its caking in a knotty mass when ignited: but nearly all the rest of the coal raised eastward of the Neath river in this county is of the kind called coking coal, which is of a less bituminous quality, and is so called from its being the fittest to be charred for the use of the blast furnaces. Westward of the river Neath the strata become more irregular, and the coal is almost wholly of the kind called by the Welsh glo caled, or hard coal, from its not soiling the fingers, nor flaming when it is ignited: by the English it is called stone-coal, and the large is more particularly adapted to the drying of malt and hops, and the small, called culm, to the burning of lime. The strata of iron-stone commonly vary from one to five inches in thickness, and frequently consist of irregular lumps, called "balls of mine." The mots remarkable faults, or dislocations of the strata, that are observable in this county, occur at the limestone rocks of Cribarth and Dinas, where the strata are thrown into a perpendicular position. In the Aber Crav colliery the whole of the measures curve upwards on approaching a fault; and one bed of coal, eighteen inches thick, in this vicinity, is called lantern coal, from its great inflammability, and the brightness of its blaze. The deep valleys which occur in the coal district, and intersect the mineral strata in various directions almost to their base, enable the miner to obtain the object of his labours by driving horizontal shafts, or levels, into the hills, along which are constructed rail-roads, and upon these the various materials are drawn out by horses and mules: the levels also act as drains. The fire clay strata are found of the best quality at Dinas Rock, near Pont Neath Vaughan, and a little higher up, near the village of Penderin; and from these places considerable quantities are conveyed by the canals to Neath and Swansea in Glamorganshire, for the use of the furnaces in the neighbourhood of those towns, and for exportation.

Brecknockshire contains no considerable quantity of any ores except those of iron; but sulphate of copper has been discovered in the parish of Llanwrthwl, on the northern confines of the county, near the junction of the river Elain with the Wye, where some unsuccessful attempts were made to discover a vein which might be worked with profit. Traces of lead-ore have been seen near the Dinas limestone rock, in the parish of Penderin, where similar trials were made for that ore, but with no better success. Lead veins were discovered nearly thirty years ago in the Llanigon hills, south of the town of Hay, which were worked, but the expenses proved greater than the profits. Small quantities of lead-ore have also been found above Coed y Cymmer, on the road from Merthyr-Tydvil to Brecknock, and various indications of it are observable in the slate tract. Tripoli, or lapis cariosus, is found in great quantities, and of a very pure quality, on the limestone to the north of Cribarth rock: it is generally above the limestone, though sometimes found enclosed between its strata, and is collected in great quantities, which are conveyed by the canal from Hên Neuadd to Swansea, and thence shipped off to different parts of England, to be used in the burnishing of metals. Its geological situation is on the northern verge of the mountain limestone range, adjoining to the pudding-stone which separates it from the red sand-stone of the Beacons: the masses of the coarser sort frequently enclose nodules of limestone. Muchudd Irvon, a ponderous black stone of close texture, which is esteemed superior to brass for the centre pins of engines to turn upon, is found in the hundred of Builth, from Llanwrtyd wells to the confluence of the Irvon with the Wye. Although the range of limestone environing the coal measures on the north is usually considered as of the primitive or mountain kind, it nevertheless occasionally exhibits some few marine exuviae, and one stratum on the small river Clydach is almost an entire mass of corallines. In the Cribarth rocks are found various spars of fibrous fracture, with slender acicular concretions standing in different directions. Some vegetable exuviae are observable in the strata contiguous to the coal, and various spars among the iron-ores in the vicinity of Llanelly: some of these ores are also found to be shot into constant and regular figures. The clunch, or cleft, of the coal measures contains vitriol of iron; and in some of the mines the water is so much vitriolated, that it excoriates the hands and faces of the workmen.

The most important branch of manufacture carried on is that of iron. The most ancient of its present establishments for this purpose are about two centuries old; but there is good reason to believe, from the masses of imperfectly fused scoria found in different parts of the hundred of Crickhowel, and usually called Roman cinders, that some mode of manufacturing iron must have been practised in this district at a period long anterior to the erection of any furnaces on modern plans. The present iron-works are situated chiefly near the confines of Monmouthshire, and are as follows:—those in the vale of Clydach, in the parish of Llanelly, the raw material for which is obtained at the distance of about two miles, and conveyed from the mines by means of rail-roads and inclined planes; the Beaufort works, in the parish of Llangattock, the ores for which are brought by rail-roads a distance of half a mile; and the Blaen Romney works, situated near the source of the river Romney, in the parish of Llangynider: all these works obtain their supply of raw materials from the estates of the Duke of Beaufort. There are two other important establishments of a similar kind, viz., that of Hirwaun, at the southernmost extremity of the county, in the parish of Penderin; and that of Ynys Kedwin, in the parish of Ystradgynlais. At these various works the iron-ore is smelted into pigs, and these again are manufactured into bars, rods, &c. The Brecknockshire Agricultural Society, for many years after its first establishment, adopted judicious methods to encourage the woollen and linen manufactures, which, notwithstanding all its efforts, gradually declined: the latter is now extinct, and the woollen manufacture is confined to the weaving of the yarn spun in private families into what are called hanner gwe, that is, half-woven, or raw, cloth, which is sometimes brought to the fairs and markets, rolled up in pieces of from twenty-six to thirty-two yards long, and about a yard and a half broad: these are milled and dyed in England. There is a flannel manufacture at Hay; also one on a smaller scale at Builth; one of hats and one of coarse woollen cloth at Brecknock; and one of shoes at Crickhowel; and in the mountainous parts of the county considerable quantities of woollen stockings are knitted by the women, and brought for sale to the fairs: the manufacture of these stockings has of late years been expedited by the erection of carding-mills at different places. At Glàn Grwyney, near Crickhowel, is a manufactory for brown paper. Great quantities of hides and skins are tanned and dressed in the county, the former being noted for making good leather for the soles of shoes. The commerce of Brecknockshire is very various and of considerable importance. The chief exports are, cattle and sheep; iron in various states of manufacture, which is sent by means of railways and canals to the ports of Glamorganshire, and along the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal to Newport; wool, chiefly for the manufactures of the North of England; some small quantities of the coarse woollen cloths and stockings above mentioned, which are taken to the neighbouring English markets; leather and dressed sheep skins, for which the town of Brecknock is the principal market for several of the contiguous Welsh counties, while great quantities are exported to Bristol and other English markets; and fire clay and tripoli, the former chiefly to be manufactured into bricks for the furnaces of Glamorganshire, and the latter sent to Bristol. There are no extraordinary imports worthy of notice: the coal tract, owing to its inferior fertility and greater population, consumes a large proportion of the agricultural produce of the more fertile neighbouring districts.

The principal rivers are the Usk, the Wye, the Irvon, the Tâf, the Nedd, or Neath, and the Tawe, or Tawy: the three latter, with their tributaries, all inconsiderable within this county, descend southward towards the Bristol channel, from the Black Mountain range. The Usk has its source on the northern side of the Carmarthenshire Beacons, some miles above Trêcastle, and, receiving the waters of numerous smaller rivers from every side, flows eastward to the capital of the county, and thence east-south-eastward by the town of Crickhowel, a little below which it enters Monmouthshire, after a course of about thirty-two miles: in this county its bed every where retains its reddish hue, while its waters abound with fish of various kinds, more particularly with salmon and trout, for the latter of which it is much celebrated. Its principal tributaries from the north are, the Cilieni, Brân, Esgair, and Honddû, from the secluded valleys of the Eppynt hills, and the last of which, at its junction with the Usk, gives to the town of Brecknock its Welsh name of Aber-Honddû; the Rhiangoll, a rivulet from the rich and beautiful valley of Cwmdû; and the Grwyney, from the Black Mountains of Talgarth. Those from the south are, the Crai; the Senny; the Tarannell, or Tarrell, from Llŷn Cwn Llŵch; the Carvanell, or Annell, from Glyn Collwyn; the Cravnant; the Onwy; the Clydach; and others of less note. The romantic Wye first touches this county at its junction with the Elain (a small stream forming the northern boundary of this county, and separating it from the north-western extremity of Radnorshire), and henceforward forms the north-eastern boundary of Brecknockshire, except for a short interval in the vicinity of Glâsbury, which village, situated on the southern side of the river, is included in the county of Radnor: it flows first south-eastward by Builth, and then eastward to Hay, where it enters Herefordshire in its further course to the Severn, after separating the counties of Brecknock and Radnor for a distance of about thirty miles. Its principal tributary from this county is the Irvon, which receives the waters of the Chwevrwy, Dylas or Dulas, Camarch, and other streams from the north, forms the channel through which are poured nearly all the superfluous waters of that part of the county lying northward of the Eppynt hills, and joins the Wye a little above the town of Builth, after a course of about twenty miles. The Wye also receives from Brecknockshire the waters of the Dihonwy, Caletwr, and Llynvy, the last of which has its source above Savaddan lake. The Tâf is formed by two streams, called Tâf Vawr and Tâf Vechan, which descend turbulently and precipitately from the Beacons of Brecknockshire, over limestone precipices, and unite on the southern border of the county, near Merthyr-Tydvil, and immediately enter Glamorganshire. The Neath has a similar source further westward, and, together with several other streams, by which it is shortly joined, forms various grand and beautiful cascades. The Tawy has its double source near the lofty Trêcastle Beacon, within a short distance of that of the Usk, and thence flows south-westward by a projecting portion of Carmarthenshire into Glamorganshire. The Romney also has its source on the southern border of the county, near the confines of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire. The Mellte and the Hepstê, tributaries of the Neath, are worthy of notice, the former for the subterraneous course which it pursues for a short distance, and both for their cascades.

The commerce of the county is greatly facilitated by artificial navigation. In 1792 an act was procured for constructing the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, which was designed to extend from the town of Brecknock down the valley of the Usk, by Abergavenny, to the navigable channel of that river at Newbridge, about four miles below the town of Usk in Monmouthshire: but an agreement being entered into between the proprietors and those of the Monmouthshire canal, the latter paying the former three thousand pounds, it was determined to form a junction between the canals at Pont y Moel, below Pont y Pool, and a fresh act for that purpose was obtained in 1793. The first portion made navigable was from the coal mines and lime-works in the vicinity of the Clydach to Llangynider bridge, a distance of eight miles and a half; and from the latter place the canal was continued ten miles further, to Brecknock, and was completed in 1801, forming an important line of carriage for coal and lime to that town. Through the whole of its extent it is carried through the light soils of the red sand-stone tract, and, to make it hold water, it was found necessary to adopt the tedious and expensive process of puddling: this difficulty occasioned the proprietors to deliberate for some time whether they should complete the line from Clydach to below Pont y Pool, a distance of fourteen miles and a quarter, by a continuation of the canal, or by a railway; but the former plan was at last adopted, and the entire canal, thirty-two miles in length, was completed in December 1811, at a total expense of £170,000, being nearly double the original estimate. This canal, which affords a communication by water between Brecknock and the Bristol channel, has a fall of sixty-eight feet from that town to Clydach, by means of six locks, but thenceforward to its junction with the Monmouthshire canal it is upon one level: its breadth is ten yards, and its depth of water four feet and a half, being navigated by barges of twenty-five tons' burden: it is carried over the valley and stream of the Clydach by a grand aqueduct, eighty feet high above the level of the water below. The chief feeder is a copious stream introduced from the Usk into its summit level, besides which, one hundred and eighty-five locks of one hundred and eighty tons of water each are daily gauged into it in dry seasons, from five streams in different parts of the line, exclusively of smaller brooks. The rail-roads connected with this canal, by means of which iron, coal, and limestone are brought from the works in the south-eastern part of the county, occupy an extent of about ten miles; and a rail-road ten miles in length extends from the Beaufort iron-works down the valley of the Ebwy to the extremity of the southern branch of the Monmouthshire canal. The Swansea canal, for the construction of which an act of parliament was obtained in 1794, extends from that town up the valley of the Tawy, a distance of about seventeen miles, to Hên Neuadd, in the parish of Ystradgynlais, in the south-western part of this county, whence it affords a medium for conveying to Swansea, for exportation, vast quantities of stone-coal from the numerous collieries adjacent, and iron from the works of Ynys Kedwin; also lime, for the use of the farmers along its course: about four miles of the course of this canal are in Brecknockshire. The Neath canal, for which an act was procured in 1790, extends from the navigable channel of the river Neath, below the town of that name, up the valley of the Neath to Aber Gwrelych, in this county, almost as high as Pont Neath Vaughan; and, by means of it, stone-coal and culm, iron, limestone, and fire clay, are exported from this part of Brecknockshire. Besides the private rail-roads for the convenience of bringing materials to the blast furnaces, and conveying the iron from the works to the various canals, this county is distinguished for a like road of much greater extent, and embracing more important commercial objects. The advantages that were anticipated more immediately to result from the formation of this rail-road were, by connecting the coal tracts of Brecknock, Monmouth, and Glamorgan, with the agricultural western part of Herefordshire and the eastern part of Radnorshire, the introduction of a direct exchange of produce between these two districts; the former abounding with the best kind of fuel, while its miners and iron-manufacturers depend chiefly on other parts for their supply of provisions, and the latter being fertile in corn, but its inhabitants receiving their scanty and precarious supply of coal from the Cleve hills in Shropshire. For this purpose an act of parliament was obtained in 1811; but a different line of road from that stated in this act having in the meantime been resolved upon, another was granted in the following year, and the work was executed with alacrity. Commencing at the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, near the former town, it gains its summit level at the distance of four miles and five furlongs, by a gentle rise of one hundred and fifty-four feet two inches, being only five inches in every twenty-two yards; and thence makes a like gradual descent of ten miles to Glâsbury, on the banks of the Wye; but from Glâsbury to Hay, a distance of four miles, it has a declivity of only three inches in every twenty-two yards. From Hay it proceeds to Eardisley, in Herefordshire, a distance of seven miles, with a fall of only half an inch in every twenty-two yards; and at the latter place divides into three branches, one of which extends northward to Kington, a second eastward to Leominster, and the third south-eastward to Hereford: this road is commonly called the Hay railway, and the total length of it and its branches is twenty-six miles. The roads are generally good, excellent materials for making and repairing them being every where abundant, excepting only in those parts of the shale tract lying most remote from the ranges of grey mountain rock: sometimes, too, the red sand-stone of the central parts of the county is applied to this purpose, in lieu of stone from the lower strata, which, being of a very perishable nature, renders the roads heavy, unless frequently renewed. The road from London to Milford and the south of Ireland, and to Cardigan, through Oxford and Gloucester, enters this county from Abergavenny in Monmouthshire, and traverses it from east to west, passing through Crickhowel and Brecknock, and entering Carmarthenshire a few miles beyond the village of Trêcastle, and about five miles before reaching Llandovery: a mail coach takes this route to Carmarthen and Milford. There is also a branch from the road from London to Radnor, by way of Hereford, which from the latter town passes through Hay, in this county, to Brecknock. The road from London to Trêgarn in Cardiganshire branches from the Aberystwith road at Presteign, and proceeds through Builth in this county, the northern end of which it traverses in its further progress.

The relics of antiquity are very numerous and various; they are of all periods of British history, and frequently of great curiosity and interest. Upon the high hill called the Gader, or "Chair," near the little town of Talgarth, are some circles, evidently Druidical, formed of small loose stones, the circumference of the whole being about twenty yards; and several other similar circles are seen within a few hundred paces. On a hill to the westward of the village of Devynock, near the road from Ystradgynlais to Trêcastle, is a circle of large Druidical stones, called Cerig duon, or the "Black Stones," having one of larger dimensions than the rest. In a carn, situated in a field in the parish of Llanellieu, to the east of Bronllys, was found, about the commencement of the present century, a relic of the remotest ages of British antiquity, viz., a rudely-formed spear's head of flint, nearly seven inches long; and in the same mound was also a coarse earthen vessel. About two miles to the east of Talgarth, in a field called Croeslechau, is a cromlech; and another monument of the same kind, called Tŷ Illtyd, or "Illtyd's House," is situated on the summit of a hill, called Mannest, in the parish of Llanhamllêch. There are remains of the two Roman stations, but the original name of either of them is not known: the principal of these, situated about three miles above the town of Brecknock, near the confluence of the rivers Yscir and Usk, is called the Gaer, or Caer Bannau, and its remains are very extensive, forming a parallelogram of six hundred and twenty-four feet by four hundred and fifty-six: the foundations of the wall which bounded this area are yet perfect, and its ruins, in some places, more particularly on the northern and eastern sides, are from three to six feet high above the level of the ground, though much overgrown and concealed by underwood: the north-western angle of the camp is now occupied by a farm-house and offices, built chiefly from the ruins of the ancient wall. The whole area is covered with fragments of bricks; and gold and silver coins of the emperors Nero and Trajan have been found within it. A causeway may yet be traced leading from the Gaer nearly at right angles with the course of the Yscir; and upon it is seen a singular carved and inscribed Roman stone, called by the people of the adjacent country Maen y Morwynion, or the "Stone of the Maids." The other Roman station, also called the "Gaer," a name common to settlements of this people, is at the entrance of a vale, on a rising ground overlooking a small stream, called the Ewyn, in the vicinity of Llanvihangel Cwm dŷ, in the hundred of Crickhowel, and not far from the river Rhiangoll: it is of nearly the same dimensions as that of Caer Bannau, but of a form approaching nearer to a square: the prætorium is clearly distinguishable at the north-western end, while fragments of bricks are found over the whole enclosure, within which Roman coins have also been discovered: in the vicinity is a stone, now thrown down, bearing a Latin inscription. The principal Roman road was a branch of the Via Julia Maritima, which latter was formed by Julius Frontinus along the southern coast of Wales: from the station Isca Silurum, or Legionum, at Caerlleon, this branch passed by that of Gobannium (Abergavenny) entirely across the county, from east to west, to that of Maridunum at Carmarthen, and from its more elevated course has been called, in contradistinction to that from which it diverged, the Via Julia Montana. Almost the only trace of it yet discerned in the county, with the exception of the causeway at the Gaer above mentioned, which is supposed to have communicated with it, is a stone discovered on Trêcastle mountain, near a little public-house, called the Heath Cock, bearing an imperfect inscription, and supposed to be a Roman miliary. This road is considered to have entered Brecknockshire from Abergavenny in Monmouthshire, and to have passed through Crickhowel and Trêtower to the Gaer near Llanvihangel Cwm dŷ, and thence through a pass, called Bwlch, and in a line northward of the present turnpike road, to the town of Brecknock, to one street of which it gives the name of the Struet: hence it proceeded near the station at Caer Bannau, beyond which it soon crossed the Usk, and proceeded westward by Rhŷd y Briw (where some traces of it were seen rather more than half a century ago) into Carmarthenshire. The station at Caer Bannau appears to have communicated by vicinal ways with the stations Tibia Amnis at Cardiff, and Nidus at Neath, in Glamorganshire, and also with that at Cwm, on the river Ithon, in Radnorshire. That from Cardiff, now called the Sarn Hîr, enters this county from the vicinity of Bedwely in Monmouthshire, at a place called Brŷn Oer, whence it continues, in a direction nearly from south to north, across the Usk to the Via Julia Montana, in the vicinity of Brecknock. That from Neath, now called the Sarn Helen, takes a north-easterly direction, and may be traced through a great part of its course: it enters Brecknockshire at a place called Ton y Vildra, and a little further crosses a brook, called Nant hîr, then proceeds to Blaen Nedd, pursues a course parallel with the road from Pont Neath Vaughan for about a mile, and passes within a few yards of the huge upright stone, twelve feet high and ten broad, called Maen Llia, or "Llia's Stone," situated near the summit of a high hill, to the north-east of the last-mentioned place, whence it may be traced gradually descending on the southern side of the Senny river and vale, from which place all traces of it are afterwards lost for a considerable distance: at Blangwrthid, in the parish of Llanspythid, however, it is again traceable for a short distance, and is conjectured to have entered the Vale of Usk, near Penpont, where it joined the Via Julia. From the Gaer a road sometimes called the Via Devana is supposed to have proceeded northward towards the station of Deva, at Chester, by way of that at Cwm, on the banks of the Ithon, in Radnorshire, but no traces of it are visible in the county of Brecknock. From some remains of a road discovered in the parish of Newchurch in Tyr-Abbot, in the northern part of the county, a vicinal way is supposed to have passed in that direction from the station Maridunum, at Carmarthen, by Llanvair ar y Brŷn, to that on the river Ithon;

and at Caerau, in the parish of Llangammarch, is an artificial mount, about eighty yards in circumference, probably the seat of an arx speculatoria, or watch-tower, on this road, though by some antiquaries supposed to be of British origin. Near the village of Llanvrynach, about two miles to the south-east of Brecknock, several Roman baths in a very perfect state were discovered in 1783; and various Roman coins have been at different times found in the vicinity of that place, besides foundations of other ancient buildings contiguous to the baths. Near Crickhowel is an ancient British fortification, called Crûg Hywel, or "Howell's Mount," a large intrenched camp, of nearly triangular form, which gave name to that town: the ditch surrounding it is very deep, and cut with prodigious labour in the solid rock. A very extensive encampment of British formation, called Penmyarth, of a circular form, and defended only by a rude rampart of uncemented stones, is also visible on a hill between the road from Trêtower to Brecknock and the river Usk, a short distance to the northward of which is another fortification of the same kind. At Venni wood, near the great Roman station of Caer Bannau, is a British intrenched camp of very ancient date; at a place called Pen y Crûg, or the "Summit of the Hill," about one mile from this, and two miles north-west from Brecknock, is a large oval fortification of like origin, six hundred feet long, four hundred and thirty broad, and surrounded by four ditches, eighteen feet deep; and near this again is a third British fortification, of the same shape, but much smaller and in a less perfect state of preservation. Near the parish church of Llanvillo are the traces of a British camp, of an oval form, two hundred and eight yards long and forty-six broad; on an eminence near the church of Glâsbury are those of one of a smaller size; on the hill above Aberbrân, overlooking the Vale of the Usk, those of one of larger dimensions; and on the hills to the west of the Tawy river are remains of various small fortifications, also of British erection. The scene of the sanguinary conflict between the Saxons and the Britons, in the year 728, near the south-eastern extremity of this county, is marked by two large heaps of stones, called carneddau, one of which, on being opened, was found to contain a kistvaen, or sepulchral stone chest. Other carneddau are seen on the summit of a hill, rising from the valley of the Usk, in the vicinity of Trêtower, as also on the hills to the westward of the Vale of Tawy. In the parish of Llanwrthwl, at the northern extremity of the county, are some large stones placed irregularly in the ground, which have given to the plain on which they stand the name of Rhôs saith Maen, or the "Seven-stone Common;" and in the parish of Llangeney, near Crickhowel, is a remarkable ancient monument, consisting of a single upright stone, about thirteen feet high. Remarkable single artificial mounds, supposed to have been posts of defence, but of uncertain date, are seen respectively near Dinas, in the vicinity of Llanwrtyd, near Castle Madoc, at Ystradvelltey, and at Trêcastle.

At the period of the dissolution, the only religious houses contained in this county were the priory and college of Brecknock, the latter of which still exists, and there are also vestiges of the ancient buildings of both these institutions. In a steep precipice in the upper part of the vale of Ystradgynlais is an ancient hermitage, cut in the solid rock, called Eglwys Cradoc, or "Cradoc's Church." The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture exist in the churches of St. John the Evangelist and St. Mary, at Brecknock, the former of which contains a font of Saxon, or early Norman, workmanship; the college church at the same town; the church of Crickhowel, which, among other peculiarities, is remarkable as the only one in Brecknockshire having a spire steeple; and those of Llanthew and Talgarth. There are striking ruins of the castles of Brecknock, Bronllys, Crickhowel, Rhŷd y Briw (sometimes called Devynock castle, near the village of Devynock), and Trêtower, near the village of Trê-twr, or Trê'r twr. There are also fragments of the walls of Dinas castle, in the parish of Talgarth; and some small remains of the castle of Builth, and of that of Pencelly, near Llanhamllêch: on a lofty precipitous bank, rising from the side of the river Irvon, a little above its junction with the Wye, is a mound called Castell Caer Beris, which appears to have been once the site of a fortress. This county contains a remarkably great number of ancient mansions; either now or formerly the residences of families possessing estates within it. Those most worthy of notice are, Carawen, in the valley of the greater Tâf, the seat of a family named Morgan; Castle Madoc, near Llandeivailog Vâch; Dderw House, in the parish of Llŷswen, at present occupied by a farmer; Frwdgrêch, Hoelvanog, and Newton, all near Brecknock; Lower Trevecca House, in the parish of Talgarth; Pont Wilym, near Brecknock, now a farm-house; and the old mansion of Scethrog (now called the Tower, and inhabited by a farmer), near the village of Llansaintfraed on the Usk: another old mansion at Hay is the seat of a family named Wellington. At the western extremity of the town of Crickhowel, adjoining the road leading to Brecknock, are some striking ruins of a castellated mansion, anciently belonging to the Herberts of that place, consisting chiefly of an old gateway and part of an outer wall. There are also standing, an outward wall and gateway of Porthaml, an ancient fortified residence near Talgarth; and some remains of a castellated mansion of the bishops of St. David's, at Llanthew. Some of the residences of a more modern date most worthy of notice for their architectural beauty are, Glân Usk, the residence of Joseph Bailey, Esq.; Gwernvale, that of John Gwynne Esq.; Pennoyre House, that of John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, Esq.; Peterstone, that of the Rev. Thomas Powell; and Pontywall, that of F. Philips, Esq. Brecknockshire is distinguished above every other county in South Wales for the neatness, comfort, and convenience of its farm-houses and offices, an advantage considered to be owing chiefly to the labours, precepts, and example of the members of the Brecon Agricultural Society, and to the excellence of the building materials obtained in most parts of the county. A few of the cottages, in the most mountainous and uncultivated parts of the county, are of a very inferior description. Some of the houses in the vicinity of the iron-works are remarkable for being roofed with plates of rolled iron, some flat, others curved like the common pantiles: the spars, side-rasers, &c., are also sometimes of iron. The quickset hedges are almost universally very crooked: in some of the uplands of the red sand-stone and coal tracts the fences are dry stone walls, made of the flat slate-like stones found there, or of these placed in alternate layers with sods. The bread of the agricultural population of the vales is made chiefly from the red lammas wheat, ground and dressed in the ordinary manner; but in the more elevated and less cultivated districts it is frequently made from a mixture of wheat and rye, called muncorn, or of wheat and barley, and sometimes from barley alone. Servants are hired at the May and November fairs: most of the fairs of this county continue for several days. The most remarkable mineral spring is that at Llanwrtyd Wells, on the banks of the Irvon, in the upper part of the hundred of Builth, about eight miles west of the town of Builth, called by the Welsh Y Fynnon Ddrewlyd, or the "Stinking Well," the waters of which are strongly impregnated with hepatic gas, a small portion of sulphate of iron, and a still smaller quantity of sulphate of soda, and are ascertained to be of equal efficacy with those of Harrogate in the cure of scorbutic and scrofulous disorders. The sanative properties of this spring were discovered about the year 1732: it is now much resorted to in the summer season, and a comfortable mansion, formerly the residence of a respectable family, is open for the public accommodation, with conveniences for warm and cold bathing. The Park Wells, a mile to the west of Builth, consist of four springs within a few feet of each other; one of these is of pure water, another saline, a third chalybeate, and the fourth sulphureous. Several other mineral springs occur in different places, but are of no celebrity. Tarren yr Ogov, or the "Cliff of the Cave," is a limestone rock near Capel Callwen, on the western bank of the Tawy, out of which issues a constant stream of water, that works a mill immediately below: a day or two after heavy rains the quantity discharged is prodigiously increased. The southern side of this county, besides being distinguished for the picturesque beauties of its deep mountain dells, also presents various grand cascades, and other natural curiosities worthy of notice. The most remarkable of the waterfalls are, that called Pistyll-Mawr, or the Great Cascade, on the small river Clydach, romantically embosomed in a luxuriant wood; two of peculiar grandeur on the small river Mellte, a little above its junction with the Hepstè; Cil Hepstè waterfall, on the latter stream, which is here precipitated, in one wide unbroken sheet, from a height of nearly fifty feet, and afterwards with the Mellte descends into the Neath; a bold cataract, called Scwd Einon Gam, on the Pyrddin, a stream which flows into the Neath from the westward; and that called Scwd yr Hên Rhÿd, on the small river Llêch, which joins the Tawy from the eastward, some distance above the village of Ystradgynlais. The Mellte, before forming the cascades above mentioned, pursues a subterranean passage for a short distance, flowing through a singular and extensive cavern, which, when the water is low, may be explored with torches to a considerable distance: the entrance, called Porth Ogov, is about twenty feet high and forty-five wide, and its interior expands into a large apartment, ornamented with stalactites and other calcareous concretions: in the course of its passage through this cavern the river is precipitated, with astounding noise, into a deep pool.

BRETTON, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Hawarden, containing 257 inhabitants. This township is situated on the road from Chester to Flint: contiguous to the village lies what was formerly the great marsh of Saltney, which extends into the county palatine of Chester, and was enclosed pursuant to an act passed in 1778.

BRIDEL (BRIDDELL), a parish partly in the hundred of KEMMES, but principally in that of KILGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Cardigan, on the road to Narberth, containing 395 inhabitants. The land in this parish is all enclosed and in an excellent state of cultivation, and the soil is mostly fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the freeholders of the parish. The church, dedicated to St. David, is an ancient structure, beautifully situated and embosomed among trees, the luxuriant foliage of which almost conceals it from the view. In the churchyard stands an ancient cross, of the kind called St. Catherine's, supported on a plain shaft about nine feet high, and without any inscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £83. 7.

BRIDE'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W.S.W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 132 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south side of the bay in St. George's channel, to which it gives name, and at the neck of a small inlet from the bay, which flows up almost to the churchyard, forming what is called St. Bride's haven. A considerable herring fishery, which has been discontinued for many years, was formerly carried on here with very great advantage, and there are still the remains of an ancient chapel on the beach, which, according to tradition, was subsequently appropriated as a salting-house for curing the fish. In the cemetery belonging to this chapel were numerous stone coffins, of which several have been washed away by the encroachment of the sea, which has here gained considerably on the shore, as was proved some years ago, during an extraordinary recess of the tide, by the discovery of several stumps of trees. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and various parts of the parish afford extensive marine views and pleasing prospects over the adjacent country. Hill, the elegant mansion of Charles Philipps, Esq., is beautifully sheltered by luxuriant plantations, being open only to a verdant lawn, which slopes gently to the creek that comes up nearly to the churchyard. This family, who are descended from the ancient royal house of Cilsant, resided formerly at the old mansion of St. Bride's, which was abandoned some years since, on the erection of the present modern house. Attached to Hill is a park well stocked with deer, forming one of the very small number at present to be found in this part of the principality. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £15. 12. 11., and in the alternate patronage of Charles Philipps, Esq., W. P. Laugharne, Esq., and John Nash, Esq., the last as representative of the family of Philipps, of Fobeston. The church is not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £77. 9.

BRIDE'S (ST.) MAJOR, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, comprising the townships of St. Bride and Ynysawdre, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and containing 922 inhabitants, of which number, 328 are in the township of St. Bride,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Bridgend, on the road to Lantwit-Major. This place holds a conspicuous rank in the ancient history of the principality, and is distinguished for having been one of the earliest known residences of its princes. It is situated on the river Ogmore, by which it is bounded on the west, and extends southward to the Bristol channel. Dunraven Castle is an elegant and spacious structure, occupying an elevated situation in the parish, and commanding an extensive marine prospect, and several fine views of the rocky scenery along the coast. The present structure was erected by the late Thomas Wyndham, Esq., near the site of a former edifice, anciently the residence of Caractacus, and called by the Britons Dyndryvan, of which the present name is a modification. The British hero and his father, Brân ab Llŷr, are both said to have resided here; and the triple rampart that defended it, on the only side on which it was accessible, and of which the remains are still visible, is at least as ancient as the time of the Romans. After the disastrous defeat of Caractacus it continued to be the residence of the native reguli, till the time of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, on whose deposition by the Norman adventurer Fitz-Hamon, it was granted by that chieftain to William de Londres, together with the lordship and castle of Ogmore. The castle and manor of Dunraven were given by William de Londres to Arnold, his butler, as a reward for his valour in defending the castle of Ogmore from an attack of the Welsh, during the absence of that nobleman, for which he was also knighted, assuming from his office, according to the custom of that time, the name of Sir Arnold Butler, which he transmitted, together with the estate, to his descendants, who continued to enjoy the latter for many generations, till, the male line becoming extinct, it was conveyed by a daughter in marriage to the family of Vaughan. According to local tradition, which appears to have been confirmed by subsequent discoveries, the last of the Vaughans who possessed the manor was in the habit of inhumanly setting up decoy lights, to mislead vessels in the channel, in order to increase his revenue by the "Wrecks de mer," to which, as lord of the manor, he was entitled. Within sight of the house was a rock, dry only at low water, to which two of his sons having gone to divert themselves, and neglected to secure their boat, it was floated away, and they were left on the rock till the return of the tide, when they perished in sight of the family, who vainly attempted to afford assistance. During the confusion which this melancholy event created in the family, the third son, a child only just able to walk, fell into a large vessel of whey, and was drowned; and the proprietor, thus left childless, sold the estate to an ancestor of the late Thomas Wyndham, Esq., whose only daughter and heiress conveyed it by marriage to Windham Henry Wyndham Quin, Earl of Dunraven and Mountearl, the present noble proprietor: the mansion is at present in the occupation of J. W. Bennet, Esq., who married the widow of the late Mr. Wyndham, and who occasionally resides in it. The castle and lordship of Ogmore passed, by marriage with the heiress of the family of de Londres, to the first Duke of Lancaster, and still forms part of the duchy, now vested in the crown. The former is thus described by Leland:—"Ogor Castelle stondith on the Est Ripe of Ogor, on a playn Ground a Mile above the mouth of Ogor, and ys meatly welle main-tainid. It longgid ons to Lounder, now to the King."

The ruins, together with an out-post, called Castel Allen, are situated within an angle formed by the junction of the Ewenny with the river Ogmore; they are very considerable, and present a striking and interesting feature in the landscape.

The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Wick annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £9. 16. 5½., and in the patronage of Richard Turberville Turberville, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, and contains several handsome monuments; among which the most conspicuous are, a fine altar-tomb, bearing the effigies of a crusader and his lady, of the family of Butler, and an elegant mural monument, beautifully executed in white marble, by Gahagen, of Bath, to the memory of the late Thomas Wyndham, Esq., of Dunraven Castle, who represented the county of Glamorgan in several parliaments, on which are the effigies of himself and his two sons, who died in their infancy, finely sculptured in alto relievo. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A school, in which forty children of both sexes are instructed, is supported by annual subscriptions among the principal proprietors of land. Near the western boundary of the parish, a little to the south-west of the village of Ewenny, there is a very copious spring, locally called "The Shew Well," but usually designated by tourists "Ogmore Spring:" it issues from three different apertures in the limestone rock, and the waters, uniting immediately on their emission, at first occupy a space about fifteen yards wide, but are soon contracted to a current seven yards wide and one foot deep, and, at the distance of between thirty and forty yards from their source, fall into the river Ewenny. It has been asserted that this is a part of that river, which enters a subterraneous channel a short distance above; but the different properties of the waters of these confluent springs are sufficient evidence in disproof: the two eastern are exceedingly cold, and, in washing, will curdle soap like an acid; the water of the other is of a milder temperature, and will serve for washing as well as rain water. In the cliffs on this part of the coast are some spacious and remarkable excavations, formed by the action of the sea: one of these, of singular appearance, extends for a considerable length in a direction parallel with the coast, and resembles a series of columns rudely formed; another, called the Wind Hole, has penetrated the rocks to a great depth, and is remarkable for some apertures in the ground, through which, in certain states of the tide, the wind rushes upwards with considerable force. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £473. 18.

BRIDE'S (ST.) MINOR, a parish partly in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, and partly in that of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Bridgend, containing 306 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Ogmore, which, after running through it in a southerly direction, unites with the river Ewenny at its influx into the Bristol channel. The lands, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; and the surrounding country, which is in many parts highly picturesque, affords some pleasing mountain scenery and some interesting views. The soil is various, and coal of good quality is found in divers parts of the parish, and is worked with considerable success, affording employment to such of the inhabitants as are not engaged in agriculture. A tram-road from the coal-works in the neighbourhood passes through the parish, and communicates with the Bridgend and Porthcawl rail-road, by means of which the produce of the works is conveyed to its destination. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 6½, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven. The church, dedicated to St. Bride, is a small neat building. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £103. 10.

BRIDES (ST.) SUPER ELY, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Cardiff, containing 128 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very small extent, is situated on the banks of the river Ely, and near the vale of that name, the scenery of which is pleasingly varied. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with the rectory of Michaelston super Ely, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. St. y Nill, the seat of — Jenkins, Esq., is a large house situated within its limits, commanding a fine view over the Vale of Ely. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £62. 12.

BRIDGEND, otherwise PENYBONT AR OGWR, a market town, partly in the parish of COYTY, and partly in that of NEWCASTLE, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 20 miles (W. by N.) from Cardiff, and 179 (W.) from London. The population is returned with the different parishes, the various portions in which also support their respective poor. This town, the name of which is of obvious etymology, is pleasantly situated, about three-quarters of a mile to the north of the turnpike road from Cardiff to Swansea, on the banks of the river Ogmere, which divides it into two parts, the hamlet of Oldcastle occupying its eastern, and that of Newcastle its western, bank, and over which there are two bridges of stone, one of them an elegant modern structure of three arches, forming an ornamental entrance from the west. It stands in a beautiful and fertile district, nearly in the centre of the county, and consists of one irregular street, containing some excellent shops, with several handsome dwelling-houses in the environs: it is neither paved nor lighted, but well supplied with water, and has been much improved of late years, by the erection of several good houses, and by modernizing the old ones. There are no fixed amusements, but concerts and dramatic performances occasionally take place at the town-hall. An act of parliament has recently been obtained for constructing a new line of road from the town to a place called Pant y Brocastle, by which the distance from Cowbridge will be shortened one mile, and the nearest and least hilly road from Cardiff to Swansea brought through the town. A large woollen manufactory was established here, about the commencement of the present century, by several gentlemen of the county, both to encourage industry among the inhabitants, and to provide a home market for the wool produced in the vicinity; but this scheme has failed to freeze the expectations of its promoters. Contiguous to the town are some quarries of excellent freestone, the produce of which resembles the Portland-stone, to which it is not much inferior. A rail-road from the iron-works at Maes Teg to the little harbour of Porthcawl, a distance of sixteen miles, has recently been completed, and, with the improvement of the harbour itself, is said to have cost about £100,000. In connexion with this is a branch railway, commencing near the village of Cevn Gribbwr, in the parish of Laleston, on the line of the former, and extending four miles and a half, in an eastern direction, to the vicinity of Bridgend: it is intended principally to facilitate the transmission of coal from the large works on the line of the Dyfryn Llynvi and Porthcawl rail-road to this town and its vicinity, and to open a communication between the latter and the harbour of Porthcawl, which is a creek to the port of Swansea, and is usually considered the shipping-place for Bridgend, from which it is five miles distant. The market is on Saturday, and is noted for the sale of corn, which is pitched in the market-place; it is also abundantly supplied with provisions, which are sold at reasonable prices. The fairs are on Holy Thursday, or Ascension-day, and November 17th, chiefly for the sale of cattle and cheese. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here every Saturday; and here also the election of the parliamentary representative for the county takes place. The town-hall is a neat structure, standing in the middle of the town, where the elections are held, and other local business is transacted.

In that part of the town which is in the parish of Coyty, forming the hamlet of Oldcastle, is the chapel of Nolton, which is a chapel of ease to Coyty, where divine service is regularly performed; and in that part which is in the hamlet and parish of Newcastle is situated the church of that parish. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians: that for the Unitarians, with another in the parish of Bettws, belonging to the same sect, is endowed with lands and money, amounting to about £40 per annum chiefly by the ancestors of that distinguished divine, moralist, and political writer, Dr. Richard Price, who was born at Tynon, in the neighbouring parish of Bettws, in 1723. A National school, in which one hundred children of both sexes are instructed, is supported principally by the liberality of the Rt. Hon. Sir John Nicholl, and his family, aided by a charity sermon and some private subscriptions. A savings' bank and a dispensary have been erected with part of a sum arising from the unappropriated fractional parts of dividends, which amounted to £800; the dispensary, for the distribution of medicines and advice gratis among the poor of the adjoining parishes, not receiving parochial relief, is supported by subscriptions, usually amounting to £100 per annum. The hamlets of Oldcastle and Newcastle derived their names from two fortresses, probably erected by some of the early Norman invaders of Glamorgan, to secure their newly-acquired possessions from the attacks of the native chieftains, to which they were for a long time exposed: that which gave name to the former stood near the present chapel of Nolton, the tithe barn having been subsequently erected on part of its site, and appears to have been dependent upon the neighbouring castle of Coyty; while the other occupied a commanding situation on a precipitous eminence above the church. George Cadogan Morgan, nephew of Dr. Price, and classical tutor and lecturer on natural philosophy in the dissenting academy at Hackney in Middlesex, was a native of this place: he published two volumes of Lectures on Electricity, and a small work on education, entitled "Directions for the use of a Scientific Table in the collection and application of Knowledge," and communicated to the Royal Society a valuable paper, under the title of "Observations and Experiments on the light of bodies in a state of combustion," which was published in the seventy-fifth volume of the Philosophical Transactions: he died at Southgate, near London, in 1798.

BRISKEDWIN (PRYSG-EDWIN), a joint hamlet with Tir yr brenkin, in the parish of LLANDEILO, hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Swansea. The population is included in the return for Tir yr brenkin. It is situated on the western declivity of some elevated ground, which lies between the road from Swansea to Pont ar Dulas and the river Loughor.

BRITHDIR, a chapelry in the parish of GELLYGAER, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.E. by E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 792 inhabitants. This place, which is situated in a rich mineral district, has, within the last ten years, nearly doubled its population. This increase may be attributed to the establishment of the extensive iron-works on the estate of the Marquis of Bute, and to the collieries and other public works in the immediate vicinity, of which a more detailed account is given in the article on the parish of Gellygaer. The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Romney, and the surrounding scenery, like that of the entire parish, combines numerous interesting features and a pleasing variety of picturesque and romantic beauty. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Gellygaer, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff. The chapel is a neat plain edifice, appropriately fitted up. At a short distance is a rude erect stone, about nine feet high, a monument of some remote period of antiquity, of which there are other remains in the vicinity.

BRITHDIR, a township in the parish and upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish. One-fourth of the tithes of this township belongs to Sir W. W. Wynne, Bart.

BRITON-FERRY, a parish in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. W. by S.) from Neath, containing 416 inhabitants. This place, called in the Welsh language Llansawyl, derives its name from an ancient ferry over the river Neath, established here from time immemorial, and communicating with the opposite shore, from which there is an agreeable ride over Cremlyn Burrows to Swansea. The Neath here expands into a channel of considerable breadth, and falls into Swansea bay, a little below the harbour: the navigation has, within the last few years, been greatly improved, at an expense exceeding £4000, raised by subscription among the proprietors of the coal, copper, and iron works in the neighbourhood, and of other persons interested in the trade and prosperity of the town of Neath, to which place the river has been rendered safely navigable for ships of two hundred and fifty tons' burden. The Neath canal, which passes through a district abounding with mineral wealth, terminates at this place, after a course of about fourteen miles: the wharfs are at a place called Giant's Grave, where upwards of sixty thousand tons of coal and culm are shipped annually. It has been for some time in contemplation to construct a bridge over the river at this place, and to make a road across the Burrows to Swansea, by which a distance of seven or eight miles in the present route of the mail would be saved, and the merchants of that thriving and opulent town would gain two hours in the arrival and departure of the post. At present, persons on horseback and on foot save this distance between Swansea and the eastern part of the county by crossing Briton Ferry, the fare of which is one penny for each man and the same for each horse. Nothing can surpass the beauty of this sequestered spot; embosomed in hills of picturesque and romantic appearance, skirted by shady woods, fertile vales, and luxuriant meadows, the scenery is strikingly beautiful and richly diversified: in some parts there are fine views of the sea, from which the woods appear to arise. The atmosphere is mild and temperate, and the air soft and salubrious: the arbutus, the myrtle, the magnolia, and other exotics grow luxuriantly in the open air, and the environs abound with the richest verdure and most luxuriant foliage. The advantages of its situation, and the favourable opportunities for sea-bathing, may at no distant period render this the favourite resort of families who are fond of retirement, and of invalids whose state of health requires the benefit of a temperate climate. Hitherto the accommodation for visitors has been extremely deficient; but since the Vernon Arms, a house of great respectability on the banks of the river, has been conducted by the present tenant, every regard is paid to the comfort of families, for whose use suitable apartments have been provided, and who may be boarded upon terms as reasonable as in a private family. Attached to the building is excellent stabling, with lock-up coach-houses, and every requisite for their entire accommodation. The mansion house of Briton-Ferry, which for many generations was the property and residence of the Mansels, one of the most ancient families in this county, is a spacious building, adapted more to comfort and family accommodation, than remarkable for magnificence of character: the situation commands extensive marine views, and prospects over a tract of country richly cultivated and abounding with objects of interest. The Briton-Ferry estate, originally comprising nearly forty thousand acres, distributed through not less than forty parishes in South Wales, was devised to the youngest brother of the Earl of Jersey, on whose death it passed to the present earl, who has reduced it to about eight thousand acres in the immediate vicinity: the mansion has been for some time deserted, and will probably in a short time be taken down, or converted into an inn. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Jersey. The church is a neat structure; and the churchyard, remarkable for its picturesque appearance, has been celebrated in an elegy by the poet Mason, who, with Gray, occasionally visited at Baglan House, then the residence of the Rev. William Thomas. The Earl of Jersey pays £5 per annum towards the instruction of four poor children, and the Countess gives £10 per annum to be laid out in the purchase of flannel, and distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £149. 19.

BROADLANE, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Hawarden, containing 47 inhabitants. Hawarden Castle, the seat of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart., is situated in this township, and is further described in the account of the parish.

BRONCASTELLAN (BRON-CASTELLAN), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (E.) from Aberystwith, containing 144 inhabitants. This place occupies a rugged and mountainous district near the foot of the Plynlimmon mountain, and the road from Llanidloes to Aberystwith passes through it. It is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure being £8. 16.

BRONGWYN (BRYN-GWYN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. N. W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, on the road from Llanbedr, through Atpar, to Cardigan, containing 396 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which implies the White Mount, is pleasantly situated near the beautiful vale of Teivy, of which, in some places, it commands a fine prospect. Abercery, the property of T. Parry Thomas, Esq., is a neat modern villa, beautifully situated, and commanding one of the finest reaches of the Vale of Teivy, including the straggling town of Newcastle-Emlyn, with the venerable ruins of its ancient castle, and much richly varied scenery. The parish is enclosed, and the land in a good state of cultivation and tolerably productive. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed, with that of Bettws-Evan, to the vicarage of Penbryn, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Independents. Near the church is a very strong intrenchment, called the Gaer, a name common to fortifications of this description, of which there are many in this part of the principality. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £130. 15.

BRONINGTON, a township in the parish of HANMER, hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 729 inhabitants. It is assessed separately for the maintenance of its poor: the average annual expenditure is £318. 8.

BRONLLÛS, or BRYNLLYS (BRWYNLLÛS), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Hay, on the road to Brecknock, containing 286 inhabitants. The village occupies a pleasant situation at no great distance from the river Llyvni, or Llynvi, and, though poor and inconsiderable, derives some historical importance from its ancient castle, which, occupying the summit of an artificial mount on the banks of the Llyvni, appears to have been designed to protect the pass of that river, and to communicate with the strong post at Dinas, about three miles to the south. Its origin is involved in impenetrable obscurity: Mr. King, in his "Munimenta Antiqua," is of opinion that it was built in the period between the landing of Julius Cæsar and the reign of the Emperor Claudius, from a Syrian model introduced by the Phœnicians who traded to Cornwall, in which county a similar tower is still standing at Launceston. But, although its remains bear evidence of great antiquity, so remote an origin as this may reasonably be doubted: from its close resemblance to some of the early eastern towers, it is not improbable that it was built by the Normans from models which they had seen abroad when engaged in the crusades. The first historical notice of it is in the reign of Henry I., by whom it was granted, together with the castle of Llandovery, to Richard Fitz-Pons: it afterwards passed into the noble families of de Clifford, Giffard, de Bohun, and Stafford, and, on the attainder of Stafford, the last Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VIII., escheated to the crown. Towards the latter part of the twelfth century it was greatly damaged by an accidental fire; and Mahel, the grand-nephew of Bernard Newmarch, and lord of Brecknock, who was noted only for his inhumanity, being at the time on a visit to Walter de Clifford, met his death by the falling of a stone upon his head, whilst the fire was raging. The venerable remains of the castle consist principally of one lofty circular tower, about twenty-five feet in diameter, of great solidity, and built with small hewn stones. Although a breach, level with the ground outside, appears to have been made in the wall of the tower, the original entrance was at some distance from the ground, and was probably approached by a flight of wooden steps: the arches of this doorway, and of most of the windows, are each rudely formed of two inclined stones. At the eastern extremity of the parish a substantial bridge, called Pontithel, has been erected over the Llyvni, which river after flowing through the parish, falls into the Wye near Glâsbury. The handsome mansion of Pontywal, the property of Mrs. Clarke, formerly belonged to the Howards, a Roman Catholic family of some note in this county: in the old portion of the house are the remains of what appears to have been a chapel, and under the more modern parts were all the appearances of a place of burial: this estate was purchased, about the year 1750, by the late Evan Hughes, Esq., who was high sheriff of the county in 1754, from whom it passed to his niece, and is now entailed upon her granddaughters after the decease of Mrs. Clarke. In this parish is an old family mansion, called Trêvithel, from Ithel, King of Gwent, as it is said, who was slain by the men of Brycheiniog, about the year 846: it is now occupied as a farm-house.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of Walter Devereux Wilkins, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice, adjoining the village, with a detached tower standing at its north-eastern angle, in which are five bells. There is a table of benefactions in the church, from which it appears that the sum of £10 was given by an unknown benefactor, to be vested for the benefit of the poor; and £1. 4. per annum, by will of Mrs. Sybil Williams, of Trêvithel, in 1761; and that the rectorial tithes of BronllÛs, Llandevelle, and Crickadarn, were charged by the Rev. D. Williams, of Stapleford, in the county of Hertford, with the payment of forty shillings per annum for the poor of BronllÛs. In a field called Croeslechau, on the farm of Brÿn y groes, in this parish, is a small cromlech, under part of which grows a white thorn, which, it is said, has gradually raised the covering, or horizontal, stone several inches out of its original position. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £222. 3.

BROUGHTON, a joint township with Brymbo, in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, containing 1266 inhabitants. This township and its vicinity abound with rich and extensive mines of coal, lead and iron ore, &c., and various establishments, on a very large scale, have for a considerable number of years been employed in working them. Those which belonged to the late John Wilkinson, Esq., a man of great enterprise, skill, and industry, occupy a spacious plot of ground, and comprise forges, and slitting, rolling, and stamping mills, together with a complete cannon and mortar foundry, from which not only the English government, but those of several of the continental states, were at one time supplied. But this branch of manufacture having declined, they have since been principally employed in casting wheels, bars for rail-roads, cylinders, rollers, and pipes of different dimensions for conduits, pumps, &c., and in manufacturing and rolling sheet iron, and converting the plates into furnaces, boilers for steam-engines, &c. The iron-ore is chiefly procured in the adjacent hills, and conveyed to the foundries erected near the coal-works, where, by the aid of a steam-engine, and the double blast furnace, first used here, it is quickly converted into pigs. The coal-pits vary in depth from one to two hundred yards, and the coal is raised by steam-engines, of which there are several in the vicinity, besides additional over-shot wheels, employed in the various works. The Brymbo iron and coal works were for several years discontinued, having been the subject of a suit in Chancery; but they have recently re-commenced operation on an extensive scale. Thomas Earl of Arundel, by charter granted in 1410, gave the inhabitants of Holt permission to dig for coal and turf in this place. That remarkable monument of Saxon industry, Clawdd Offa, or Offa's Dyke, passes through this township, crossing near Brymbo Hall, where it has been levelled for the formation of rail-roads in connexion with the collieries and iron-works: in levelling a portion of it, a great quantity of the bones of horses, in a state of excellent preservation, and horse-shoes of rude workmanship, were found. This place supports its own poor pursuant to an arrangement made in 1830.

BROUGHTON, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Hawarden, containing 397 inhabitants. According to Mr. Pennant, this place was held, prior to the Conquest, by one Levenot, a freeman; and after that period it was possessed, under the name of Brochetune, by Robert de Roelent, or Rhuddlan, who held it under Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and who had also a manor here, once owned by a Saxon named Ulmer. Part of the Warren mountain, in this township, was enclosed pursuant to an act of parliament obtained in 1798. A chapel has been erected here, which is a chapel of ease to the rectory of Hawarden.

BRYMBO, a joint township with Broughton, in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wrexham, containing 1116 inhabitants. There are extensive collieries and iron-works in Brymbo and its vicinity, which are more fully described in the article on BROUGHTON.

BRYN-CAREDIG, a joint township with Maesmaencymro, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Ruthin. The population is returned with the parish. In the years 1813 and 1814, a portion of land in the vicinity of this place was planted by W. M. Thackeray, Esq., M.D., and the trees are now in a flourishing condition.

BRYNCROES (BRYN - CROES), a parish partly in the hundred of GAFLOGION, but principally in that of COMMITMAEN, Llein division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 11 miles (W. by S.) from Pwllheli, containing 910 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Sochan: the parish, which is entirely agricultural, contains about three thousand acres of land, the whole of which is enclosed. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with a rent-charge of £7 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of C. G. Wynne, Esq. The church is a small edifice in good repair, and is appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners. A tenement in this parish was left some years ago, the rental of which, now about £7, is appropriated towards the support of a master for teaching poor children to read Welsh: there is no school-room, and the children, now twenty in number, are taught in the church. The rent of another tenement, amounting to £9 per annum, is paid to a schoolmaster, who keeps a school here, every fourth year, in turn with Aberdaron, Rhiw, and Llanvaelrhÿs. An ancient chapel, called Tŷ Vair, or "St. Mary's Chapel," formerly stood near the church; in the vicinity of which also are Fynnon Vair, "St. Mary's Well," and Cae Vair, "St. Mary's Field." A kistvaen, or stone coffin, in which was an urn containing burnt bones and ashes, was discovered, some years ago, on the grounds of Tŷ Mawr, in this parish; and near a house called Monachtŷ there was formerly a cromlech. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £362. 18.

BRYN-EGLOWYS, a parish in the hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W.) from Llangollen, containing 450 inhabitants. This parish is situated among mountains of various elevation, and characterized by boldness of scenery. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is a small edifice, having no claim to architectural notice. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mr. J. Jones bequeathed a rent-charge of £6, payable out of the estate of Tŷ yn y Wern, for the instruction of poor children of the parish; at present ten boys derive benefit from this endowment. Near Plâs yn Yale, in the mountainous part of the parish, is a copious spring, possessing precisely the same properties as the water of Holywell, and producing the mosses Jungermannia Asplenioides, and Conferva Gelatinosa, the fragrance of which is more powerful than that of the mosses of St. Winifred's well. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £277. 16.

BRÛN-GWÛN, a parish in the hundred of PAINS-CASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. N.W.) from Hay, containing 364 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the small river Garrow, or Arrow, and contains some large tracts of fertile and productive land in a good state of cultivation, and a considerable portion of common, part of which is a turbary, called Rhôs Gôch, producing very fine peat, which is dug to the depth of fifteen feet from the surface. Beneath the peat are strata of blue clay and of a clay of a yellow hue, the latter abounding with sea shells, which crumble on the slightest touch: the layer is about two feet in depth, and appears to be incumbent on water, which rises up through the fissures occasionally made with the spade, and soon fills the whole cavity. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £11. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, consists of a nave and chancel, but is not distinguished by any architectural features deserving of notice. Richard Jones, in 1706, and an unknown benefactor, gave each a portion of land, directing the rental to be distributed among the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £204. 3.

BRÛN-UCHEL, a joint township with Tavolog, in the parish of CEMMES, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, containing, with Tavolog, 395 inhabitants.

BRÛN Y BEIRDD, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 379 inhabitants. A farm-house in this hamlet, called Cwrt BrÛn y Beirdd, is supposed to occupy the site of an ancient Bardic residence. Within a short distance is the source of the river Loughor, which rises in a full stream out of a rock; and contiguous thereto is a natural cavern of considerable extent, which has not yet been fully explored: in some parts it is so narrow as scarcely to admit the passage of a single person, and in others it expands into capacious recesses, exhibiting a variety of curious and beautiful petrifications. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £62. 4.

BUILTH, or LLANVAIR-YN-MUALLT, a market town and parish (anciently a borough), in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (N.) from Brecknock, and 170 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 1034 inhabitants. The proper name of this parish, both as applied by the native inhabitants, and as used in legal documents from the earliest times, is Llanvair yn Muallt, or "St. Mary's in Builth." The name Builth, by which the place is more commonly known, and which is more correctly written Buallt or Muallt, implying a "land of bosage used for pasture," and more especially for the pasture of oxen, is with strict propriety applied generally to the territory within which the town is situated, and is derived from the Welsh Bu, "an ox," and Allt, "a wooded eminence," at once descriptive of the face of the country and the use to which it was appropriated. The origin of the town is involved in very great obscurity: some writers, judging from the course of the Roman road from Deva, now Chester, to Bannium, near Brecknock, and strengthened in their opinion by the resemblance of the names, have fixed the Roman station Bullaum Silurum at this place. But, though a Roman road may have passed by Builth, and some military post have been established in the neighbourhood, no remains have been discovered to corroborate such an opinion; and many writers, of respectable authority, altogether deny that any part of the present county of Brecknock was ever comprehended within the ancient province of Siluria. The present town appears to have arisen subsequently to the erection of a castle here, probably by the Norman invaders of this part of the principality, under the command of Bernard Newmarch, about the year 1098. The first historical notice of this place occurs in an account of the marriage of Maud, second daughter of Milo Fitz-Walter, Lord of Brecknock, to Philip de Breos, one of Bernard's followers, who, having attacked and conquered the territories of Elystan GlodrhÛdd, which bordered on the river Wye, established in them the lordship of Builth, from which circumstance he is designated, in the account of his marriage above referred to, "Lord of Builth, which he obtained by conquest." Frequent mention of this castle occurs in the annals of South Wales, but its history is nevertheless very imperfectly known; and neither the name of its founder, nor the exact time of its erection, has been precisely ascertained. The lordship of Builth descended, together with the lordships of Brecknock and Hay (the latter in right of his mother), to William, son of Philip de Breos, upon whose subsequent attainder they became forfeited to the crown.

King John restored part of the vast possessions of that nobleman to his son, Giles de Breos, Bishop of Hereford, but retained in his own possession the remainder, in which were included the lordship and castle of Builth. These, however, the bishop soon after recovered, and took possession of all the ancient estates of his family, which were subsequently confirmed to him by the king. Giles was succeeded in them by his younger brother, Reginald de Breos, who, in 1221, being besieged in his castle at Builth by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, despatched messengers to Henry III., to apprise him of his danger; and that monarch, coming to his assistance, compelled Llewelyn to raise the siege and retire. After the death of Reginald, who had married a daughter of Llewelyn's, the lordship of Builth and his other possessions descended to his eldest son, William de Breos, by a former marriage; and this nobleman, preferring the English interest, notwithstanding his father's connexion with the family of Llewelyn, remained a steadfast adherent to the government of Henry III., and became involved in the wars which that monarch carried on against the Welsh, in one of which he was made prisoner by Llewelyn, to whom the lordship of Builth, with a large sum of money, was given for his ransom. The castle having, after the death of William, reverted to the English crown, was held under Prince Edward by Sir Roger Mortimer, who was appointed governor; but during his absence on a summons to attend the English parliament, in 1260, it was surprised in the night by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, who attacked it on pretence that Sir Roger Mortimer, contrary to his oath, had violated the neutrality which he had promised to observe, and supported the English cause. The conduct of Mortimer upon this occasion gave great umbrage, on the other hand, to the English government; and being suspected, from his near affinity to Llewelyn, of partiality to the interests of that prince, he was summoned before the English council, by whom he was fully acquitted of any participation or connivance in the loss of the castle, though much to the dissatisfaction of Prince Edward, who formally entered his protest against the decision of that assembly.

In 1282, this town and its neighbourhood were the scene of the last struggles for Welsh independence, to which a period was finally put by the death of the gallant and unfortunate Llewelyn, the last of the native sovereigns of Wales: to this melancholy catastrophe, the inhabitants of this town and neighbourhood are accused of having materially contributed, either by their cowardice, or by their treachery. No two writers give the same account of this melancholy event; some authorities representing the castle to have been at that time in the possession of the Welsh prince, and others in that of the English monarch, with whose subjects in the marches Llewelyn is said to have held a treasonable correspondence; but all concur in stating that the object of his visit to South Wales, after the brilliant success which had attended his arms at the Menai straits, was to hold a conference with some of the chieftains in this district. Llewelyn, for this purpose, came to Aberedw, about four miles below this town, where he had a castle or mansion, and there passed the night. During his stay he was alarmed by the approach of the enemy, who had received intelligence of his movements and present situation; and, being nearly surrounded by the forces of the English, under the command of Sir Edmund Mortimer and John Giffard (who had marched from Herefordshire, or, according to other writers, only from Builth, to surprise him), he, as is commonly stated, caused his horse's shoes to be reversed, in order to mislead his pursuers by their impressions on the snow, which then covered the ground. This stratagem, however, being treacherously discovered to the English, by Madoc Gôch Min Mawr, the blacksmith whom Llewelyn had employed, a pursuit was commenced. Llewelyn fled towards Builth, crossing the bridge over the Wye, which he caused to be demolished, before his pursuers came up, who were, consequently, compelled to return to a ford eight miles lower down on the river, where they effected a passage. Meanwhile Llewelyn had sought succour from the garrison at Builth, which being refused, either from dread of the presence of an English force, or from treachery, he led his party westward up the vale of Irvon, and crossed that river a little above Llanynis church, by a bridge called Pont y Coed, where he stationed his men. The English, on coming up, made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain possession of the bridge; and discovering a ford at a short distance, a small party of them secretly crossed it, and falling upon the Welsh unawares, put them to the rout. The Welsh prince was slain in a small dell, since called Cwm Llewelyn, or "Llewelyn's dingle," a short distance from the scene of action, by one Adam de Francon, who, ignorant of his quality, immediately joined his countrymen in the pursuit; but returning, probably for the sake of plunder, he discovered that his victim was the Prince of Wales, and on his person he found a letter in cypher and his privy seal. He then cut off his head, which he sent to the King of England, then at Aberconway; and the body, being afterwards dragged a short distance from the spot, was buried on the banks of the Irvon, in a place since called Cevn bedd Llewelyn, "the ridge of Llewelyn's grave." The conduct of the inhabitants of Builth, in thus refusing shelter to the last of the native sovereigns of the principality, in this expiring struggle for liberty, has procured for them the opprobrious appellation of Bradwyr Buallt, or the "Traitors of Builth."

John Giffard, who had distinguished himself in this last engagement, was appointed governor of the castle of Builth, under the crown, as appears from the records in the Exchequer: this office he continued to hold till the 25th or 26th of Edward I.; but, towards the close of the reign of Edward II., the castle and lordship of Builth were either granted to Roger Mortimer, Earl of Wigmore, or, having been restored to the family of de Breos, were obtained by that nobleman on his marriage with Maud, daughter of the third William de Breos: from this time they remained in the possession of that family, till the attainder of the last Earl of March, when they again reverted to the crown, to which they continued an appendage till the reign of Charles I. In the year 1691, the town was nearly destroyed by an accidental fire, which broke out on the 20th of December, in that year: the loss sustained by the sufferers who applied for relief under this calamity was estimated at £10,780, and by persons of more independent property, who did not make application for assistance, about £2000 more. Letters patent were granted by the crown, authorising the distressed inhabitants to gather alms from charitably disposed persons throughout the kingdom, and, under this authority, a few hundred pounds were collected; but the money was so misapplied that only one house in the town was rebuilt from that fund. In this instrument, which is illumined with the portraits of King William and Queen Mary, and with the arms of England, Scotland, Ireland and France, highly emblazoned, it is stated that "the fire raged for five hours, and that, from the boisterousness of the winds, it consumed the dwellings of forty-one substantial families, with all their corn, furniture, effects and merchandizes, to the great impoverishment of the adjacent country, and decay of trade, it being a very considerable market town, and having no other market kept within ten miles of it."

The present town is romantically situated on the river Wye, the banks of which, throughout the whole of its varied course, are crowned with picturesque beauty: it is irregularly built, consisting principally of two streets, which, meeting in an acute angle, unite and afterwards extend for a considerable distance along the road leading to Llandovery. Several neat houses occupy the space between the river and the churchyard, nearly parallel with the course of the former, over which is a handsome stone bridge of six arches, connecting the counties of Brecknock and Radnor, and erected in 1770, at their joint expense: there are also some well-built houses of respectable appearance in detached situations. The surrounding scenery is eminently distinguished for its richly diversified and highly picturesque character: the adjoining hills, in some places approaching to mountainous elevation, are interspersed with groves of thriving plantations, alternated with lofty and boldly projecting masses of rock, overhanging the river; and others, clothed with flourishing timber from the base to the summit, combine, with partial appearances of sterility and rugged grandeur, the softer and more pleasing features of cultivation and verdure. The approach to Builth from Brecknock is exceedingly interesting; the contrast between the high state of cultivation in the vicinity of the town, and the barren mountains which are traversed in approaching it, is peculiarly striking; the prospect being adorned with the meandering course of the Wye, a variety of beautiful scenery in the foreground, and a long range of mountains in the distance, which, although lofty, present a soft and delicate outline. The soil around the town is very superior to that in the remainder of the hundred: the lands are enclosed, and in an excellent state of cultivation; and the climate is milder, and the crops are earlier than in other parts of the county. Owing to the improvements recently made in the high roads, this town now occupies a situation on the direct line of communication between North and South Wales; and, from the numerous other local advantages which it possesses, it is capable of great improvement. The Wye, and its several tributary streams, by which it is amply supplied with water, abound with excellent trout; and, within a mile and a half of the town, there are some excellent mineral springs, combining the medicinal properties of those at Llanwrtyd and Llandrindod. These springs are situated about half a mile from the banks of the Wye, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Bryn-Pabuan, and within a mile and a half of this town; but though, from their well-established reputation, they would be a powerful attraction to visitors, yet no more than three or four houses in the town or neighbourhood are found which offer any accommodation or encouragement to visitors, of whom many leave the town in disappointment. The market, which is very numerously attended, is on Monday; and fairs, which are much frequented, are annually held on June 27th, October 2nd, and December 6th, for the sale of agricultural produce and wares. It is in contemplation to erect a commodious market-house, near the bridge, on a piece of ground belonging to E. D. Thomas, of Wellfield House, Esq., and also a small lock-up house for the confinement of petty offenders, with apartments for the constables. This place is said to have been anciently a borough, and to have received a charter of incorporation from its Norman lords, and in all ancient documents the inhabitants were styled the "Burgesses of Builth;" but they at present enjoy no municipal privileges, and the town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. Two petty constables are appointed at the court leet of the lord of the manor, held annually at Maescynfordd, in this hundred.

The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Llanddewi'r Cwm annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the alternate patronage of — Pocock, and Bell Price, Esqrs. The tithes of these consolidated parishes formerly belonged to the priory of Brecknock, upon the dissolution of which they were purchased by Sir John Price, and continued for some time in the possession of his heirs, but many years ago they were purchased by Richard Price, Esq., of Knighton. Attached to the living are nineteen acres of glebe land, and half an acre of garden ground; but the parsonage-house fell into decay more than a century ago, and has not since been rebuilt. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and, with the exception of the ancient tower, rebuilt in the year 1793, at the expense of the parishioners, is a neat plain structure: within the chancel are the remains of a monument, with the mutilated effigy of John Lloyd, of Towey, Esq.; and on a brass plate in the north wall just above it is an inscription, setting forth that he was a servant to Queen Elizabeth, whose father he had also served in Scotland and other places, and that he was the first sheriff and justice of peace that ever dwelt in this lordship after the division of Wales into counties. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Thomas Prichard, a native of this town, who had acquired an ample fortune in London by trade, in 1752, bequeathed £1800 New South Sea annuities to certain trustees, to apply the dividends annually to such charitable purposes, for the benefit of this parish, as they and the principal inhabitants should deem most beneficial. In 1759, a bill, in the nature of an information, was filed by the Attorney-General to establish this will; and in 1760, the money was directed to be laid out in the building of a school-house, the payment of a master's salary, and the placing out of apprentices; any remaining surplus to be applied to the relief of the poor. No school-house was erected under this decree; but a very good building for the purpose has been erected by voluntary subscription of the parishioners, on a piece of ground let by the late Thomas Price, Esq., on lease, at a pepper-corn rent. The income arising from this bequest is £57 per annum, to which has been added £5 per annum, the interest of £100 bequeathed by the Rev. Benjamin Lawrence, in the year 1829, and now secured on mortgage. Of these united sums, £36 per annum is paid to a schoolmaster, for teaching thirty-six boys, and £12 per annum to a mistress for teaching twelve girls: £5 per annum is paid to a clerk for managing the business of the charity, and the remainder is expended in the necessary repairs of the building, and in providing books for the use of the scholars. There is no surplus for distribution among the poor, nor will the funds, after defraying the expenses of the school, afford anything for the apprenticing of children. Margaret Powell, in 1715, bequeathed £20, due to her upon the mortgage of a tenement called Hëngwm, to the poor of the parish.

Of the ancient castle the only remains, occupying a gentle eminence above the river Wye, are a small fragment of the north wall, which appears to have been of unusual strength and thickness, though the quality of the stone was not very durable: the deep trenches by which it was surrounded still show the original form and extent of this once important fortress, which commanded the river, over which was originally a bridge, nearly opposite to it. The keep was on the summit of a steep conical mound, fifty yards in circumference at the base, and entirely surrounded with a deep moat. The state apartments and other buildings were chiefly on the south-west side, where an outer moat communicates with the inner moat by a deep cut: both of these trenches appear to have been occasionally filled with water, for the better defence of the fortress. The circuit of the whole is about three hundred and fifty paces. On a precipitous eminence, rising from the bank of the river Irvon, at a short distance from its junction with the Wye, is a mound of earth, which is said to have been anciently the site of a mural fortress, called Castell Caer Beris; but nothing either of its origin or history is known, and the only memorials existing at present are the name and the site. About a mile to the west of the town is a small brook, called Nant yr Arian, or the "Money brook," from the circumstance of its having been a place of guarded intercourse between the inhabitants and the country people during the prevalence of the plague in the town. At that time the people of the adjoining districts are said to have deposited at this place the provisions with which they supplied the town, and the inhabitants to have thrown their money into the brook, that it might not communicate the infection. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £304. 8.

BURLINJOBB, a joint township with Old Radnor, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{4}$  miles (S. E. by E.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with the parish. The Kington railway commences at the lime-works in this township, proceeds westward to Castle Weir, and then southward until it joins the Hay railway: it was formed under an act obtained in 1818. The old Roman road from Builth passed between this place and Old Radnor.

BURTON, a township in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Hope, containing 515 inhabitants. In this township, which is situated on the border of Flintshire, stands Burton Hall.

BURTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Pembroke, on the road from that town to Haverfordwest by Burton Ferry, containing 694 inhabitants. This parish is situated on Milford haven, and abounds with scenery in every part interesting and occasionally picturesque. Among the most interesting objects in the vicinity are the remains of Benton castle, on the western shore of the haven, probably erected by some of the Normans, as a border fortress for the protection of the territory which they had acquired on this part of the coast. It does not appear to have been originally of very great extent; and the present ruins, which, from their situation on the margin of an æstuary of Milford haven, have a truly picturesque appearance, consist principally of a lofty round tower, which, rising above the thriving plantations in the vicinity, forms a conspicuous feature in the landscape. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £15. 12. 11., and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor for two turns, and Sir John Owen, Bart., for one; Earl Cawdor presented at the last vacancy, and has also the next presentation. A handsome and commodious parsonage-house was erected by the Rev. D. Bird Allen, the late incumbent. There are two places of worship for Baptists, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. Some trifling benefactions have been made for distribution among the poor, of which the principal is a rent-charge of £3, bequeathed by Mr. Morgan Owen, in 1776, which is annually divided among six poor men and women, in portions of ten shillings each. Burton Ferry, which is also called Pembroke Ferry, is held under the crown. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £170. 15.

BUTTINGTON, called by the Welsh TÂL Y BONT (the end of the bridge), a parish in the hundred of POOL, within the liberties of the borough of WELSH-POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Welshpool, comprising the townships of Clitterwood, Hope, and Trewern, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and containing 775 inhabitants. During the Saxon era this place was called Butdigingtune, and is remarkable as the scene of a desperate battle, in 894, between the Saxons and the Danes. The latter, in one of their landings under their leader Hesten, having traversed the kingdom from east to west, and finding Alfred in pursuit of them with a numerous army, hastily retreated from the western part of England towards Wales, and, being closely pressed by the Saxons, intrenched themselves at this village, where they were actively blockaded by their pursuers, and reduced to such distress as to be obliged to feed upon the flesh of their horses. Impelled by despair and famine, they at length made an attempt to force their way through the Saxon army, when a dreadful carnage ensued, by which most of them were slain, and but few escaped to their own country. The village is situated on the road from Welshpool to Shrewsbury, and on the eastern bank of the river Severn, which is crossed by a wooden bridge of considerable antiquity, and, after heavy rains, frequently overflows its banks, which are here very low, and causes great damage to property. Some of the land is very rich and valuable, particularly that lying along the margin of the Severn. The Longmynd and the Breidden hills are partly situated within this parish: the latter are divided into three rocky peaks, called Craig Vreddin (from Bre, an elevation, and Din, a fort, being so named from an ancient British fort which is still visible on its summit), Cevn Cestyll, and Moel y Golva, the last of which is the loftiest and most conical. On the first of these a tall obelisk was erected, in 1781, in commemoration of the distinguished naval services of Admiral Lord Rodney, in the war with France, particularly his defeat of a powerful French armament, under the command of Count de Grasse, in the West Indies: it consists of a circular pillar resting on a square pedestal, and formerly terminating at the top with a ball, which was struck by lightning and has not been replaced; the expense was defrayed by subscription among the gentry in the neighbourhood. The summit of this peak commands pleasing and highly diversified views of the fertile Vale of Severn and the country bordering upon it, the richly cultivated and extensive plain of Salop, with the Cheshire hills, and the principal mountains in North Wales. The rocky sides of these hills present a precipitous escarpment, here and there interspersed with shrubs, whilst their bases are finely skirted with woods. On a small plain to the east, called Crew Green, there is a large isolated rock, denominated Belin Mount, at a short distance from the adjacent hills.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Welshpool, to which parish this was formerly a chapelry, having been separated from it, and made a distinct parish, in 1759. The vicar still enjoys one-fourth part of the great and small tithes, and the remainder belongs to the Earl of Powis, as lessee under the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is built in the early style of English architecture. Vestiges of several British encampments are visible on the rising grounds in this parish, which, from its situation upon the border, was doubtless, in early times, frequently the scene of military operations. That celebrated boundary line, Offa's Dyke, runs through it to a spot near the church, where it disappears for the space of about five miles, the channel of the river Severn probably serving as a continuation to the parish of Llan-drinio, in which it is again seen. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £234. 18.

BWNNEIAID, a township in the parish of ST. HARMON, hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Rhaiadr. The population is returned with the township of Clâs-Garmon. This township consists of a mountainous district in the north-eastern portion of the parish, on the border of Montgomeryshire. The road from Rhaiadr to Llanidloes passes through it.

C.

CACCA-DUTTON (DUTTON CACCA), a township in the parochial chapelry of IS Y COED, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from Wrexham, containing 103 inhabitants. It is of small extent, but is separately assessed for the support of its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £22. 3.

CADER, a joint township with Segroit, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR in KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. by W.) from Denbigh. The population is returned with the parish. From a rocky elevation, by some called Cader Gwladus, or "Gwladus' Chair," and by others Cader yr Arghwyddes, or the "Peeress' chair," a beautiful view of the vale between Denbigh and Ruthin, and the hills rising above it on the east, including also the interesting remains of Denbigh castle, is obtained. At the foot of this rocky height, and imbedded in the limestone of which it is composed, are large masses of silex, which, when broken, are occasionally found to contain agate, jasper, crystallized sulphate of lime, and chalcedony: of these, the agate and chalcedony are pure, and exceedingly beautiful, and are discovered in as great a number and variety as, perhaps, in any other part of the world. This township was formerly conjointly assessed with those of Segroit Isâv and Segroit Uchâv for the maintenance of the poor.

CADOXTON, or LLAN-CATWG, a parish in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N.) from Neath, comprising the hamlets of Blaenhonddan, Coed-frank, Dyfryn-Clydach, Lower Dylas, Upper Dylas, Neath-Genol (or Middle), Lower Neath, Upper Neath, and Ynisymond, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and containing 4536 inhabitants. This extensive parish, which derives its name from St. Catwg, to whom the church is dedicated, is beautifully situated on the north-western bank of the river Neath, along which it extends for a distance of fifteen miles, from its entrance into the county at Pont Neath Vaughan to its influx into the sea below Briton Ferry. It is not less distinguished for its mineral wealth, valuable manufactures, and extensive public works, than for richness and variety of scenery, and the number and elegance of the gentlemen's seats with which it abounds, exclusively of the highly respectable residences of the proprietors of the different works, or their agents. Numerous collieries, besides iron and copper works on a large scale, are carried on within its limits, affording employment to a considerable proportion of the inhabitants. The Neath canal, and the Swansea and Neath junction canal, which unites with the former by means of a handsome stone aqueduct at the village of Dylas, afford every facility for the conveyance of the produce of the mines, and of the various extensive works in the parish, to the shipping-places at Briton Ferry and Swansea: the latter canal is the private property of George Tennant, Esq., of Cadoxton Lodge. Rheola, the seat of John Edwards Vaughan, Esq., is a splendid modern mansion, occupying a delightful situation on the banks of the Neath, and commanding a view of the most admired scenery in the beautiful vale through which that river flows. Dyfryn, the seat of the ancient family of Williams, whose pedigree in the church is noticed below, is situated at the base of a precipitous mountain, near the road leading to Llandilo-Vawr: the family having become extinct in the male line, the property has descended to two females. Cadoxton Lodge, the summer residence of George Tennant, Esq.; Cadoxton Place, the seat of William Powell, Esq.; Court Herbert, the property of the Rev. Mr. Gronow; and Aberpergwm, an ancient seat belonging to William Williams, Esq., are also among the principal residences which are profusely scattered throughout this extensive and highly picturesque portion of the county.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5.11.10 $\frac{1}{2}$ , endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq. The church is a spacious edifice, but not remarkable for any architectural features: it contains several handsome mural tablets, of which two are commemorative of the ancient family of Williams of Dyfryn, one inscribed with a curious acrostic on Mrs. Rose Williams, who died March 24th, 1680, and the other containing the entire pedigree of the family, from Iestyn ab Gwrgan, the last native prince of Glamorgan, in the reign of William Rufus, engraved on several sheets of copper, and concluding with Philip Williams, Esq., who died in 1717. There are two chapels of ease, called Crynant and Aberpergwm chapels. There are various places of worship for dissenters in the parish. The abbey of Neath, a magnificent structure, was founded about the year 1111, by Richard de Granville (who assisted Fitz-Hamon in his conquest of Glamorganshire), for Grey friars, who were afterwards superseded by monks of the Cistercian order. In this monastery Edward of Carnarvon, after his escape from Caerphilly castle, took refuge, and remained for some time in security; but the house being threatened with a siege, he was induced to retire, under the conduct of one of the monks, in the hope of reaching his partisans: in this attempt he was, however, frustrated by the treachery of his guide, by whom he was betrayed at Llantrisant castle. Leland describes this house "as the fairest Abbey in all Wales," and the present remains still afford interesting specimens of ancient ecclesiastical architecture. It is situated on the western bank of the river Neath, about a mile from the town of that name, and appears to have been the work of successive periods, and a pile of very great extent, stretching far beyond its present limits. The ruins present a venerable and interesting appearance, but their beauty is greatly disfigured by the smoke of the various works which have been erected near the site: the white stone, from Sutton near Margam in this county, of which the cornices and other ornamental parts are constructed, is perfectly free from the ivy and other parasitical plants by which other portions of the structure are covered. The walls of the Priory house are still in tolerable preservation, and the hall, the refectory, and some of the apartments, may be traced: the remains of the chapel and of the chapter-house are also considerable, and the ruins convey a striking and impressive idea of the grandeur and extent of this once magnificent pile: the revenue at the dissolution was £150. 4. 9. On the summit of the Drymmeu mountain, to the north of Neath abbey, was formerly a kistvaen, five feet long and four feet wide, in which, on its being opened a few years since, were found a heap of bones, and an ancient celt, very much corroded, which is now in the possession of Mrs. Williams, of Dyfryn, to whom, under the late enclosure act, this portion of the waste land was allotted. To the east of this mountain, and just above the village of Dylas, is the Long Mountain, over which is carried the Via Helena, commonly called the Sarn Helen: this ancient road diverges from the Strata Julia Maritima, and crosses the river Neath a little above the present bridge, where it enters the parish; and, taking a north-eastern direction across the mountain towards Crynant, enters the county of Brecknock. The average annual expenditure of the whole of this parish, for the support of the poor, amounts to £1603. 16.

CADOXTON juxta BARRY, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S.W.) from Cardiff, containing 285 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 2. 1., and in the patronage of R. F. Jenner, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cadog, or Catwg. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, by whom a Sunday school is supported. This parish is situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, and contains some strata of limestone, which is burned for manuring the land: here are the remains of an old castle, but very little is known of its history. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £42. 7.

CAEGURWEN, a joint hamlet with Blaenegal, in the parish of LLANGUICKE, hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9½ miles (N.) from Neath. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the border of Carmarthen-shire, where the country is extremely wild and rugged, and near the right bank of the river Twrch.

CAER-EINION-VECHAN, a township in that part of the parish of MALLWYD which is in the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (N.E.) from Machynlleth, containing 139 inhabitants. It is situated on the left bank of the Dovey, and is the only portion of the parish in this county, the remainder being in the county of Merioneth: the district is extremely mountainous.

CAERGWYRLE, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES.—See HOPE.

CAERHËN (CAER-HËN, or CAER-RHUN), a parish in the hundred of LLÛCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Llanrwst, containing 1117 inhabitants. This place is allowed by all antiquaries to have been the Conovium of the Romans. The present name signifies the old town, though tradition derives it from Rhun, a British prince, who in 560 succeeded his father Maelgwyn in the government of North Wales, and carried on a sanguinary and protracted war with the Saxons, during their frequent incursions at that time into the principality. It formed also, at a subsequent period, one of the defences of the country lying beyond the Snowdon mountains against the Saxon invaders of Wales, after the states of the Octarchy had been united into one sovereignty. The parish is pleasantly situated on the western bank of the river Conway, up which the tide flows for three miles above it, rendering that river navigable at spring tides for vessels of one hundred tons' burden. Small quantities of copper-ore and of manganese have been found, but no mines are worked at present. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £4. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice, romantically situated in a sequestered spot within the grounds of Caerhên Hall. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, in the little village of Roe, in this parish. The Rev. Lancelot Bulkeley, in 1718, bequeathed £120 for teaching two poor children of this parish, two of the parish of Llanbedr, and two of the parish of Llangelynin, to read Welsh. William Williams, Esq., and Thomas Williams, Esq., severally bequeathed sums producing together £2. 16. per annum for the instruction of six poor boys in reading English, and in writing: there are also divers small charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. The site of the Roman station and some of the foundation walls may still be discerned upon an eminence a little to the north of the church: it occupied a quadrangular area, each side of which was two hundred and sixty feet in length, and was defended by a slight vallum of earth, and by the steepness of the acclivity on the side towards the Conway, from which river it is about one hundred and sixty-seven yards distant. Among the numerous and interesting relics of Roman antiquity which have been discovered are coins, lamps, vases, and bricks, the last being still frequently turned up by the plough, and on one of which was inscribed "Leg. X." which legion, according to Camden, was stationed here, under the command of Ostorius. In removing the soil from the foundations of this once important city, in 1801, a Roman villa was discovered, consisting of five apartments and a sudatory, in which, among various fragments of broken columns, an amulet of curious workmanship, ornamented with figures in blue enamel, was found; and in 1824 an extensive pottery was discovered, with several perfect specimens of the ware, richly ornamented with figures of men in armour, horses, stags, boars, and dogs, in alto relievo, and of the most vivid colours. Near the church were also found, a cake of copper, weighing forty lb., and bearing an inscription, now in the possession of Sir Edward Mostyn, Bart.; a circular shield of brass, ornamented with rings and studded; and a battle-ax of singular construction, which are in the possession of Mr. Griffith, on whose estate are the remains of this ancient station. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £341. 7.

CAERPHILLY, a market town and chapelry, in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Cardiff, and 159 (W.) from London, on the old turnpike road from Newport to Neath and Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the hamlet of Energlyn. This place was originally called Senghenydd, from St. Cenydd, who is said to have founded a monastery here, of which nothing more is known than what occurs in the Chronicle of Caradoc of Llan-carvan, who records that, "in the year 831, the Saxons of Mercia came unexpectedly in the night, and burnt the monastery of Senghenydd, which stood on a spot where there is now a castle." To the erection of this castle the town, which appears to have been anciently much more extensive than at present, was principally indebted for the importance it held among the towns in this part of the principality. The early history of the castle is involved in very great obscurity, neither the time of its original foundation, nor the name of its founder, having been at all satisfactorily ascertained; and the different names under which this place is spoken of, in the Welsh histories, have contributed materially to perplex the antiquary in his researches. No mention of Caerphilly, by its present name, occurs previously to the time of Henry III.; and the attempt to ascribe to it a Roman origin, from the import of the syllable Caer, rests upon no other foundation than the vast extent of its fortifications, which, however, have been proved to be of much later date; and, therefore, its supposed claim to be considered the Castrum Bullæi of the Romans, from an affinity to the name of that station, which some writers have fancied to exist, appears to be destitute of sufficient testimony for a favourable reception. The original castle was of much smaller extent than the sumptuous edifice which was afterwards erected on its site, and the magnificent and stupendous ruins that now arrest the admiration of the observer are the remains of a structure of still more recent origin, the work of successive periods. In 1215, a Welsh chieftain, named Rhys Vychan, led his forces to this place, intending to attack the castle, which at that time belonged to Reginald de Breos, lord of Brecknock; but the garrison, informed of his approach, set fire to the town, and retired within the walls of the castle, which they prepared resolutely to defend: this probably discouraged the assailants, who did not make any serious attempt upon it. Two years afterwards, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, aided by the princes of Powys and South Wales, succeeded in the reduction of this fortress, but shortly restored it to de Breos: he, however, retook it in the following year, and committed it to the custody of Rhys Vychan, who shortly afterwards, dreading that it might fall into the hands of the lords marcher, who were threatening hostilities, razed it to the ground, together with some others in the neighbouring districts, of which he had the custody. It was rebuilt and more strongly fortified, in 1221, by John de Breos, with the consent of his father-in-law, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, and was besieged and taken by Llewelyn, last prince of North Wales, in 1270: in recording this circumstance, its modern name Caerphilly, of which no satisfactory etymology has been given, occurs for the first time in the Welsh annals. Caerphilly soon afterwards came by purchase into the possession of Gilbert Earl of Clare, who was then lord of Glamorgan; and his widow afterwards conveyed it by marriage to Ralph Mortimer, by whom the castle, almost ruined by repeated attacks, was rebuilt. In 1315, a formidable insurrection broke out in Glamorganshire, under Llewelyn Brên, a descendant of the native lords of Senghenydd, who is said to have mustered a force of ten thousand men, with which he assaulted and took by surprise the fortress of Caerphilly, of which his ancestors had been dispossessed by the Normans under Fitz-Hamon. To suppress this all the forces of the lords marcher were assembled, under the command of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford; and, although the details of the campaign are unknown, the result was the capture of the Welsh chieftain and his two sons, who were sent prisoners to the Tower, where they remained for some time in confinement. In the reign of Edward II., Hugh le Despencer, the favourite of that monarch, being invested with the lordship of Glamorgan, seized upon the estates of the Mortimers, greatly enlarged the castle of Caerphilly, which had belonged to them, and extended and strengthened its fortifications, at a great expense. The injustice of Spencer exciting the indignation of the barons, at that time in revolt against Edward, they placed Roger Mortimer, the rightful heir of these estates, at the head of ten thousand men, with which force he besieged the favourite in his castle; but from the great strength of the fortifications, the number of the garrison, and the ample supply of provisions with which it had been stored, the fortress held out for a long period.

The king, attended by the younger Spencer, being compelled, in 1326, to flee from Bristol, repaired to the castle of Caerphilly, from which he issued divers commissions, dated October 29th of this year, to his military tenants in the county palatine of Pembroke and other parts of South Wales, and to the vassals of the lordship of Glamorgan, enjoining them to take arms in his defence; but, being disappointed in this project, he sought an asylum in the abbey of Neath. Meanwhile the siege of this fortress was conducted with great vigour and perseverance by the queen's forces; and the assailants, having effected a breach in the walls, forced an entrance. Under one of the towers there is said to have been a furnace for melting iron, which was thrown in a fluid state upon the besiegers, who, on forcing an entrance, are supposed to have let out the fused metal, and poured water into the red hot furnace, which exploding with a terrific noise, by the power of the steam thus produced, the tower above was ruptured, and the half of it now remaining was left upwards of eleven feet out of the perpendicular line, supported only by the cement which holds the stones together, and by the depth of its foundations. During the confusion which ensued, the younger Spencer is said (though it is difficult to reconcile the contradictory accounts of this siege) to have rallied the garrison, and prevented the further entrance of the besiegers, of whom a great number of those already within the walls was slain; and, by this sudden turn in his affairs, he was enabled to capitulate on such terms as secured the castle and estate to his son Thomas, who succeeded him: having rejoined the king, they were both made prisoners at or near Llantrisant. The quantity of live stock and provisions which the victors are stated to have found in the castle exceeds credibility, notwithstanding the vast area comprised within its walls. According to an enumeration, which has been copied by nearly all writers on the subject, but which altogether surpasses belief, "there were within the walls two thousand fat oxen, twelve thousand cows, twenty-five thousand calves, thirty thousand sheep, six hundred draught horses, with carts in proportion, and two thousand hogs; of salt provisions, two hundred beeves, six hundred muttons, and one thousand hogs: there were also two hundred tons of French wine, forty tons of cider and wine, the produce of their own estates, with wheat enough to make bread for two thousand men for four years." From this period the castle and manor appear to have belonged to the lords of Glamorgan, whose chief residence being at Cardiff, it is probable that the injury sustained by the fortifications in this siege was never repaired. In the year 1400, Owain Glyndwr invaded this part of the principality, and gained possession of the castle of Caerphilly, which he garrisoned for some time; but no particular event is mentioned during his occupation of it, nor has any thing of importance connected with its subsequent history been recorded.

The town is pleasantly situated in a broad valley, enclosed by mountains, and, in the descent to it from Cardiff, the appearance of the surrounding country is beautifully picturesque, and in many parts characterized by features of grandeur and sublimity. The houses are in general small and neatly built, but without order or regularity, and are occasionally interspersed with dwellings of modern erection and of respectable appearance: the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water from springs which abound in the vicinity. It appears to have been formerly of much greater extent than it is at present, as is evident from the occasional discovery of foundations of buildings in the adjoining fields. At the close of the last century it had dwindled into comparative insignificance, but revived about the commencement of the present, and has since been slowly, but progressively, increasing. Its trade consists principally in the manufacture of woollen cloth, checks for aprons, and linsey-woolsey shirting for miners, in which about one hundred persons are employed. Coal is found in the vicinity, but the mines are worked only for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood; and such of the population as are not engaged in these works are employed in agriculture. The market, which is on Thursday, is well attended, and abundantly supplied with corn, cheese, and provisions of every kind. The fairs are on April 5th, Trinity-Thursday, July 19th, August 25th, October 9th, and November 16th: at these fairs, which are numerous attended, corn, cattle, and cheese, are the principal articles exposed for sale. Caerphilly was anciently a borough, but lost its privileges in the reign of Henry VIII., and is now under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session here for the lower division of the hundred. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Eglwysilan, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant. The chapel, dedicated to St. Martin, is a small neat edifice, rebuilt within the last few years, in the later style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A school for the education of girls, a branch of that founded by Mrs. Ann Aldworth of Bristol, for natives of this parish and that of Bedwas, and endowed with lands for that purpose, has been established here: in it poor girls are gratuitously instructed by a mistress, who receives £35 per annum from the funds of the charity.

The ancient castle of Caerphilly, forming a stupendous and truly magnificent pile, stands contiguous to the town, in a level tract, bounded on the north and south by lofty hills, and expanding into a beautiful vale on the east and west, skirted by the river Rumney on the one side, and on the other by the Taf. The buildings in the several courts, together with a spacious area, were enclosed within a lofty outer wall of great thickness, strengthened with massive buttresses, and defended by square towers at intervals, between which a communication was kept up by an embattled corridor. In the outer court were the barracks for the garrison, and from it was an entrance through a magnificent gateway, flanked by two massive hexagonal towers, leading by a drawbridge over the moat into an inner ward, from which was an eastern entrance into the court that contained the state apartments, by a massive gateway, strongly defended with portcullises, of which the grooves are still remaining: the western entrance to this court was also over a drawbridge, through a splendid arched gateway, defended by two circular bastions of vast dimensions. This court, in which were the superb ranges of state apartments, is seventy yards in length and forty in width, enclosed on the north side by a lofty wall strengthened with buttresses, and in the intervals pierced with loop-holes for the discharge of missiles, and on the other sides by the buildings and the towers which guarded the entrances. The great hall, on the south side of this quadrangle, is in a state of tolerable preservation, and retains several vestiges of its ancient grandeur: this noble apartment was seventy feet in length, thirty feet wide, and seventeen feet high, and was lighted by four lofty windows of beautiful design, of which the ogee-headed arches, richly ornamented with fruit and foliage, are finely wrought in the decorated style of English architecture: between the two central windows are the remains of a large fire-place, of which the mantle is highly embellished in beautiful and elegant detail: on the walls are clusters of triple circular pilasters, resting upon ornamented corbels at the height of twelve feet from the floor, and rising to the height of four feet, for the support of the roof, which appears to have been vaulted. The suite comprises various other apartments of different dimensions and of corresponding elegance, in a greater or less degree of preservation. Near the south-east angle of the central buildings is the armoury, a circular tower of no great elevation; and almost adjoining is the leaning tower, which forms so conspicuous a feature among the ruins: this consists of one-half of the tower which is said to have been ruptured by the explosion previously noticed, and which, though more than seventy feet high from the base, was by that means forced into its present inclined position. Regarding the present state of this tower, as it is by no means certain that it was caused by the circumstances above narrated, it has been conjectured that it might have been produced by having been undermined, like the other three, and its entire destruction prevented by a fragment which fell upon its base. Near the armoury is a spacious corridor, about one hundred feet in length, in the wall of the inner enclosure, communicating with the several apartments, and affording a direct intercourse with the guards who were stationed in the embattled towers which protected the walls. These remains, which form the principal attraction of the place, surpass in extent, beauty, and venerable grandeur, any that are to be found in the principality, and present an imposing and august memorial of a structure which in its pristine splendour was rivalled by few in the kingdom, and perhaps only excelled by the royal palace of Windsor. Besides the ruins of the castle, here are also some other interesting remains of antiquity. In a piece of ground called the Burgesses' field is an ancient earthwork, nearly square, enclosing an area of about half an acre, and defended by two ditches; and at Môrgrig, properly Môrgraig, is another quadrilateral encampment, about eighty paces long, and nearly of equal width, having the angles rounded off according to the Roman fashion. Numerous coins, chiefly of the reign of Edward II., have been found near the castle, but none of a very ancient date. A short distance to the north-west of the town is the seat called Energlyn, or Genau'r Glyn, formerly the residence of John Goodrich, Esq., which commands a fine view of the majestic ruins of the castle; and to the east, near the banks of the Rumney, stands the mansion of Ruperrah, the seat of Chas. Morgan, Esq., eldest son of Sir Chas. G. Morgan, Bart., of Tredegar: it occupies an elevated situation, commanding, to the southward, fine views of the Bristol channel, a rich intervening tract of country, and the hills of Somersetshire and Devonshire in the distance, and was built from a design by Inigo Jones; but the interior having been consumed by fire, the outer walls are the only part of the original edifice now remaining. A little lower down is situated Cevn Mably, an ancient seat of the family of Kemeys, and once the residence of that distinguished royalist, Sir Nicholas Kemeys. Pwll y Pant and Pont y Pandy are two old mansions, formerly the residence of ancient families, but now deserted by their proprietors. In the vicinity are numerous springs, the water of which is strongly impregnated with iron, and totally unfit for culinary purposes: when boiled, the colour is changed to black, and the water emits a strong foetid smell.

CAERRA (CAERAU), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3½

miles (W.) from Cardiff, containing 77 inhabitants. This parish, part of which was given by Fitz-Hamon to Sir John Fleming, one of the Norman knights who attended him in the conquest of Wales, constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of Llandaf, valued in the king's books at £3. 10. 7½, and endowed with the tithes not only of this parish, but also of the parishes of Penterry and Llandogo, in the county of Monmouth. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Caerau in the Cathedral Church of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is chiefly remarkable for its situation within the precincts of a Roman camp, which is one of the most extensive and entire in the principality. Its form is that of a regular parallelogram, rounded at the angles, and enclosing an area of about twelve acres: it is defended on the north side, where the ascent is steep, by one single rampart, on the south and south-west by two, and on the east side, where was the prætorium, by three ramparts. The prætorium, which is still visible, is of a circular form, guarded by a steep rampart, and communicating with the camp by a very narrow passage. From its situation within a small distance of the river Ely, its magnitude, the disposition of its arrangements, and its excellent preservation, it has been identified with the Tibia Amnis of Richard of Cirencester: no coins, however, or any Roman relics of antiquity, have been discovered near the spot, to confirm the supposition. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £65. 11.

CAERSEDDVA (CAER-SEDDVAN), a township in the parish of DÂROWEN, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6¼ miles (E. N. E.) from Machynlleth, containing 475 inhabitants. This township, the name of which signifies the "session fortress," forms the upper and north-eastern portion of the parish, and is in general rugged and mountainous. There are several lead mines in different parts, but they are only partially worked.

CAER-SWS, a hamlet in the parish of LLANWNNOG, hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W.) from Newtown. The population is returned with the parish. This is said to have been a Roman city of considerable extent, though unnoticed as such by early writers: its Roman name is not even known, and few vestiges of its grandeur have been traced. In Mr. Pennant's time the fields in the vicinity were divided by lanes intersecting each other, which probably pointed out the places that had formed the ancient streets, but the exact size of the station is not known. A Roman road, called Sarn Swsan, or Swsog, led from it in a direction northward, though whither it proceeded is doubtful, and but little of it can now be discovered. By the side of this road, on Gwynvynydd common, there is a small sub-oval encampment; and in a field adjacent to Rhôs Ddiarbed, "the common where no quarter was given," is another Roman camp, of singular form. At the south side there is a vast conical mount, surrounded by a deep fosse, supposed to have been exploratory, to the north of which an oblong area, about seventy yards broad in the greatest diameter, is defended by a high rampart and outer ditch: in the lower part there is an entrance to a square camp, about two hundred yards in length, and above one hundred in breadth, opposite to which is another entrance: the whole is surrounded by a rampart and ditch. No coins have been discovered here, but, about the year 1777, some Roman bricks, and large blocks of cement, much indurated, and as porous as breccia, were dug up in the south-western angle of the camp: one of the bricks bore an inscription in bas relief, which has not been satisfactorily decyphered, and was placed in the back part of a chimney belonging to the apartment of an adjoining inn. Caer-Sws had formerly a castle also, and at least one church, and is said to have been the residence of the lords of Arwystli. It is situated on the northern bank of the river Severn, across which a new stone bridge of three arches was built a few years ago, and has been enlarged, within the last fifty years, by the erection of some decent houses and cottages: a new road, leading from Caer-Sws to Llanwnnog, was constructed in 1831. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists.

CAERVALLOUGH (CAER-VALLWCH), a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Northop, containing 860 inhabitants. There are lead mines in this township, which have been worked from a very remote period, but are now fast declining, on account of the low prices of ore. On an eminence, one thousand and twenty feet above the level of the sea, is a very extensive British fortress, the most perfect in North Wales, called Moel y Gaer, or "the fortified hill," surrounded by a deep circular fosse, through which is an entrance on the western side. Within it, near the northern extremity, there is a small artificial mound, the summit of which commands the most extensive view in the county, embracing all the other British camps on the whole range of the Clwydian mountains to the west; the vales of Hope and Mold, as far as Wrexham, to the south; the æstuaries of the Dee and Mersey, with the port of Liverpool to the north; and the port of Chester to the east. About three hundred paces north-westward from this camp is an extensive artificial mound, commanding the pass through the mountains, and doubtlessly intended as an outpost to Moel y Gaer.

CAERWYS, an unincorporated borough and parish, formerly an incorporated market town, in the Caerwys division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Holywell, on the road from that town to Denbigh, containing 985 inhabitants. The name of this place is thought to be derived from Caer, a fortress, and Gwys, a summons; denoting that this was anciently a small Roman station, and subsequently a seat of judicature; and it appears, previously to the conquest of Wales by Edward I., to have been, together with a neighbouring town called Trêv-Edwyn, long since decayed, and the borough of Rhuddlan, one of the chief tribunals for this part of the principality. In 1244, the Welsh abbots of Cymmer and Aberconway, having been constituted by the pope a court of enquiry, to ascertain whether Davydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, had been under the influence of terror or force, in concluding a late unfavourable treaty with King Henry III. of England, and, if so, to absolve him from the obligations of fulfilling it, summoned King Henry to appear before them in the church of this town, to answer to the complaints of Davydd; but he, incensed at the indignity offered to his authority, immediately applied to the pope to annul the commission, which was accordingly done. Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last native sovereign of North Wales, prior to his accession to the throne, resided at Maesmynan, nearly adjacent, and possessed, as his patrimonial estate, the circumjacent cantrevs of Tegeingl, Dyfryn-Clwyd, Rhôs, and Rhyvonioe. Shortly before the entire subjugation of Wales by the English, one of the grievances complained of by the inhabitants, and submitted by their prince Llewelyn to Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, who had constituted himself mediator between him and the English monarch, was, that the privileges of the men of Tegeingl, or Englefeld, comprising the greater portion of the county of Flint, had been grossly infringed by the justiciary of Chester, who compelled them to go to that city, or other places, to procure justice, asserting their right to be tried by the laws of Wales, and at the usual places, viz., Rhuddlan, Trêv-Edwyn, or Caerwys. On the introduction of justiciary courts into Wales, under the sanction of the English law, Caerwys recovered its former importance, and the assizes for the county were held here till the year 1672, when they were removed to Flint, and thence to Mold, where they are now held. The gaol is yet remaining, but has been converted into a dwelling-house, called Yr hên Jail, "the old gaol:" there are also some fragments of the town-hall, and the site of the last gallows is shewn upon a common, close to the road side, a little south-eastward from the town. Henry III., in the 26th year of his reign, granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation; and in 1356, the grant of a weekly market and two annual fairs was procured for them, at the instance of John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, and others.

Caerwys was long renowned for its Eisteddvodau, or sessions of bards and minstrels, which for some centuries were held triennially, and in later times at irregular intervals. It was the resort of the bards of a certain district, as Aberfraw in Anglesey was of those of that island and the adjacent county, and Mathraval of those of Powys; these places having been selected on account of being the residences of princes. At these meetings none but bards of superior merit were allowed to rehearse their compositions, nor any but minstrels of acknowledged skill to perform on their harps: of their respective merits judges were appointed by the Princes of Wales, and, after the conquest of that country, by the Kings of England. A commission from Queen Elizabeth, dated at Chester, the 23rd of October, 1567, for holding an Eisteddvod at Caerwys, in the following year, is now in the possession of Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart., together with the silver harp, which it had been from time immemorial the privilege of his ancestors to bestow upon the best performer on that instrument: this badge of distinction is about six inches long, and is furnished with strings of silver, corresponding with the number of the Muses. The Eisteddvod accordingly took place on May 26th, 1568, when fifty-five persons were admitted to their respective degrees, as vocal and instrumental performers, and the prize of the silver harp was adjudged to Sion ab William ab Sion. The commissioners, in the course of this year, published a notice that another Eisteddvod would be held on the next anniversary of that day; but of this assembly no particulars have been preserved, further than that it was the occasion of a poetical contest between the bards of North and South Wales, in which some of the most beautiful stanzas in the Welsh language were produced extemporaneously. From this period the Eisteddvodau did not enjoy any share of royal favour, and were not convened by the successors of Queen Elizabeth; but in the year 1798, an attempt to restore them was made by the Gwyneddigion Society in London, and, after the usual notice of a year and a day had been given, a numerous meeting, under extensive and highly respectable patronage, was held in the town-hall here, which had been especially fitted up for the occasion, and the usual contest of talent and skill took place, and prizes were awarded to the successful candidates. The town, however, had been for some time declining; and, notwithstanding these and similar efforts for the restoration of the Eisteddvodau to their original splendour, the Welsh poetry was rapidly waning in character, and the high patronage by which it was previously cherished had declined, when a revival took place, in the year 1828, under the auspices of the Cymrodorion Society in London; and the most splendid Eisteddvod on record was held, on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of September, in that year, at Denbigh, where it is probable these ancient meetings will in future be re-established. The town, which now presents only the appearance of a village, is pleasantly situated at the junction of two vales, and consists of two streets intersecting each other at right angles, and corresponding with the cardinal points, in the manner of a Roman town; from which circumstance, and the discovery of ancient foundations and other relics, it has been considered by some writers the Varis of Antoninus; but this station has with greater probability been fixed in the parish of Bodvari, the name of which, added to the discovery of numerous Roman remains, especially in the plantations of Pontrifith, in that parish, appears to entitle it more to a claim of identity with the Roman settlement. Caerwys has but little trade: a small quantity of woollen cloth is manufactured, and there is a wire-mill on a limited scale, affording employment to a very few persons. Lead-ore has been found at different times, in small quantities, mixed with the limestone strata in the eastern part of the parish, and a considerable quantity of iron-ore exists on the western side of the town, but at present there are no works for procuring either. The nature of the soil in the parish is various: in some parts of its north-western extremity it is very poor, being composed of a thin covering of vegetable earth over a barren yellowish clay, but in other parts it is well adapted to the culture of barley and oats. The market, which was held on Tuesday, has long since fallen into decay, in consequence of the establishment of a market at Holywell. Fairs for the sale of cattle, sheep, horses, and pigs are held on the first Tuesday after January 13th, March 5th, the last Tuesday in April, the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday, the first Tuesday after July 7th, August 29th, November 5th, and the second Tuesday in December, which are the most considerable in the county. The charter conferred upon the inhabitants the right of appointing two bailiffs, for the better government of the town, annually at the court leet of the lord of the manor, now held about Michaelmas by Edward Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq. Caerwys is one of eight contributory boroughs within the county, which are united in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in the resident inhabitants paying scot and lot, in number at present one hundred and thirty, provided they be capable of registering pursuant to the act. The limits of the borough, which were not altered by the late act for amending the representation of the people, comprise parts of the townships of Caerwys and Trêv-Edwyn: the mayor of Flint is the returning officer.

The living formerly consisted of a sinecure rectory and a vicarage, each rated in the king's books at £9. 10., which were united by an act passed in the 29th and 30th of Charles II.: it is in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat edifice with a square embattled tower, consisting of a nave and north aisle, and appropriately accommodated to the use of the parishioners. There are places of worship in the town for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and one for the former also at Pen y Cevn. A National school is in progress of erection, partly at the expense of the National School Society, and partly by subscription, in which one hundred and sixty children of both sexes may receive gratuitous instruction. In a field near the village, called Erw'r Castell, was anciently a fortress, the history of which is unknown, and of which there are no remains. On almost every side of the village, but more particularly on the plains towards Newmarket, are tumuli, of which several, having been opened, were found to contain urns of clay rudely formed: some of these have been converted by the neighbouring farmers into limekilns. About a mile from Caerwys formerly stood a large stone, nearly five feet high, bearing the inscription "Hic jacet mulier bo . . . obiit," which was for some time used as a gate-post, but was removed, about the close of the last century, to the gardens of Downing, in the parish of Whitford, then the seat of Mr. Pennant, the antiquary and naturalist. In the field in which this stone was situated a considerable number of copper coins of different Roman emperors was discovered some years ago. At Fordden, near this place, regularly formed spars, stalactites, and coarse mineral agarie are found; and in a wood in the vicinity there is a well, called St. Michael's, the water of which has obtained, among the superstitious inhabitants of the neighbourhood, the reputation of possessing a peculiar miraculous efficacy, and the spring was formerly much resorted to by the credulous, on the morning of Easter-day, for the purpose of drinking it. Dr. Wynne, Bishop of St. Asaph, and afterwards of Bath and Wells, was a native of Caerwys; and the Rev. John Lloyd, an eminent antiquary, and the friend of Pennant, was rector of this parish: he died in May 1793, and was interred in the church here. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £271. 17.

CALDEY ISLAND, the principal of a cluster of insulated rocks in the bay of Tenby, and forming an extra-parochial district in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from the main land. The population is returned with the parish of Penally. This island, of which the ancient British name is Ynys Pyr, is about one mile in length, and half a mile in breadth, and comprises more than six hundred acres of good land, lying on a bed of limestone, something less than half being in a state of cultivation. Owen, speaking of the fertility of this spot, describes it as abounding with corn; but he adds that "all their ploughs goe with horses, for oxen the inhabitants dare not keepe, fearing the purveyors of the pirattes, as they themselves told me." Robert, son of Martin de Tours, founded a priory here, in the reign of Henry I., which he dedicated to St. Mary, and made a cell to the abbey of Dogmael, to which establishment the whole of the island was granted by his mother: its revenue, at the dissolution, was £5. 10. 11. The remains have been mostly converted into offices attached to a mansion erected on part of the site, now belonging to — Kynaston, Esq., who is sole proprietor of the island. Among them is the tower of the ancient conventual church, which is surmounted by a stone spire, and forms a conspicuous object of picturesque appearance, imparting, with the rest of the ruins, an interesting and romantic character to this sequestered spot. A lighthouse, with a steady light has been erected on this island, which is of great service to vessels entering Tenby harbour.

CAMRHÔS, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Haverfordwest, on the road to St. David's, containing 1259 inhabitants, the amount of population having increased nearly one-fourth since the census of 1821. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. 5., endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Hugh Webb Bowen, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Ismael. There are two places of worship for Independents. Near the church is a large tumulus, which has never been opened. Camrhôs House, the seat of Hugh Webb Bowen, Esq., is the only residence within the parish which is entitled to notice. A fair is held here on February 13th. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £402. 15.

CANTREF, a parish in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, comprising the upper division, or chapelry of Nantddû, and the lower division, or hamlet of Cantref, and containing 211 inhabitants, of which number, 109 are in the hamlet of Cantref, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Brecknock. This parish, formerly called Cynnedd, is situated about a mile from the river Usk, and a little further from the main road from London to Milford: it forms a parallelogram of about two miles in breadth, and nearly fifteen in length from the eastern to the south-south-western extremity, and includes within its limits the lofty summits of the Brecknockshire Beacons, the lowest of which is situated to the south, and the other two, sometimes called Cader Arthur, or Arthur's Chair, are nearly of an equal height. The two most southerly points of these hills, when viewed from a short distance, present in shape the appearance of nearly perfect cones, their summits consisting of flat surfaces not more than fifteen square yards in extent. Beneath the point in the centre, at some little distance, there is a small circular pool of brackish water: the apex of this hill is two thousand five hundred and fifty feet above the bed of the river Usk at Brecknock, and about three thousand above the level of the sea, being the highest in South Wales, and commanding a most extensive prospect, including the Bristol channel from the Mumble Head to Kingswood, the Malvern hills in Worcestershire, and parts of fourteen counties. To the north-east of it there is a terrific precipice, nearly perpendicular, of at least six hundred feet from the top to the spot where the descent, though still abrupt, partially loses its precipitous character, and begins to be more gradual. This mountainous region, which forms the middle portion of the parish, consists entirely of waste land, adapted only for sheep-walks; the two extremities alone are under tillage. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal to Newport passes at the distance of about half a mile from the eastern, and the Cardiff canal to Merthyr-Tydvil about five miles from the western, extremity of the parish.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas Powell. The advowson formerly belonged to the lords of Brecknock, and, on the attainder of the Duke of Buckingham, became vested in the crown, and was granted to William Awbrey, D. C. L., Master of the Court of Requests in the reign of Elizabeth: from this family it passed by marriage to the Powells of Cantref, and finally, by purchase, to their collateral relations, the Powells of Swansea, to whom it has belonged since the early part of the seventeenth century, several members of that family having been incumbents, and distinguished by their literary attainments. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is romantically situated on a well-wooded eminence just above the river Cynrig: it consists of a nave and chancel, rebuilt in 1829, at the expense of the parishioners, and a small low tower at the west end, containing two bells. In the churchyard, which commands a beautiful prospect, there are some fine yew trees, on one of which, at the distance of about twelve feet from the ground, a mountain ash has taken root, and, not deriving sufficient nourishment from the old tree on which it grows, has struck down its roots through the decayed trunk, which have long since penetrated into the earth. The parsonage-house was rebuilt about the year 1792, and has since been repaired and altered. In consequence of the church being situated at the eastern extremity of the parish, a chapel has been erected at Nantddû, about ten miles distant, for the convenience of the inhabitants of that hamlet and Hepstê, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector. An overseer is appointed for each end, or division, of the parish, though the inhabitants unite in the general maintenance of the poor. There are some mineral springs among the mountains, but they are not resorted to for medicinal purposes. Among the incumbents of the family of Powell mostly deserving notice may be mentioned the Rev. Thomas Powell, born here in 1627, who published "Elementa Opticæ," in 1651; "Quadruga Salutis," or the "Four General Heads of the Christian Religion," in 1657; "The Catechism, Lord's Prayer, and Commandments, in Welsh and English, with comments and explanations;" "Human Industry, or a History of most of the Manual Arts;" "The Life of Herod;" and "Translations from the Italian of Malvezzi, and the French of Balsac;" and left an interesting work in manuscript, now unfortunately lost, entitled "Fragmenta de rebus Britannicis," or "a Short Account of the lives, manners, and religion of the British Druids." His son Thomas, also rector, was a man of considerable talent: being reproached by one of his countrymen on account of the meanness of his descent, although able to boast of a line of ancestry as respectable as any in the county, he good-humouredly replied, extemporaneously in Welsh verse, which, being rendered into English prose, runs thus;—"And so you think I am no gentleman? Well! I'll answer you in few words:—from Noah and his three sons sprang all mankind, and from one of them came the parson of Cantref." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, in both divisions of the parish, amounts to £147.2.

CAPEL-BETTWS, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See PENPONT.

CAPEL-CALLWEN, or BLAEN-GLYNTAWE, a chapelry attached to the parish of DEVYNOC, in the hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (W. S. W.) from Brecknock, containing 89 inhabitants. It is situated at the south-western extremity of the extensive parish of Devynock, in a vale between elevated and dreary mountains, not far from the source of the river Tawe. The country about the head of this vale is strikingly romantic. Limestone rocks rise to a great height, and, being in some places totally destitute of vegetation, present the appearance of ruined castles and other picturesque combinations; but the most remarkable is an extensive, irregular, and isolated one, in horizontal strata, called the Cribarth lime-rock, which rises out of the valley to an extraordinary height. Descending from the Great Forest of Devynock into the vale, a patch of thriving firs near the foot of a bold eminence, and the scattered cottages, all white-washed, have a most pleasing and lively effect in the midst of a scene remarkable for its wild and barren aspect. In the chapelry are found some culm and iron-stone, with abundance of limestone; and Christie's railway, constructed for the purpose of conveying this produce to other parts of the county, passes along the sides of the mountains, and through the glens which intersect them near Devynock, to the river Usk. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Devynock. At this place is one of "the Lord's Mills," to which the inhabitants are obliged to send their corn to be ground, a relic of the ancient feudal tenure; but the right is not now rigidly enforced. This chapelry separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure down to 1826 was £14, but since that period there have been no poor receiving relief.

CAPEL-COELBREN, a chapelry in the upper division of the parish of YSTRADGYNLAIS, hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 17½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Brecknock. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Ystradgynlais. The chapel, which stands at the distance of between five and six miles north-eastward from the parish church, is supposed to have been anciently a private oratory, and was rebuilt, on the site of the former edifice, in 1799, chiefly at the expense of Mr. Walter Price, of Glynllêch, to whom belong five out of the seven tenements of which the hamlet consists. This place is situated in the vale of the Tawe, and between that river and Christie's railway, which passes along the side of Cevn Bryn mountain.

CAPEL-COLMAN, otherwise LLAN-GOLMAN, a parish in the hundred of KILGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, on the road from that town to Narberth, containing 130 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the saint to whom its church is dedicated, is intersected by a rivulet called the Dylas. Cilwendeg, the seat of Morgan Jones, Esq., is an elegant modern mansion, erected within the last fifty years by the uncle of the present proprietor: it is a spacious structure, ornamented with a handsome receding portico in good taste, and occupies the centre of an extensive demesne, beautifully laid out in plantations and pleasure grounds, to which are entrances by two handsome lodges, recently added by the present proprietor, who has displayed a superior taste in the improvement of the grounds: the lawn in front of the house embraces a view of some of the most beautiful scenery in the county, including the luxuriant woods around Fynnonau. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of Wm. O. Brigstocke, Esq., and Major Bowen. The church, dedicated to St. Colman, is a small neat edifice, erected within the last fifty years, partly by subscription, and partly by a rate on the inhabitants. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £48. 12.

CAPEL-CURIG, a chapelry in the parish of LLANDEGAI, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 14 miles (S. E.) from Bangor, on the road from London to Holyhead and Dublin. The population is returned with the parish. This place, from its vicinity to Snowdon and other mountains of note in this part of the principality, and to several of the finest lakes in North Wales, has been for a long time the resort of tourists; and, since the diversion of the road through Nant-Francon, and the erection of a spacious hotel here by the late Lord Penrhyn, has become a place of fashionable resort, and during the summer season is visited by families of distinction and others, for whose accommodation the hotel, large as it is, has been found inadequate. A new line of road from this place to Carnarvon is now being formed through the pass of Llanberis, at the foot of Snowdon, affording a more direct communication with the interior of the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, which it is expected will be opened in the course of the present year. Near this place is Rhaiadr y Wenol, on the river Llugwy, one of the most interesting and beautiful waterfalls in the principality. Capel-Curig is situated in a district abounding with mineral wealth: a great quantity of calamine has been obtained here, and in the vicinity is found the hard primitive rock called serpentine. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The chapel, dedicated to St. Curig, appears to have been erected at a very early period, as a chapel of ease not only to the parish church of Llandegai, from which it is thirteen miles distant, but also for the mountainous districts in the several parishes of Llanllêchid, Llanrhychwyn, Dôlwyddelan, Llanrwst, and Trêvriw, the inhabitants of which are at a great distance from their several parish churches, and are entitled to seats in this chapel: the inhabitants of Llandegai, however, are exclusively bound by ancient custom to keep the building in repair. A large sheep fair is annually held here, on the 28th of September, which is numerously attended. Near a place called Brÿn Geveillau, between Capel Curig and Llanrwst, there are some remains of a Roman edifice, a great part of which has been removed for building materials: one of the apartments was found, by Mr. Lysons, to be sixty feet by twenty in dimensions, and another, eighteen feet six inches square, in which latter were several short square pillars of stone, similar to those of the hypocaust under the Feathers inn at Chester.

CAPEL-GARMON, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See GARTH-GARMON.

CARDIFF, called by the Welsh CAERDYDD, a seaport, borough, and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Kibbor, county of GLAMORGAN (of which it is the shire town), SOUTH WALES, 158 miles (W.) from London, containing 6187 inhabitants. This place is by most antiquaries supposed to have been originally built by Morgan ab Hywel ab Rhÿs, on or near the site of an ancient station, or fort, occupied probably by Aulus Didius, who succeeded Ostorius in the command of the Roman legions in Britain; and, with great probability, to have derived from that circumstance its Welsh name of Caerdydd. This opinion is strengthened by the discovery of Roman relics within the walls of the castle, the direction of the Roman road between the stations Isca Silurum and Bovium, and by other corroborative circumstances. The Roman station anciently occupying this site is supposed by Camden to have been the Ratostabius, or Ratostibius, of Ptolemy, from which the adjoining parish of "Rath," called by the English "Roath," is said to have obtained its name; and, by others, to have been the Tibia Amnis of Antonine, which Richard of Cirencester places near this town, between the stations Isca Silurum and Bovium. Others think that the present name of Cardiff is modernized from Caer-dâf, signifying "the fortified place on the river Tâf," which equally shows it to have been a fortified town, or military post, from a period of remote antiquity; but the arguments adduced in support of these two opinions are in favour of the former etymology. From the departure of the Romans from Britain till the conquest of Glamorgan by Fitz-Hamon, only a few slight notices are found of this place, scattered in ancient manuscripts, according to which it appears that, to avoid the frequent predatory incursions of the Saxons into the kingdom of Gwent, the seat of government was transferred, on the death of the renowned King Arthur, by his son Morgan, from Caerlleon to this place, which became the capital of the kingdom called from that prince Morganwg, a district including only that portion of Gwent which was situated to the west of the river Usk, and so continued till its destruction by Cadwaladr, after which it was rebuilt by Morgan ab Hywel, about the year 900; but having been again destroyed, it was, according to Caradoc of Llancarvan, rebuilt, in 1080, by Iestyn ab Gwrgan, who also erected here a strong castle. Iestyn, the last native sovereign of Morganwg, between whom and Rhÿs ab Tewdwr, Prince of Dinevor, a series of retaliating inroads had been commenced, entered into a compact with Einon ab Collwyn, one of the leaders of an unsuccessful insurrection against Rhÿs, pledging himself to give him his daughter in marriage, with the lordship of Miskin, provided that the latter would secure the assistance of some of the Norman knights with whom he had served abroad under the Conqueror. Einon accordingly repaired to London, and having engaged the services of Robert Fitz-Hamon, a relation of the king's, aided by other Norman knights, Iestyn and his auxiliaries commenced active hostilities against Rhÿs, whom they defeated, with the loss of nearly all his troops, on an extensive common called Hirwaun Wrgan, and, according to the Welsh Chronicle, afterwards beheaded in a secluded valley, some miles to the southward, whither he had fled for concealment. But Mr. Jones, in his history of Brecknockshire, is of opinion that Rhÿs fled, after the battle, to the territory of his brother-in-law, Bleddyn ab Maenarch, and was present at the battle fought between the latter and Bernard Newmarch, near Caer Bannau, after which he was beheaded at a place called, from that circumstance, Penrhÿs. Iestyn, having thus subdued and slain his enemy, refused to fulfil his contract with Einon; whereupon the latter hastened to Fitz-Hamon, who was preparing to embark his forces for England, and having represented to him the faithless conduct of Iestyn, and shewn the facility of obtaining possession of his dominions, induced the Norman commander to retrace his steps. Being joined by other native chieftains, whose fidelity and allegiance the tyrannical and unprincipled conduct of Iestyn had alienated, the confederated forces advanced against him, and found him posted near Cardiff, with the few forces which the suddenness of the revolt had enabled him to muster. A short conflict then took place, which ended in the defeat of the Welsh prince, who was obliged to seek safety in flight; and having for a short time been a destitute wanderer in his former dominions, he found an asylum in a neighbouring convent, where he passed the remainder of his days, and died at the advanced age of one hundred and twenty-nine.

Fitz-Hamon, having thus acquired possession of Iestyn's territories, parcelled them among his followers and allies, retaining to himself the towns, castles, and manors constituting the body of the lordship of Morganwg, of which Cardiff was the chief place; and is said to have enlarged and almost rebuilt the town, and to have taken down the castle built by the Welsh sovereign, which was of wood, erecting in its place that durable and magnificent structure, the present remains of which are of so highly interesting a character. In this castle the lords of Glamorgan, who exercised jura regalia throughout their lordship marcher, held their county courts and courts of chancery and exchequer; and here also the twelve knights, who owned the different baronies subject to this paramount lordship, were obliged by their tenures to attend on a certain day in every month, each having separate apartments for his accommodation in the outer ward of the castle. On the day after holding the county court, at which the sheriff presided and the knights attended, the chancellor was accustomed to sit in the chancery of the castle, to determine causes of equity arising within his jurisdiction; on which day also the knights gave attendance on their lord, and on the next withdrew to their respective baronies, where they held their own courts, each having a distinct jurisdiction, similar to that of the lordship marcher, except that, in cases of supposed wrong decision, the unsuccessful suitor had the privilege of appeal to the court of the latter. The strict servitude of the feudal tenures, thus introduced into the newly-established lordship, being ill suited to the independent spirit of the native landowners, and the Norman settlers continuing to extend their conquests westward into Gower, the Welsh of Glamorgan rose in great force, in the year 1094, and, under the command of Payne Turberville, one of Fitz-Hamon's feudal knights, having seized upon several castles, and put the garrisons to the sword, advanced to the castle of Cardiff, in which they surprised Fitz-Hamon, who, unprepared for effectual resistance, was obliged to grant a restoration of their ancient laws and customs. Robert Duke of Normandy, having unsuccessfully endeavoured to maintain his right to the English crown, and being made prisoner by his younger brother, Henry I., was committed to the custody of Fitz-Hamon, and immured in this castle, where, as it has been related, after being deprived of his eye-sight for attempting to escape, he lingered out a miserable captivity of twenty-eight years; but this act of barbarity is denied by the most respectable historians. One of the towers over the principal entrance served as his prison, and he is said to have obtained a release from close confinement, and liberty of twelve miles round the castle, through the intercession of Ivor ab Cadivor, called also Ivor Bâch, or the Little, a chieftain who resided among the hills to the north of Cardiff. Robert Earl of Gloucester, natural son of King Henry, having succeeded to the lordship of Glamorgan, by marriage with Mabel, Fitz-Hamon's only daughter and heiress, attempted to enforce the feudal system among his tenants, whose spirit being again roused, they advanced, under the command of Ivor ab Cadivor, to besiege the castle of Cardiff, which they took by storm, and made the earl and his lady prisoners, but released them, in pursuance of terms entered into with the English monarch, on condition that the Welsh of Glamorgan should be allowed the unmolested enjoyment of their ancient usages. To protect himself against further insurrections, the earl immediately began strengthening the defences of Cardiff; and having built a wall round the town and castle, he encompassed the whole with a ditch, communicating with the river Tâf both above and below the town. In 1172, Henry II. passed through Cardiff, on his expedition against Ireland, and again, shortly afterwards, on his return. In the reign of Henry IV., the town and castle were besieged, in 1404, by Owain Glyn-dwr, who assumed to himself the sovereignty of Wales, and burnt and laid waste the possessions of all who adhered to the king's cause. Having obtained possession of the town, he destroyed the whole, with the exception only of one street, in which was situated the convent of the Friars minor, a religious fraternity who had publicly espoused his cause. He then made himself master of the castle, which in a great measure he destroyed, carrying off a considerable quantity of treasure, that had been deposited for security in it. In the year 1570, a congress of the bards of Glamorgan assembled at this castle, under the auspices of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, for the purpose of collecting and digesting the laws of their order. During the parliamentary war the castle was garrisoned for the king, and was assaulted by Cromwell in person, by whom it was bombarded for three successive days; but the garrison made a valiant and spirited defence, and all his efforts might have been unavailing, but for the treachery of a deserter, by whom his forces were introduced by a subterraneous passage communicating with the open country, and whom Cromwell caused to be hanged, as a warning to his own troops. Charles I. slept three nights in the castle, in August, 1645, and thence wrote a letter to Sir Edward Nicholas, then Secretary of State.

The town is situated in an extensive plain, on the eastern bank of the river Tâf, over which it has a handsome stone bridge of three arches, with two smaller land arches to carry off the water in floods, which are here very violent, and by which two unfinished bridges, from designs by the same architect, Mr. Parry, had been previously destroyed. The site of the present structure, which was finished in 1796, has been judiciously selected, and the new entrance which it has opened to the town is among the principal recent improvements. The situation of the town, within a distance of three miles from the sea, and in a tract of country remarkable for its fertility and the beauty of its scenery, renders it desirable as a place of residence. Its appearance is highly prepossessing: the streets are regularly formed and well paved, the houses handsome and well built, and the town is lighted with gas and abundantly supplied with excellent water: it was formerly surrounded with a moat and defended by high walls, in which were gates in the direction of the four cardinal points, at the entrance to the principal thoroughfares. The suburb of Crockerton, or Crockherbtown, which forms the eastern entrance, is a spacious street, consisting entirely of handsome houses, adapted to the residence of opulent families. The theatre, erected by a proprietary of twenty-seven shareholders of £60 each, is a neat edifice, ornamented with a handsome receding portico of Grecian architecture, but has not, for the last four years, been used for dramatic performances. The armoury belonging to the Glamorganshire militia, a neat plain building, is situated in St. Mary's-street. The Glamorganshire races were formerly held annually on Cardiff heath, and continued for two days; but they have not taken place since the year 1830. A horticultural society has recently been formed, under favourable auspices, but it is yet only in its infancy. The environs abound with interesting scenery, and a fine promenade, planted with shrubs and evergreens, is open to the public on the ramparts of the castle.

The trade of the port, which comprises within its jurisdiction the creeks of Barry, Sully, and Aberthaw, consists in the exportation of iron, tin-plates, and coal, to a very considerable extent; and in the importation of various articles of general consumption, necessary for supplying the surrounding district, in addition to some timber. During the year 1830, notwithstanding the great depression of the iron trade, the quantity of iron brought down the Glamorganshire canal, to be shipped at this port, was eighty-seven thousand three hundred and seventy-two statute tons; of coal one hundred and thirteen thousand seven hundred and fifty-three tons; and more than fifty thousand tons of miscellaneous articles. The custom-house is a plain neat building, well adapted to the purpose; and, though no exact entry is kept of the number of vessels which enter inwards and clear outwards in every year, it appears that one thousand vessels of two hundred and fifty tons' burden each were employed, in the year 1830, to ship off the various articles brought down the canal only, during that year. Cardiff is indebted for its commercial prosperity to its facility of communication with the manufacturing districts in the vale of Tâf and places adjacent, by means of the Glamorganshire canal, since the completion of which, in 1798, the place has considerably increased in importance and extent. The Glamorganshire, or, as it is sometimes called, the Cardiff, canal commences about a mile and a half below the town, near the entrance of the river Tâf into Penarth harbour, and extends to Merthyr-Tydvil, a distance of twenty-five miles. In its course, which is nearly parallel with the river, it passes by the city of Llandaf, and is carried over the Tâf by an aqueduct, within a short distance of which it is joined by the Aberdare canal, and then, winding round the base of the Twyn-Mawr hills, is continued to Merthyr-Tydvil: at its junction with the tideway of the river Tâf there is a floating-dock, sixteen feet deep, with a sea-lock, capable of admitting vessels of three hundred tons' burden. The proprietors are limited to eight per cent. on the capital subscribed, after dividing which, and reserving an adequate sum for necessary and incidental expenses, the remainder is to be returned to the parties freighting goods. The freight is fixed at fivepence per ton per mile on iron and manufactured goods, and threepence per ton for ore, coal, culm, and other raw produce; the amount remitted to the freighting parties, in the year 1830, was  $77\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the gross payments. In 1830 an act of parliament was obtained for constructing the Bute Ship canal, at the sole expense of the Marquis of Bute, which, however, had not been commenced in the middle of 1832. The main object of this undertaking is to construct a safe basin, into which ships of great burden can be admitted, to receive the whole of their cargoes, and from which they may sail at half-tides: it is intended to commence near the mouth of the river Tâf, where it is to have a sea-lock and flood-gates, to keep the surface water forty-one feet above low water mark in Cardiff harbour at spring tides, and will proceed to the south side of the town, where a basin, fifteen hundred yards in length, and twenty feet deep, is to be formed, from which there will be two communications with the Glamorganshire canal: the whole is to be supplied by a feeder from the river Tâf, about a mile north of Cardiff castle, passing through some of the streets in the town, in its course to the basin. This design, when carried into effect, will greatly facilitate the conveyance of coal from the banks of the rivers Tâf and Cynon to the London market, and materially promote the trade of the town. The only manufacture at present carried on in the town is that of iron, for which there is a foundry conducted by Messrs.

Moggridge and Towgood, affording employment to about fifty men; also an establishment on a smaller scale, for lighter castings. The glass-works, established here a few years since, by Messrs. Guest & Co., have been recently discontinued. There are weekly markets on Wednesday and Saturday; that on the former day is now but thinly attended, but on the latter there is an abundant supply of corn and provisions of every kind, besides various articles of merchandise: the shambles for butchers' meat are commodiously ranged in two long avenues leading out of High-street: hardware and vegetables are exposed for sale in the open street in front of the guildhall. The fairs are on the second Wednesday in March, the second Wednesday in April, the second Wednesday in May, June 29th, September 19th, and November 30th, all of which are great cattle fairs, and are numerously attended.

Corporate Seal.

The town received a charter of incorporation either from Iestyn ab Gwrgan, the last of the native sovereigns of Glamorgan, or from the first of its Norman lords: the oldest charter extant is one of Hugh le Despencer, in the reign of Edward II., dated October 14th, 1338, confirming the grants and privileges of his predecessors, Lord William de la Zouche and Elinor his wife. The most recent is that of James I., dated July 18th, 1608, by which the government is vested in a constable of the castle (who holds his office during the royal pleasure, and is the chief member of the corporation), a steward or recorder, twelve aldermen (of which two are chosen bailiffs), twelve common-councilmen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two common attorneys (one of whom is a capital, and the other a common, burgess), two serjeants at mace, a water-bailiff, two ale-tasters, and other officers. The constable of the castle is appointed by the Marquis of Bute, who is lord-lieutenant of the county; the bailiffs are chosen annually at Michaelmas, by the aldermen and common-councilmen, who nominate four aldermen, out of which number the constable of the castle, or his deputy, elects two, and swears them into office: vacancies in each of the other bodies are filled up, by a majority of themselves, from those next in succession. The constable of the castle, the bailiffs, and the senior alderman, are justices of the peace within the borough, which, with its liberties, is co-extensive with the parishes of St. John and St. Mary, and the boundaries of which are given in the Appendix to this work. The borough is divided into four wards, for each of which three constables are annually appointed, and sworn into office by the bailiffs. Conjointly with Cowbridge and Llantrissant it returns one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, but is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of houses in the borough worth ten pounds per annum and upwards is four hundred and sixty-four: the bailiffs are the returning officers. Prior to the passing of the late bill of reform, Aberavon, Kenfig, Loughor, Neath, and Swansea, were united with the above-mentioned boroughs in the return of a member to parliament; but these places now constitute a district to which a separate representative has been given. The freedom is inherited by birth, acquired by servitude of seven years' apprenticeship to a resident freeman, by marriage with a freeman's daughter, or by gift of the corporation at large. The corporation, under their charter, hold a court of record in the guildhall, every alternate Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount, at which the bailiffs and senior alderman preside, assisted by the town-clerk: by a provision enacted in the 3rd of James II., this court might be held before the steward and bailiffs, but the steward seldom acts, and the processes are generally issued under the former officers: at this court also burgesses, of whom there are at present upwards of three hundred and fifty, are admitted and sworn in. The assizes and the Epiphany sessions for the county are also held in the guildhall, a plain modern building, comprising one court-room and a record and a jury room on the upper story, underneath which are the corn and dairy markets, and two apartments appropriated as a borough prison. The county gaol, a respectable edifice fronted with freestone, and constructed on the plan of Mr. Howard, being too small for the increased population of this manufacturing district, a new building upon a more enlarged scale was commenced in 1827, which will be open for the reception of prisoners at the close of the present year (1832). The new gaol, which occupies an airy situation to the south of the suburb of Crockherbtown, is a substantial stone edifice, surrounded by a lofty wall with a massive gateway entrance, over which is the place of execution. The governor's house is in the centre of the area, and communicates by cast-iron bridges with three detached wings; on one side of the entrance are the apartments of the turnkey, and on the other the committee-rooms for the meeting of the magistrates. The gaol, which is capable of accommodating eighty prisoners, including twenty debtors, is well adapted to their classification, and comprises day-rooms, work-rooms, and airing-yards: it includes also a house of correction for the eastern parts of the county: the whole expense of the building is estimated at £10,000.

Cardiff consists of the parishes of St. John the Baptist and St. Mary, the livings of which are discharged vicarages consolidated, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, the former rated in the king's books at £13. 4. 6½, and the latter at £4. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church of St. John, formerly a chapel to that of St. Mary (which was a large cruciform building, with a square tower, situated near the margin of the river, at the south-western extremity of the town, and was destroyed by an inundation in 1607), is a spacious and handsome structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower in the later style, and equally remarkable for the elegance of its design and the symmetry of its proportions. It was built in 1443, by Hart, the architect of Wrexham church, and of St. Stephen's, Bristol: the tower is crowned with an embattled parapet of delicate tracery, with angular pinnacles of open work of light and beautiful character, and the doorway and belfry windows are ornamented with finely pointed and richly moulded arches. The interior of the church consists of two aisles, separated by a range of lofty and sharply pointed arches, resting on massive pillars, and a chancel, of which the roof has been lowered to admit light into the body of the church, which had been darkened, about twenty years since, by the erection of two galleries, containing five hundred additional sittings. Among the monuments is one, in a dilapidated condition, to the memory of two brothers of the family of Herbert of Swansea, whose effigies in a kneeling posture are represented under a canopy of white marble, supported by four Corinthian pillars of black marble, one in the habit of an ecclesiastic, and the other in military attire: a Latin inscription, now nearly obliterated, records that the younger brother, Sir John Herbert, was principal secretary to Queen Elizabeth and James I., and ambassador at the courts of Frederick II. and his son Christian, kings of Denmark, Sigismund of Poland, and Henry IV. of France. There are places of worship for English and Welsh Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists, Independents, and Presbyterians, the last of which has an endowment of £300, and the interest of £100 bequeathed by Mr. Arthur, to be distributed among the poor of that congregation. In 1710, Mr. Cradock Wells, alderman of the borough, left by will certain freehold houses in Cardiff, and lands at Canton, in the parish of Llandaf, in trust to the corporation, for the establishment of a free school for instructing poor children of the borough in reading, writing, and arithmetic. This school having been discontinued since the year 1790, application was made to Chancery in 1819, and a decree obtained in 1821, appointing the aldermen for the time being trustees of the property, which is applied to the education of six boys and six girls in the National school, which was established in 1815, under the patronage of the Marquis of Bute: these children are annually clothed, and, when of proper age, placed out apprentices, with suitable premiums. An equal number of children, who are also instructed in the same school, are clothed annually from funds invested for that purpose by the Marquis of Bute. Two capacious school-rooms were erected at Crockherbtown, in 1818, on ground given by the Marquis, who also contributed £52. 10. towards defraying the expense of the building, which cost £700, of which the corporation gave £300. A house for the master and mistress, with a committee-room, has since been built, at an expense of £600, of which the Marquis of Bute contributed £50, and the corporation £100. Mrs. Jane Herbert gave £500 to be invested in the purchase of land, for the establishment of a school for the instruction of fifteen poor children; but this object has not yet been carried into effect, in consequence of which an application has been made to the Lord Chancellor. A dispensary, situated in Union-street, was established in 1823, and is supported by subscription: an addition of £256. 16. 6½. was made to its funds by a ladies' bazaar, opened at the time of the races in 1828, with which the present building was purchased. An institution for the relief and assistance of poor lying-in women during their confinement has been recently formed, called the "Cardiff Charitable Midwifery Institution." A Sympathetic Society was established in 1794, for the benefit of widows: there are at present seventy-nine members, and nineteen widows are now receiving annuities of £15 each from the funds, which, in 1829, were vested in the purchase of £4300 New four per cent. annuities. There are no fewer than eight benefit societies. A rent-charge of £8, paid by the Mackworth family, another of £2. 10. left by Mr. William Jones, £100 Navy five per cents by the late Mr. John Rice, and various other charitable bequests and donations, are distributed among the poor.

On the north-east side of the town was anciently a convent of Grey friars, founded in 1280, by Gilbert Earl of Clare, who dedicated it to St. Francis, and made it a cell to the monastery of Bristol: at the dissolution its site was granted to the Herberts, a branch of the Swansea family: the walls are still remaining, but in a dilapidated state. Without the West-gate was a convent of Black friars, founded by Richard de Clare, about the year 1250; and two other religious houses, of which there are no vestiges, are noticed by Tanner, one supposed to have been that of the friars minor, founded by Robert, first Earl of Gloucester, and which, as noticed above, was spared, together with the street in which it was situated, when Owain Glyndwr burnt the rest of the town. Among the remaining antiquities of this place are portions of the town walls, which seem to have been built on the site of Roman fortifications. The castle still forms an interesting object, though greatly altered by being converted into a modern castellated mansion. The west front, which is flanked by a massive octagonal tower of great strength, is seen to advantage from the great western road to the town. On the summit of a circular mound within the walls are the ruins of the ancient keep, commanding an extensive prospect over the surrounding country: this tower was used as an armoury during the parliamentary war. The moat by which it was surrounded has been filled up, and the whole area has been converted into a fine lawn: the acclivities of the ramparts have been planted with shrubs and evergreens, and on the summit a fine gravel walk has been formed, which is carried round the whole enclosure, and is open to the public as a promenade. On the west side of the gateway is the Black Tower, in which Robert Duke of Normandy is said to have been confined, during his captivity here. At the south-west angle of the court, the remains of a Roman hypocaust were exposed to the view about eighty years ago; and a coin of the Emperor Trajan has been found within the castle. The eastern part is distinguished by the insertion of small pointed windows, behind which were discovered, a few years ago, the remains of a series of interesting Norman arches, probably coeval with the original structure; and great alterations have been made, to adapt the habitable part of this ancient fortress to the uses of a mansion. The apartments contain several good portraits of the ancestors of the house of Bute, and some fine paintings by Kneller, Vandyke, Dahl, Romney, and other eminent artists. According to the testimony of the Liber Llandavensis, the renowned King Arthur was a native of this place. Among distinguished natives of more modern times may be mentioned William Cadogan, member of the privy council of Charles I., and governor of the castle and borough of Trim in Ireland, who was born in 1601. The Rev. Mr. Erbury, who was vicar of this place during the usurpation of Cromwell, was author of a volume of sermons and other tracts, addressed to his parishioners, which present a curious specimen of the divinity of that period. Nathaniel Thomas, B.A., editor of an Abridgment of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, and other school books, and subsequently editor and proprietor of the St. James' Chronicle, was born in this town, in 1730. Cardiff gives the inferior title of baron to the Marquis of Bute. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1351. 9.

CARDIGAN, a sea-port, borough, market town, and parish, in the lower division of the hundred of TROED-YRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 232 miles (W. by N.) from London, containing 2795 inhabitants. This place, called by the Welsh Aberteivy, from its situation near the mouth of the river Teivy, was probably selected, at a very early period, as an eligible site both for habitation and for commerce, its maritime situation affording a facility of communication with distant parts of the kingdom. Little, however, is known either of its original foundation or of its primitive inhabitants; nor are there either traditionary or authentic records of its history, prior to the conquest of this part of the country by the Normans, who erected a fortress at this place, to defend the passage of the river, and to secure themselves in the possession of the territories which they successively wrested from the native proprietors. It appears about this time to have first assumed the character of a regular town, and it subsequently became the capital of the province of Ceredigion, comprehending, in addition to the present county of Cardigan, a large extent of territory, which originally constituted the country of Dimetia, and was granted, about the middle of the fifth century, to Caredig, son of Cunedda, a chieftain of North Wales, from whom it derived its name, now modified into Cardigan. In the Welsh annals this place is described as the scene of some of the most sanguinary conflicts which took place in South Wales, during the first three centuries after the Norman Conquest of England. Roger de Montgomery, who did homage to William Rufus, in 1091, for the province of Cardigan, finding himself unequal to defend the castle against the native chieftains, relinquished it to Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, Prince of Powys, a man of bold and enterprising ambition, who assumed the sovereignty of South Wales, and maintained a protracted warfare, not only with the Norman lords, who encroached upon his territories, but with the English monarch himself. Cadwgan continued to maintain possession of the castle, and, after the death of William Rufus, entered into an alliance with Henry I. The castle appears to have been at this time a place of considerable importance, and one of the residences of Cadwgan, who, in the Christmas of 1107, gave a splendid festival here, including an Eisteddvod, a grand assembly of the bards, at which, according to some accounts, Owain his son, inflamed by the lively descriptions given by his companions of the beauty of Nêst, the wife of Gerald de Windsor, determined on carrying her off from her husband's castle in Pembrokeshire: others trace this outrage to a banquet given at the castle of Eare Weare, in the parish of Amroath, on the western coast of Pembrokeshire. The act, however, drew down upon his family the wrath of Henry, who, having in vain demanded from Owain the liberation of his captive, incited the nobles of Powys to avenge the insult; and Cadwgan and Owain were compelled to abandon their country, and take refuge in Ireland. The former returned in the following year, and, having satisfied the king of his innocence, was restored to his possessions; but his son, unable to regain the king's favour, carried on a desultory warfare against the English, which, involving Cadwgan with the king, he was a second time deprived of his dominions, which were, however, again restored to him.

Upon the death of this chieftain, who was assassinated by his nephew, Madoc ab Rhyrid, in 1110, Henry possessed himself of the sovereignty of South Wales, which he held for several years, until Gruffydd, eldest surviving son of Rhys ab Tewdwr, in concert with Owain and Cadwaladr, sons of Gruffydd ab Cynan, sovereign of North Wales, and the chieftains of South Wales, reconquered the whole province of Cardigan, and advanced to the gates of Aberteivy, in the vicinity of which place a sanguinary battle was fought, in 1136, between the allied Welsh and the Norman, English, and Flemish forces then in Wales, or in the marches, in which the latter suffered a total defeat, having, according to the testimony of Giraldus Cambrensis, three thousand men killed, and a great number drowned in the Teivy, by the breaking down of a bridge in the line of their retreat. The castle fell into the hands of the Welsh, who, however, do not appear to have kept possession of it for any considerable time; for, in 1144, Howel and Cynan, sons of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, having raised a considerable army, obtained a signal victory over the Normans and Flemings at Aberteivy; and, having retaken the town and castle, in the latter of which they placed a strong garrison, returned into their own country, laden with honour and with spoil. The castle was afterwards fortified by Roger Earl of Clare, from whom it was wrested, in 1165, by Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, who razed it to the ground. According to most writers it was rebuilt by Gilbert de Clare, in the following year, but was afterwards taken by Rhys, who, having subsequently entered into terms with Henry II., was allowed to retain his possessions in South Wales, and kept it in his own hands till his death. Rhys, in 1171, marched a cavalcade of eighty-six horses from this place to Pembroke, and presented them to that monarch, when on his route to embark for Ireland; and on his having completed the repairs of this castle, in 1176, he celebrated in it a grand festival, and held an Eisteddvod, or assembly of the bards, of which notice had been published, for a year previously, in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, from all which kingdoms numerous distinguished guests arrived, and all the bards of Wales were present. After a display of deeds of arms and other military exploits, the bards were assembled in the great hall, and prizes were adjudged to the most skilful. In this contest the bards of North Wales gained the prizes for poetry; and among the musicians those of the household of Rhys were allowed to have excelled in minstrelsy. Prince Rhys, in 1188, sumptuously entertained Archbishop Baldwin, attended by Giraldus Cambrensis, then preaching the crusades throughout Wales, first at St. Dogmael's priory, in the county of Pembroke, and on the day following in his castle of Cardigan. After the death of Rhys, in 1198, the castle, then in the possession of his son Gruffydd, was attacked by his brother Maelgwyn, by whom it was taken; but, in the course of the same year, Gruffydd repossessed himself of all his patrimonial territories, with the exception of this castle and that of Ystrad-Meirig, which were still in the possession of his brother, who, however, agreed to surrender the former of these fortresses to Gruffydd, on his giving hostages for the security of his person; but he had no sooner received them than he repaired the fortifications of the castle, reinforced the garrison, and, placing the hostages in the hands of his ally, Gwenwynwyn, Prince of Powys, from whom they effected their escape, refused to fulfil his engagement. He retained possession of the castle till the year 1200, when, finding that he could no longer defend it against the power of Gruffydd, which was every day increasing, he sold it for a small sum to the Normans, that it might not fall into the hands of his brother.

In 1215, this fortress was surrendered by the Norman garrison to Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, who returned to Cardigan, in the following year, to adjust the disputes which had arisen between the native chieftains of South Wales, and to divide among them the territories which they had jointly recovered from the Anglo-Norman invaders. In this partition the castle was assigned to Owain ab Gruffydd; but Llewelyn, much to the dissatisfaction of that chieftain, kept it in his own possession, and in the treaty which he made with the English king, and which was ratified at Gloucester in 1218, he engaged to restore it, with all its dependencies, to the English. In the following year Llewelyn, refusing to fulfil his engagement, and apprehending an attack from the English, strengthened the fortifications, and augmented the garrison of the castle; but no attack was made upon it till 1220, when the Flemings, who had settled in Pembrokeshire, and had recently sworn fealty to him, revolting from their allegiance, marched against Cardigan, and speedily obtained possession of the castle, which was soon afterwards retaken by Llewelyn, who put the garrison to the sword. Young Rhys ab Gruffydd, being afterwards, as he conceived, wrongfully deprived of the possession of the castle by Llewelyn, went over to the English, placing himself under the protection of the Earl of Pembroke, who, after the quarrel between Rhys and Llewelyn had been amicably adjusted, through the interference of the English monarch, seized the castle, which during his absence was again retaken by Llewelyn, and the garrison put to the sword. The earl, on his return from Ireland in 1223, marched with a powerful army to Cardigan; and laying siege to the castle, compelled a surrender, and retaliated upon the Welsh garrison the cruelty which his own soldiers had previously experienced from Llewelyn. Maelgwyn ab Maelgwyn, a Welsh chieftain, having in 1231 forced his way into Cardigan, put all the inhabitants to the sword; and having laid waste and nearly demolished the town, he was checked in his career of destruction only by the fortifications of the castle, which were considered impregnable. Being joined, however, by his cousin Owain, son of Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, attended by some of the best officers of that prince, he returned to besiege the castle; and having broken down the bridge, closely invested that fortress, and so battered and undermined it, that the garrison, after an obstinate resistance, was finally compelled to surrender. The castle lay in the ruinous state to which it had been thus reduced for nearly nine years, till the accession of Davydd ab Llewelyn ab Iorwerth to the sovereignty of Wales, in 1240, when Gilbert Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, encouraged by the weakness of the prince and the unsettled state of the principality in a new reign, seized upon this fortress, which he strengthened with works more extensive and better constructed. From this time the castle appears to have remained in the undisturbed possession of the English, and no further notice occurs respecting it in the Welsh annals. Edward I., after his entire conquest of the country, resided for a month in the castle, during the time he was employed in settling the affairs of the principality. The lordship, castle, and town were settled by Henry VII. on Catherine of Arragon, on her being betrothed to his eldest son, Arthur, Prince of Wales, as part of her dower. Soon after the commencement of the parliamentary war, Cardigan castle was in the hands of the parliament, two of whose agents resided at the priory in the town: it was, however, taken by General Girard, and garrisoned for the king, but was afterwards besieged by the parliamentary forces under General Laugarne, by whom, after it had sustained an incessant cannonade for three days, by which a breach was made in the walls, it was taken by storm.

The town is pleasantly situated on the north bank and near the æstuary of the river Teivy, over which it has an ancient stone bridge of five arches, connecting the counties of Cardigan and Pembroke: it consists of one principal thoroughfare, extending from the bridge along the turnpike road to Aberystwith, from which another diverges to the east, in a line towards Newcastle: the former contains several respectable shops, and in both there are a few good houses. For many years the want of a public supply of water was an object of great anxiety to the inhabitants; but in the beginning of the year 1831, the sum of £400 was raised for that purpose by public subscription. A capacious reservoir has been made near the gaol, and iron pipes laid down, by which the water is conveyed into six public conduits in different parts of the town, for the supply of the inhabitants generally, and from these are branch pipes, conveying it to the houses of those who choose to pay a small annual rate for that additional accommodation. Dramatic performances occasionally take place in the town, and during the assizes and at other times assemblies and concerts are given; but there are no buildings especially appropriated for these amusements. The environs are pleasant, and abound with interesting and varied scenery; and the view of the town from the higher grounds is highly prepossessing. The port has jurisdiction over Newport and Fishguard, in the county of Pembroke, to the west, and over Aberaeron, Aberporth, and New Quay, to the north, and carries on a very considerable coasting trade, and a limited intercourse with foreign parts. The principal exports are, corn (chiefly oats) to Bristol and Liverpool, butter, oak bark, and slate, which last may be deemed the staple article of the place, though it is not of a very good quality, selling only at half the price of the slate procured in North Wales: the chief imports are, timber from Norway and North America, coal (principally from Liverpool, and sometimes from South Wales and Staffordshire), culm from South Wales, limestone from Pembrokeshire, and manufactured goods and merchandise for the supply of the shops. There are belonging to the port and its dependencies two hundred and ninety-one registered vessels, of an aggregate burden of fifteen thousand one hundred and ninety-five tons, and employing one thousand one hundred men. In the year ending January 5th, 1830, five foreign and five hundred and eighty-two coasting vessels entered inwards, and two foreign and one hundred and seventy-nine coasting vessels cleared outwards. The river Teivy is navigable up to the bridge for vessels of from three to four hundred tons' burden at spring tides, but the entrance to the harbour is obstructed by a dangerous bar, having at high water in spring tides only twenty-two feet of water, with a fall of sixteen feet, leaving at times only six feet depth of water, and at neap tides the rise and fall do not exceed eleven feet; so that the general trade of the port is confined to vessels of from fifteen to one hundred tons' burden. It has been suggested that a great improvement might be made in the harbour, by constructing a pier, extending from Pen yr Eryd to the south-west, the expense of which probably would not exceed £1000. An extensive and lucrative salmon fishery is carried on in the Teivy, during the summer; and a herring fishery, which in some years is remarkably productive, affords employment to many during the winter. In summer the river assumes a remarkable appearance, from the vast number of coracles, or small portable fishing boats, constructed of wicker covered with leather, and large enough only to hold one person, with which its surface is overspread, and which are much in use throughout the principality. Ship-building was formerly carried on to a great extent, but has almost wholly declined, and the town has now no manufactures of any description. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held annually on February 13th, April 5th, September 8th, and December 19th. The market for corn is held by sufferance under the shire-hall. Butchers' meat was exposed for sale in the principal street until the year 1823, when a commodious market-house and slaughter-house were built, under the direction of the corporation, on the west side of the town, near the river.

The borough was first incorporated by Edward I., after his final conquest of Wales, and the charter of privileges granted by that monarch was confirmed and extended by several of his successors. By the charter now in force, which was granted in the 19th of Henry VIII., the government is vested in a mayor, two bailiffs, a coroner, twelve common-councilmen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk and subordinate officers: this charter also partially elevates it into a county of itself, by granting "that the said burgesses and their successors for ever shall have the return of all our writs and of all the suits of our heirs, in whatsoever pleas, real or personal, and of all other cases within the said town of Cardigan; so that no escheator, sheriff, bailiff, nor minister, of us do enter, or in any thing meddle, within the town and borough aforesaid." The mayor, chosen from the common-councilmen, and the bailiffs and coroner, from the burgesses, are elected annually on the Monday after the feast of St. Michael; the common-councilmen fill up vacancies, as they occur, from the burgesses, and the burgesses are nominated, by a jury of twelve, from among the inhabitants, at the court of the corporation. Among the privileges of a burgess are, exemption from tolls, frontage, and other imposts throughout the British dominions, and the right of claiming on their trials a jury consisting entirely of Englishmen. This borough and its contributories, Aberystwith, Lampeter, and Atpar, return one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, but is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the new borough, which are given in the Appendix to this work, is one hundred and ninety-three: the mayor is the returning officer. Adjoining the town is an unenclosed common, containing nearly three hundred acres of good land, which belongs to the burgesses at large. The assizes for the county are held here, as the county town; as are also the Epiphany quarter sessions, the Easter and Michaelmas sessions being held at Aberystwith, and the Midsummer sessions at Lampeter: the knight of the shire is elected at Cardigan. The shire-hall, erected in 1764, and enlarged in 1829 by the addition of a room for the grand jury and a retiring room for the petit jury, is a neat edifice: the court is commodiously arranged, and contains a bust of the late Thomas Johnes, Esq., lord lieutenant and parliamentary representative of the county, sculptured by Chantrey, at the expense of the county magistrates. The common gaol and house of correction for the county was erected in the year 1793, after a design by Mr. Nash: it occupies a spacious area at the extremity of the town, towards Aberystwith, and comprises six day-rooms, six airing-yards, five work-rooms, and every requisite for the due classification of the prisoners, of whom it is capable of accommodating twenty-two in separate cells, and forty-seven by placing more than one person in each cell: in one of the yards is a tread-wheel, for the employment of prisoners sentenced to hard labour.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 15. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and venerable structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and south porch, with a square embattled tower at the west end: the various parts of this structure were erected at different periods, and display different styles of English architecture. The chancel, which is by far the most ancient and the most elegant portion of the building, is in the decorated style, and is externally ornamented with a castellated battlement, and strengthened with buttresses surmounted by light handsome pinnacles. The porch was rebuilt, in the later style, in 1639, and the nave in the same style, but differing in the details, in 1703; and the tower, which fell down in 1705, was partly rebuilt in 1711, by a brief under the great seal, and completed in 1748, by subscription. The appearance of the interior has been considerably injured by the erection of a carved screen above the altar, of the Ionic order, which ill accords with the prevailing style of architecture: the east window contains some portions of the ancient stained glass with which it was originally filled: the font, which is ancient, is octangular in form, and richly sculptured; and in the south-eastern angle of the church are two arches, under each of which is a handsome marble monument, erected about the middle of the last century. Mathaiarn, one of the sons of Brychan, Prince of Brecknock, who devoted himself to a religious life, about the middle of the fifth century, is said to have been buried here. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school, which is a licensed institution, was founded, about the year 1760, by Lady Lætitia Cornwallis, of Abermarlais, in the county of Carmarthen, who endowed it with money in the three per cents., producing at present an income of £21. 10. 6. per annum, for the gratuitous instruction of six poor boys of this town: prior to the establishment of St. David's college, at Lampeter, young men were ordained from this school. It is said that there are four scholarships belonging to it, but they are not at present available, neither can any particulars of their foundation be ascertained. A National school, in which from sixty to seventy boys are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription; and there is also another school for girls, similarly supported, but conducted on a different plan. At the eastern extremity of the town, towards the river, stood a small Benedictine priory, the foundation of which is of uncertain date: it was a cell to the abbey of Chertsey, and its revenue at the dissolution was valued at £32: it was granted by Henry VIII., together with the other possessions of Chertsey, to Bisham abbey, and subsequently, by the same monarch, to William Cavendish. The Priory was afterwards the residence of the celebrated Catherine Philipps, daughter of Mr. John Fowler of London, and wife of James Philipps, Esq., better known by her poetical name of Orinda, and as the author of some pleasing poems, and a small work entitled "Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus," by which name was designated her early friend and patron, Sir Charles Cottrell. On the site of the ancient mansion is now a handsome villa, which, with the whole of the Priory estate, is the property of Philip John Miles, Esq., of Leigh Court, in the county of Somerset. Of the walls by which the town was anciently encompassed there are now no remains. The castle was, from its situation, well calculated for defence, and admirably adapted to command the entrance into the western part of the principality, of which it was considered the key: it occupied the summit of an eminence rising to a considerable elevation above the river, and overlooking the town and a large tract of the open country. The remains at present consist only of two bastions and a portion of the curtain wall; the site of the keep is at present occupied by a handsome modern villa, the cellars of which are formed out of the dungeons of that ancient tower, of which the walls in some parts are from nine to ten feet thick; and the outer ward has been converted into a verdant lawn, tastefully disposed in parterres, the whole effected by John Bowen, Esq.; but the property now belongs to Arthur Jones, Esq., by purchase in 1827. Cardigan gives the title of earl to the family of Brudenell. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £554.4.

CARDIGAN (ISLE OF), an extra-parochial district, in the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Cardigan. This is a small island, at the eastern side of the mouth of the river Teivy, and only separated from the main land by a narrow channel: it comprises about forty acres, and yields good pasturage for cattle and sheep, chiefly for the market at Cardigan.

CARDIGANSHIRE, a maritime county of SOUTH WALES, bounded on the north by the æstuary of the river Dovey, or Dyvi, and the county of Merioneth; on the north-east by Montgomeryshire; on the east by the north-western extremity of Radnorshire and the northern parts of Brecknockshire; on the south by the county of Carmarthen; on the south-west by that of Pembroke; and on the west and north-west, in its whole length, by Cardigan bay: it extends from  $51^{\circ} 55'$  to  $52^{\circ} 27'$  (N. Lat.), and from  $3^{\circ} 45'$  to  $4^{\circ} 51'$  (W. Lon.); and comprises an area, according to Mr. Carey's Communications to the Board of Agriculture, of five hundred and ninety square miles, or three hundred and seventy-seven thousand six hundred statute acres. The population, in 1831, was 64,780.

The ancient British inhabitants of this county were the Dimetæ, who also occupied the adjoining counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke, and were subjected to the Roman sway by Julius Frontinus, about the year 70. Under the Roman dominion it contained the station Loventium, thought by Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart., and other antiquaries of modern times, to have been situated at Llanio, about seven miles above Lampeter, in the vale of Teivy. It seems likewise to have been traversed throughout by the great Roman road called the Via Occidentalis, which connected the station Loventium with that of Segontium, near the modern Carnarvon; and with that at Penallt, in the present county of Merioneth; that of Menapium, in Pembrokeshire; and those of Maridunum, and at Llanvair ar y brÿn, in Carmarthenshire. The present name of Cardigan is derived from Caredig, son of Cynedda, a chieftain of North Britain, who distinguished himself in repelling an invasion of Wales by the Irish Scots, about the middle of the fifth century, and received as a reward for his services a tract of South Wales, called Tyno Cóch, or the "Red Valley," to which he gave the name of Caredigion, signifying "Caredig's country," and since corrupted into Cardigan.

The precise extent of this tract cannot now be ascertained; but at a later period, the lordship, or principality, of Caredigion is known to have comprehended, besides the present county of Cardigan, the greater part of that of Carmarthen. Little more than their names is known of the successors of Caredig in the sovereign authority: Brothen, the third in succession, received the honour of canonization. The eleventh was Gwgan, who was accidentally drowned in 870, after which event, Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, sovereign of North Wales and Powys, became possessed of this principality (which at that time held supreme authority over the other petty states of South Wales), in right of his wife Angharad, who was Gwgan's daughter. Having thus become sovereign of all Wales, he subsequently divided his dominions into three portions, including Caredigion in the kingdom of South Wales, the seat of the government of which he fixed at Dynevor, in the present county of Carmarthen, and to which his son Cadell succeeded on the death of his father. In the disputes which soon arose among Roderic's sons, Anarawd, King of North Wales, aided by some English allies, led a powerful force into South Wales, in 892, and made dreadful devastations in this and the other provinces, burning the houses and destroying the corn. Ievav and Iago, princes of North Wales, obtaining possession of their patrimony, after the death of Hywel Dda, by whom they had been unjustly excluded from it, asserted their claim to the sovereignty of all Wales, and, in 949, invading Caredigion, defeated the sons of Hywel, who had shared among them the kingdoms of South Wales and Powys, and then carried their devastations into Dyved, the present Pembrokeshire. The year following, they again entered Dyved, but were opposed with great spirit by Owain, son of Hywel, by whom they were compelled to retreat with such precipitation, that a great part of their army was drowned in the river Teivy. Owain and his brothers, in their turn, acted on the offensive, and invaded North Wales, where they fought a sanguinary battle with the forces of Ievav and Iago, but without advantage to either party; and the following year the princes of North Wales again entered Caredigion, but were repulsed with great loss by the sons of Hywel, who, however, in the end were overcome by their adversaries, and the latter established their dominion over all Wales. In 987, the Danes committed great devastations on the coast of this county, burning the churches of Llanbadarn and Llanrhÿstid, and causing such destruction of corn and cattle as to produce a general famine, which destroyed a great part of the population. On this occasion Meredydd, then sovereign of all Wales, was compelled to purchase the retreat of the invaders by the payment of a tribute, called "the tribute of the black army": but scarcely had he freed himself from these foreign enemies, when Edwin, the eldest son of his brother Eineon, who considered himself wrongfully dispossessed of the principality of South Wales, aided by some parties of Saxons and Danes, invaded this county, and hence proceeded into Pembrokeshire. About the year 1068, the Normans having proved successful in their invasion of England, a strong body of them made a descent upon the western coast of South Wales, and ravaged this county and that of Pembroke; but, being quickly attacked by Caradoc, Prince of South Wales, they were compelled to abandon their plunder, and retreat to their ships.

These marauders returned three years after, in 1071, but with the like ill success, being defeated with great loss by Rhydderch, son and successor of Caradoc. In 1087, the sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, a deceased prince of North Wales, raised a formidable insurrection in South Wales, against the authority of Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, the reigning prince of this country, whom they compelled to retire to Ireland. Being aided with a large body of Irish troops by his brother-in-law, the king of Dublin, Rhŷs soon returned, and was joined by numerous friends; while the sons of Bleddyn, thinking that delay would increase the strength of their antagonist, hastened to give him battle. The adverse armies met at a place called Llêchryd, and a sanguinary conflict ensued, in which the sons of Bleddyn were totally defeated, and two of them slain: the scene of this action has been generally placed in Radnorshire, but it is now thought to have been fought at Llêchryd, near the Teivy, in this county, a few miles above the town of Cardigan, rather than in a part of the principality the most distant from the Irish channel, and which Rhŷs could reach only by leading his forces a distance of nearly sixty miles over a desert and almost impassable country.

Caredigion was one of the Welsh provinces first subdued by the Norman lords, soon after they had been so much encouraged in the conquest of the country, by the successful issue of Fitz-Hamon's enterprise in Glamorgan; and Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, did homage for it to William Rufus, towards the close of the eleventh century: this baron, to secure his conquests, first erected the castle of Aberteivy, or Cardigan, afterwards so distinguished in Welsh history. But the Norman settlers had constantly to maintain an arduous contest with the native princes, in which they were frequently worsted and driven from the territory they had usurped. In 1093, Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, Prince of Powys and South Wales, expelled these invaders, and took possession of the castle of Aberteivy, or Cardigan. Gilbert Strongbow, son of Richard Earl of Clare, having obtained leave of Henry I. of England to deprive Cadwgan of all the lands which he could wrest from him, invaded the province of Caredigion with a considerable force, and subdued it without much difficulty: having thus obtained possession of the country, his chief care was to erect fortresses for the defence of his conquests, and one of the principal of these was the castle of Aberystwith. Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, the eldest surviving son of Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, having commenced a system of predatory warfare against the lords marcher in the territory of Carmarthen, his success gained him many partisans among the native chieftains, and thus enabled him to conduct his operations on a more extended scale, and to recover a large portion of his father's territories, in spite of the opposition raised against him by the English monarch, Henry I. The native chieftains of Caredigion espoused his cause and submitted to his government, esteeming him the guardian of his country, and calling on him to free them from the odious and ignominious tyranny of foreigners. Gruffydd hereupon entered the territories of these chieftains, by whom he was received with great cordiality and respect. Suddenly arriving at Cardigan Iscoed, he laid siege to a fortress which the Earl of Strigyl had erected at Blaen Porth Gwithan, in the vicinity of that place, which, after many terrible assaults, he at length took and burned to the ground.

As far as Penwedic, the like destruction fell upon the deserted houses of the English inhabitants, who, struck with dismay, had fled from the fury of the native forces. Gruffydd next laid siege to a castle called Strath Peithyll, in this county, belonging to the steward of the Earl of Strigyl, which he took by assault, putting the garrison to the sword. Hence he advanced to Glâsgrûg, where he encamped his forces for a day's rest. But his hitherto triumphant progress soon received a severe check, in a disastrous failure before the castle of Aberystwith, then belonging to Gilbert Earl of Clare, in which the slaughter of his troops was so great as to compel him to evacuate the province.

At the commencement of the reign of the English monarch Stephen, in 1135, Owain Gwynedd and Cadwaladr, chieftains of North Wales, laid waste with ruthless fury the province of Caredigion, taking the castles of Aberystwith, Dinerth, and Caerwedrôs, and two other fortresses, belonging to Walter Espec and Richard de la Mare, all of which were of great strength and well garrisoned. At the close of the following year the confederate princes again invaded this territory, with four thousand infantry and two thousand horse, besides the auxiliaries led by their allies, Gruffydd ab Rhŷs and other eminent chieftains, who also furnished their main army with considerable supplies; and with irresistible violence subdued the whole province to the town of Aberteivy, or Cardigan, taking and demolishing all the castles held by the English lords. To repel this formidable incursion, the whole force of the Normans, the Flemings, and the English, in Wales and the Marches, was united under the conduct of several powerful barons, who, however, were signally defeated, in an obstinate and bloody conflict, with the loss of three thousand men; and the routed forces, fleeing to their castles for safety, were so closely pursued, that many were made prisoners, and great numbers were drowned in the Teivy by the breaking down of a bridge across that river which afforded almost the only means of escape. Having so successfully completed their campaign, the young princes of North Wales returned to their own country, carrying with them, to grace their triumph, the horses and armour, and other rich spoils, which they had taken. In the course of these events, Richard Earl of Clare, to whom the territory of Caredigion, or Cardigan, had been granted by Henry I., was murdered by a Welshman, named Iorwerth, as he was riding through a wood: after this his wife, who was sister to the Earl of Chester, retired into one of his castles, in this county, where she was besieged by the Welsh, and in the most imminent danger of falling into their hands, but was at length rescued from this perilous situation by Milo Fitz-Walter, Lord of Brecknock, who, with a chosen body of troops, undertook a romantic expedition from his own territories for the purpose, pursuing his march along the most unfrequented ways, and carrying away the countess and her retinue, unperceived by the besiegers.

During the reign of Gruffydd's son and successor Rhŷs, an expedition was undertaken by Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, against the Normans and Flemings in Cardigan and the adjoining territories on the south, in which inroad he is stated to have demolished the castles of Aberystwith, Ystrad Meirig, and Pont Stephan, or Lampeter, in this county: retaining in his possession the whole province of Cardigan, and compelling the inhabitants of Pembrokeshire to pay him tribute, he returned into his own dominions. A few years afterwards, Hywel and Cynan, the illegitimate sons of Owain Gwynedd, made another inroad into South Wales, encountered and defeated a Norman force, and took possession of the town of Aberteivy, or Cardigan. In 1150, Cadell, Meredydd, and Rhys, sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, invaded Cardigan, and took and demolished the castle of Aber-Rheidiol and other fortresses in the northern part of the province; then, marching southward, they possessed themselves of the castle of Cardigan, at that time held by Hywel, son of the prince of North Wales, thus subduing the whole province, excepting only a single fortress in its northern part. These young princes were so much enraged at the loss of the bravest of their soldiers, which they experienced at the siege of the castle of Llanrhystid, that, on at last gaining possession of it, they put the garrison to the sword: the castle of Ystrad Meirig, which they next took, they fortified with additional works, and, placing garrisons in both these fortresses, returned to Carmarthenshire laden with rich spoil. Early in the reign of Henry II., Gilbert Earl of Clare entered Cardigan with the sanction of that monarch, to attempt the recovery of the estates which had been taken from his family during the late reign: he regained possession of the castle of Ystrad Meirig and some other places, and proceeded to attack the territories of Rhys ab Gruffydd; but the latter chieftain soon after overran the whole country of Cardigan, levelling with the ground all the castles belonging to the English. A few years afterwards, roused by the savage murder of his two nephews, whom he had delivered as hostages to Henry II., by their keeper the Earl of Gloucester, Rhys again took up arms, and, attacking Gloucester's possessions in Cardigan, took and demolished the castle of Aber-Rheidiol and other fortresses; then, marching southward, he possessed himself of the castle of Cardigan, and afterwards extended his inroads into Pembrokeshire. On the retreat of Henry II., after his invasion of North Wales, which Rhys had aided in resisting, this chieftain, returning into South Wales, suddenly invested the castle of Cardigan, which had again fallen into the hands of the English, and retook it: he then devastated the surrounding country, and made himself master of the castle of Kilgerran, an important post situated on the banks of the Teivy near Cardigan, the fortifications of which he levelled with the ground, and then proceeded to his own territories in Carmarthenshire. Henry II. afterwards granted to this chieftain, together with other extensive territories, the whole of that of Cardigan, in the castle of which he held a grand festival, in 1176, which is celebrated by the Welsh bards. Rhys died in 1196, and, with several of his successors in the lordship of Dinevor, was buried at the abbey of Strata Florida, in the eastern and mountainous part of the county. Gruffydd ab Rhys succeeded to the lordship of South Wales, together with all the territories held by his father at the time of his death; but his brother Maelgwyn, aided by Gwenwynwyn, son of Owain Cyveilioc, lord of Powys, soon after he had entered upon his inheritance, attacked him by surprise in his castle of Aberystwith, and made him prisoner: Maelgwyn then proceeded against some of Gruffydd's other fortresses; and soon made himself master of the whole province of Cardigan. In the following year (1198), the wronged chieftain was liberated from confinement by the English lords, into whose custody he had been delivered by Gwenwynwyn, and, being strongly supported by his friends, entered this territory and recovered all his possessions in it, except the castles of Cardigan and Ystrad Meirig. Through the mediation of the friends of the adverse parties, Maelgwyn entered into a solemn engagement to deliver up the castle of Cardigan to Gruffydd, on condition of receiving from the latter hostages for the security of his own person. But on the delivery of these, Maelgwyn sent them prisoners to Gwenwynwyn, and fortified the castle for himself: in the following year he took from his brother the castle of Dynherth, and put the garrison to the sword, but the latter about the same time obtained possession of the important fortress of Kilgerran, situated on the banks of the Teivy, in the neighbourhood of that of Cardigan, but on the opposite side of the river. Maelgwyn, fearing, from Gruffydd's increase of strength in the vicinity, that he should not be able to maintain the contest much longer, sold the castle of Cardigan to the Normans, lest it should fall into the hands of his brother: the latter died in 1202, and was succeeded in his honours and possessions by his son Rhys, whose lands in Cardigan were soon invaded by his uncle Maelgwyn, aided by his ally Gwenwynwyn.

Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, having in 1208 seized upon the territories of Gwenwynwyn, then a prisoner in England, marched an army into South Wales against Maelgwyn, who, being unable to resist so overwhelming a force, destroyed his castles and withdrew: Llewelyn rebuilt the castle of Aberystwith, which he garrisoned with his own troops; but the cantrev of Penwedig, forming the northernmost part of the present county of Cardigan, and the other lands lying between the rivers Dyvi and Aeron, he gave to Rhys ab Gruffydd and his brother Owain. Maelgwyn, rendering submission to the English monarch John, was furnished by the latter with a large body of English troops, to assist in the recovery of his possessions in this quarter; and entering Cardiganshire with these forces, he encamped at Kilcennin, in the cantrev of Penwedig. His nephews Rhys and Owain, who were not strong enough to oppose him openly in the field, came privately into the vicinity of his camp, with a chosen band of three hundred men, and, suddenly entering it in the dead of night, fell upon their enemies with great fury, put many of them to the sword, and compelled the rest, among whom was Maelgwyn himself, to seek safety in flight. When King John, in 1212, compelled Llewelyn ab Iorwerth and the other principal Welsh chieftains to do him homage, Rhys and his brother Owain at first refused; but being soon threatened by the overwhelming forces of Foulke, Viscount Cardiff, at that time warden of the marches, who was aided by their uncles, Maelgwyn and Rhys Vychan, they sued for peace, and applied for safe conduct to London, where they were graciously received by the king, and, on doing homage to him and relinquishing their territories between the Dyvi and Aeron, were allowed to retain all their other possessions: the English commander, on this occasion, strengthened the works of the castle of Aberystwith, and garrisoned it with the king's troops. After the departure of Foulke, Maelgwyn and Rhys Vychan, probably incensed at the favourable terms granted to their nephews, with whom they had been so long in hostility, threw off their allegiance to the English monarch, and took and dismantled the castle of Aberystwith, thus affording to Rhÿs and Owain an opportunity of retaliating on their uncles, on pretence of supporting the authority of the king of England. Accordingly they entered Maelgwyn's territories, which they plundered; but it appears that both these young chieftains were shortly after stripped by their uncles of nearly all their estates, which they recovered only by the assistance of some forces furnished them by King John, and commanded by the same Lord Foulke, who defeated Rhÿs Vychan with considerable loss in a battle fought in Carmarthenshire. The latter chieftain, expelled from all his fortresses in that county, removed his family to Aberystwith, and retired to the most inaccessible parts of the neighbouring country. Some time after these events, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth led a large army into South Wales, to attack the territories of the English vassals, and, in the course of the expedition (in which he was assisted by the forces of Rhÿs ab Gruffydd, his brother Owain, and their two uncles, who had all come to a reconciliation), took the castle of Cardigan, thus once more totally expelling the English from the county. After a short interval, Llewelyn came again into Cardiganshire, in his character of lord paramount of Wales, to settle a dispute between Rhÿs ab Gruffydd and his brother Owain, on one part, and their uncles on the other, concerning the division of the reconquered territory, which he adjusted to the satisfaction of the respective claimants: he soon after placed a strong garrison in the castle of Cardigan, and in Powell's History of Wales he is also stated to have given permission, about this time, to Rhÿs ab Gruffydd to do homage to the King of England, for some of his lands. In 1220, the Flemings of Pembrokeshire, who had shortly before submitted to Llewelyn, as their sovereign lord, renouncing their allegiance to him, attacked and took the castle of Cardigan: the Welsh prince, however, soon recovered it, and razed it to the ground, after which he overran the greater part of Pembrokeshire. Rhÿs, finding that Llewelyn intended to withhold from him the castle of Aberteivy, or Cardigan, which in the late division had been allotted to him, made common cause with Llewelyn's enemy, William le Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke: this chieftain's desertion Llewelyn punished by seizing his castle of Aberystwith, and the territories appertaining to it; but King Henry III. interfering on the complaint of Rhÿs, the affair was settled amicably. Rhÿs died in the course of the same year, and his possessions were divided between his brother Owain and his uncle Maelgwyn.

Llewelyn having, during the absence of the Earl of Pembroke in Ireland, taken two of that nobleman's castles, the latter, on his return, retaliated on the subjects and possessions of Llewelyn, seizing, among other places, the castle of Cardigan. Maelgwyn ab Rhÿs died in 1230, and his possessions descended to his son Maelgwyn, who, as soon as he had entered upon his inheritance, hastened against Cardigan, and burned the town; but, finding his own forces insufficient for the reduction of the castle, which was strongly fortified, he demanded the assistance of his cousin Owain and some of Llewelyn's officers, and, thus reinforced, he destroyed the bridge over the Teivy, and, after a short siege, took possession of the castle. About the year 1233 died Rhÿs

Vychan, son of Rhÿs, the last prince of South Wales, whose decease was soon followed by that of his nephew, Owain ab Gruffydd, whose possessions were inherited by his son Meredydd, while those of Rhÿs were divided between his sons Meredydd and Rhÿs. Cardigan castle was retaken by Gilbert le Mareschal, or Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, in the year 1240, after the death of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth. Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I. of England, having, about the middle of the thirteenth century, taken forcible possession of some of the estates of the Welsh chieftains in Cardiganshire, the sufferers complained to Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the new prince of North Wales, who thereupon entered this province with an army, recovered the lands, and gave the greater part of them to Meredydd ab Owain, who died in 1268. Edward I., soon after his accession, and at the same time that he invaded North Wales in person, sent a powerful army into South Wales under Payen de Chaworth, whose successes greatly contributed to moderate the terms of Llewelyn's treaty of peace with Edward, which was made soon after. Before his return from this great expedition, the English monarch rebuilt the castle of Aberystwith, in order to secure the advantages which he gained by this treaty; but the oppressions of the king's officers becoming intolerable to the inhabitants of the surrounding country, they revolted, and, headed by Rhÿs, son of Maelgwyn, and Gruffydd, son of Meredydd, possessed themselves of this newly-erected fortress. Llewelyn, the last native prince of North Wales, entered this province a little time before his death, and laid waste the possessions of the King of England's vassals in it, particularly those of Meredydd ab Rhÿs, who had some time before deserted his standard: hence he proceeded with his forces towards Builth, in Brecknockshire, in the vicinity of which place he met his lamentable death. According to the laws and regulations made by Edward I. for the government of Wales, the entire subjugation of which he completed immediately after this event, the territories which had latterly appertained more immediately to the princes of the house of Dinevor, and were now in the possession of the crown, were formed into the two counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, to which sheriffs were immediately appointed, like those of England. Some few years afterwards, Edward proceeded also to tax his new subjects; but the Welsh, still ardently desirous of regaining their lost independence, revolted, and Maelgwyn Vychan headed a strong body of the malcontents in Cardiganshire, which overran and plundered both that county and Pembrokeshire. During the revolt of the Welsh under Owain Glyndwr against Henry IV., the castle of Aberystwith was several times taken and retaken by the contending parties. The Earl of Richmond, after landing at Milford with the design of wresting the crown of England from the usurper, Richard III., marched through this county, his forces increasing with his progress, on his way towards Shrewsbury, where he was rejoined by the celebrated Rhÿs ab Thomas, who had taken a different route from the place of debarkation to that of rendezvous. The inhabitants of this county seem to have taken no very active part in the civil war of the seventeenth century. Cardigan castle, which had been garrisoned for the king, was attacked by the parliamentary forces under General Laugharne, and at last taken by storm: the castle of Aberystwith, also held by the royalists, surrendered without much opposition. Cardiganshire appears also to have been the scene of some skirmishes between the parliamentary leader, Colonel Horton, and the royalist commander, Colonel Poyer, after the great battle of St. Fagan's in Glamorganshire, so disastrous to the forces of the latter.

This county is in the diocese of St. David's, and province of Canterbury, and, together with some adjoining portions of Carmarthenshire and Pembrokeshire, forms the archdeaconry of Cardigan, which comprises, within the limits of the county of Cardigan, the deaneries of Sub Aëron, or Is Aëron, and Ultra Aëron, or Uwch Aëron: the number of parishes is sixty-five, of which twelve are rectories, twelve vicarages, and thirty-two perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the five hundreds of Geneu'r Glyn, Ilar, Moythen, Penarth, and Troedyrour, all of which have upper and lower divisions. It contains the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Aberystwith and Cardigan, the latter of which is the county town, while the former is much frequented for the purpose of sea-bathing; the borough and market town of Lampeter; the small borough of Atpar: the sea-port of Aberaëron; and the market town of Trêgaron. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for Cardigan and the rest of the boroughs collectively: the county member, and the member for the district of united boroughs, are elected at Cardigan: the polling-places within the county are Cardigan, Aberystwith, Lampeter, and Trêgaron. Cardiganshire is included in the South Wales circuit: the assizes are held at Cardigan, as also are frequently both the Epiphany and Michaelmas quarter sessions, though sometimes one of these, as suits the magistrates, or is rendered necessary for the despatch of business, is held at Aberystwith, as likewise are the Midsummer quarter sessions; while the Easter sessions are invariably held at Lampeter: the county gaol is at Cardigan; and there are houses of correction for the county both at Cardigan and Aberystwith: there are forty-six acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £20,685, and the expenditure to £20,574, of which £17,213 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The surface of Cardiganshire consists almost wholly of mountains and lofty hills, with their corresponding valleys, having no level tract of any considerable extent. Its northern parts are more particularly mountainous, being entirely composed of a portion of the lofty hills which surround the distinguished summit of Plinlimmon, in the south-western extremity of Montgomeryshire. In Cardiganshire these hills branch into several extensive chains, the most remarkable of which, stretching southward along its eastern border, bounds the vale of the Teivy on the east, and afterwards sweeps through Carmarthenshire into Pembrokeshire. One branch stretches westward between the rivers Dovey and Rheidol; another between the Rheidol and the Ystwith; a third is bounded by the Ystwith on the north-west, and the Teivy on the east, and, extending south-westward, terminates at the river Aëron; and a fourth runs nearly parallel with the last, on the western and north-western side of the Teivy, towards Cardigan. Various detached hills of considerable elevation are scattered in different directions. All of them are universally destitute of wood, and their aspect is bleak, dreary, and desolate in the extreme, seldom presenting any object to relieve the eye from the uniformity of their bare and gently undulating surface, except the projection of numerous naked crags. The late Thomas Johnes, Esq., of Havôd, however, has clothed some of the most elevated and exposed summits on this side of Plinlimmon, approaching the source of the Ystwith, with plantations of larch. Of the great number of natural pools and small lakes, the principal are in the most elevated part of the county, near the summit of the chain of hills approaching the border of Radnorshire, in the vicinity of Strata Florida. They form a cluster, of which Llŷn Teivy, the source of the river Teivy, is the principal, being about a mile and a half in circumference, and its waters not yet fathomed: it is surrounded by a high and perpendicular ridge, and the rocks and stones which lie scattered in every direction, unrelieved by any kind of wood or lively vegetation, impart to the whole surrounding scenery a savage and repulsive aspect. From an elevation at a short distance are seen four other lakes, within a few yards of each other, the largest of which is nearly as extensive as Llŷn Teivy, but less formal in shape; while the smallest, which is circular, and about three quarters of a mile in circumference, occupies the highest ground in the county: these lakes, from their elevated sites are much agitated by the winds. Within a short distance of them is a sixth; and another, called Llŷn Vathegy Cringlas, occurs between Pentre Rhôdven-diged and Castell Eneon; besides which are others in the same quarter, called respectively Llŷn Helygen, Llŷn Hir, Llŷn Gorlan, Llŷn Crwn, Llŷn Gweryddon Vawr, Llŷn Dŵ, Llŷn Gynvelin, Llŷn y rhôdau, Llŷn y cregnant, a second Llŷn Dû, Llŷn y Gorres, Llŷn gynon, and Llŷn cerig llwydion: within half a mile of Lampeter is Llŷn Llanbedr. Other small lakes are seen on the high lands in different parts of the county, and several of them are the sources of rivers. The extent of the sea-coast, from the mouth of the Dovey, on the north, to that of the Teivy on the south, is about forty-six miles: the lands on the shore, along the whole line, are of considerable elevation, excepting only near the mouths of the rivers, where the vales descend to the coast. The vale of the Aëron is most distinguished for extent and fertility: in the vicinity of Ystrad it is of considerable width, and contains various rich and well-cultivated farms. The scenery along the courses of the other rivers is of great variety, from the extreme of rugged and romantic grandeur to the richness and beauty of fruitful vales. The latter, although they increase in breadth and fertility in approaching the sea, are, in few instances, even in their lower levels, entirely devoid of that picturesque character which so frequently distinguishes the higher parts of their course, and is so much heightened by the grandeur of their cascades. The scenery on the banks of the Teivy becomes most beautiful and interesting below Lampeter; and the views about Llandyssul, Newcastle-Emlyn, Llêchryd, and Kîlgerran, are worthy of particular notice, as equalling any river scenery of the same kind in the principality. The Ystwith is characterized by a romantic interest in its course through the delightful scenes, so highly decorated, or rather formed, by the hand of art, which surround Havôd, the mansion of the late Mr. Johnes. The elevation of some of the more remarkable heights is as follows: Trêgaron Down, one thousand seven hundred and forty-seven feet above the level of the sea; Talsarn, one thousand one hundred and forty-two feet; Capel Cynon, one thousand and forty-six feet; and Aberystwith, four hundred and ninety-six feet. The two most extensive bogs in South Wales are in this county: one of them, called Cors Gôch ar Teivy, extends from Trêgaron to Strata Florida, a distance of about five miles, its mean breadth being about a mile and a half: the river Teivy, not far from its source, meanders through it. The other is situated at the northern extremity of the county, adjoining the mouth of the Dovey and the sea-coast, and is between nine and ten thousand acres in extent. A vast level tract of land, called Cantre'r Gwaelod, or "the lowland hundred," is said to have occupied, in former times, the northern part of the present bay of Cardigan, and to have been defended from the sea by artificial banks, which giving way, it was overwhelmed by an inundation about the end of the sixth century, at which period the lord of the territory was one Gwyddno Goranhîr. In the sea, about seven miles to the west of Aberystwith, is still seen a collection of rude stones, called Caer-Wyddno, "the fort, or palace, of Gwyddno;" and adjoining to it, and stretching north-eastward towards the mouth of the Dovey, are vestiges of the southern embankment, called Sarn Gynvelyn: these remarkable objects are left dry at low water of spring tides.

The climate of the mountains is for the most part cold, wet, and tempestuous; and that of the vales is not so humid as in the adjoining county of Carmarthen, as they open to a smaller extent of sea, and the range of mountains separating the vales of Towy and Teivy frequently intercepts rains from the south, which would otherwise be precipitated in this county. In the vicinity of the coast the temperature of the atmosphere is of course much more equable than further inland. The wheat harvest seldom begins before the third week in August, except in one or two more genial spots, which form exceptions to the general climate: that which yields the very earliest crops is Lleiniau Llan Non, a tract noted for the production of barley, where, in forward seasons, this grain is harvested between the 10th and 20th of July. The soils vary rather from difference of situation than of substrata. Most of the higher grounds have a grey light mould, occasionally intermixed with sand, and varying in depth from a few inches to a foot. Peat, however, generally occupies the hollows, and sometimes the slopes of the mountains; and clay abounds near the surface in some places, requiring great expense to render it in any degree productive, a difficulty which is further increased by the great distance from all calcareous rocks. The whole county is included in the great slate and shale tract of South Wales; and the bluer the slate or shale, the more meagre the soil above it: the most grateful of the mountain soils are found upon the anomalous grey mountain rock and the pale grey shale, except where the elevation is too great, or the aspect too bleak. The soils of the vales, being deposits from those of the uplands, increase in fertility as they approach the sea, when the current of the rivers which traverse them becomes less rapid: thus the lower levels of the valleys of the Teivy, Aëron, Ystwith, Rheidol, &c., possess a variety of rich loams, frequently of considerable depth. The coast has generally excellent light and early soils, which have for ages been famous for the production of barley, with little, and in some places without any, alternation with other crops: in most places these soils are more or less mixed with grey porous stones, which are known to be very favourable to the growth of corn, by retaining moisture beneath them during time of drought, and affording regular warmth to the blades of the rising grain: the pastures also abound with these stones, which the farmers will on no account suffer to be removed: the substratum of these soils in the south-western part of the county is in some places a hungry light mould, tinged with oxyde of iron, resting on thick beds of marl, beneath which is found the soft kind of argillaceous schistus, called shale.

The quantity of arable land is of difficult estimation: every farm has a certain proportion, varying according to its soil and aspect. The courses of crops are various; but grain is frequently taken in succession until the land is totally exhausted, and the last crop is scarcely equal to the seed which was sown to produce it: the most common crops are wheat, barley, and black oats. On the best soils the produce of wheat averages about twenty-five bushels: that grown in the vale of Ystwith is remarkably heavy, seldom weighing less than sixty-four lb. per Winchester bushel, and sometimes as much as sixty-seven. The produce of barley, owing to its being sown repeatedly without the intervention of any other crop, is not generally large. Oats are cultivated very extensively: one kind, which very much resembles the avena fatua (bearded oat-grass, or haver), is cultivated on the uplands, to which it is peculiar: it is called blewgeirch, or "hairy oats," and its only excellence consists in its producing a moderate crop in elevated situations, where no other grain can be expected to flourish: the black oat, however, is the most common of all crops on the uplands; its produce is usually small. Wheat is cut with the reaping-hook, and oats and barley with cradled scythes. In the more northern parts of the county a considerable quantity of rye is grown; in the uplands by itself, but in the neighbourhood of Aberystwith frequently with a mixture of wheat: this mixture makes good bread, sweeter and moister than that of wheat alone, and preferred to any other by those accustomed to eat it. The green crops commonly cultivated are peas, beans, and turnips. The kind of pea usually grown is a small, inferior, clay-coloured pea, called pys llwydon bâch, not at all remarkable for productiveness, which, though sown early in February, seldom ripens until late in September: on a poor soil, however, the success of its cultivation is more certain than that of the large grey peas, which are sometimes grown in the vales, as are also white boiling peas in a few of the most favourable situations: the clay-coloured peas are used by the peasantry for soup, and are sometimes thrashed for hogs, but their general use is to be given unthreshed to horses: they are occasionally sown with the hairy oat, and both cut in July for dry fodder. Beans and potatoes are not unfrequently grown together; and buck-wheat is sometimes cultivated. Turnips are not generally grown by the ordinary class of farmers. Hemp is occasionally cultivated in small patches: a singular method is sometimes practised of fermenting the heads, to facilitate the separation of the seed, by burying the tops in the ground, in circular holes of several feet in diameter, the stems being inverted and bound together by straw bands, &c. : straw is also laid about the heads of the bundles, to keep them free from the mould. A few small hop-yards were planted in the valley of the Aëron about twenty-five years ago. The artificial grasses are of the ordinary kinds : although the arable lands of Cardiganshire are subject, like all those of South Wales, to be overrun with natural grasses, yet they are much easier kept clean than those of the adjoining counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke. The meadows of the vales naturally abound with the sweeter species of grasses ; and even those of an inferior quality, when manured with the shelly sea-sand found upon the coast, produce the most nutritious herbage that grows in the county. The meadows, in some parts, are occasionally fogged, that is, the aftermath is left unconsumed on the ground from the Midsummer of one year to the early spring of the next, which the mildness of the winter admits of being done, without detriment to the grass, which in the spring is of great value : this practice also increases the fertility of the land. Irrigation is practised along the course of most streams, except those which, descending from among the lead mines, bring with them mineral particles detrimental to vegetation of every kind. Besides the manures from the farm-yard, lime is the principal used in this county, to the shores of which it is brought by sea from Pembrokeshire : at different places along the coast the farmers buy the stone in its natural state, together with culm from Milford, and burn it themselves : the distance from which these materials are brought renders lime a dear article of manure to the farmers of Cardiganshire, so that they use it very sparingly : it is usual to leave it scattered in small heaps on the land during the whole summer, after which it is spread and ploughed in. A few farmers in the south-western parts of the county apply the marl found there to their lands. Sea-weed, or wrack, in Welsh called gwyimon, is found in great quantities on the coast after gales : as many as two thousand cart-loads have been in one night deposited near New Quay, all of which was carried away by the farmers of the neighbourhood in the course of a fortnight : it is applied in different states, sometimes intermixed with other manures, to both arable and grass lands. Sea-sand, deposited by the tide in the creeks and at the mouths of the rivers, which utterly destroys all weeds, is also abundantly used for the like purpose, and on the barley tract of this county it forms the chief manure, in perpetual alternation with the sea-weed : peat ashes are also sometimes employed. The plough in common use is of the most awkward and clumsy construction, being of the oldest kind known in Wales : the cradle, with the share, the latter of which is ill made and blunt, is at least five feet long, while the mould-board is only a round stake, about seven inches in circumference, fastened from the right heel of the share to the hind part of the plough : in working, not half the cradle rests upon the ground, the hinder parts of it being constantly held up by short awkward handles : the fields ploughed with this implement have generally a very rough appearance.

The harrows are also in general very ill-constructed ; but both ploughs and harrows of improved kinds have been introduced by some of the more opulent farmers. The carts, which are the most common agricultural vehicles, are in general very small, and are drawn either by two oxen yoked to a pole or beam, led by two horses abreast, or by three horses.

The cattle of this county are black, and for the most part small, but hardy and well made : those of Cardigan Lower, that is, of such parts of the county as lie southward of the Vale of Aëron, are of the black Pembrokeshire breed, which are hardy, work well, and fatten readily. All the farmers keep cows for the purposes of breeding and making butter and skimmed-milk cheese : the butter is salted, packed in casks containing each about eighty lb., and exported to Bristol, or taken by higglers to the iron-manufactories of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire. Cardiganshire, more particularly the northern and eastern parts of it, has long been noted for its profitable stock of small mountain sheep, numbers of which are purchased to be fed in other counties of the principality ; they are very small, the hind-quarters seldom weighing more than seven or eight lb., and their wool is coarse and short : the average weight of each fleece is two lb. These sheep are so wild that it is impossible to confine them by any ordinary fences, on which account the rearing of them is discouraged by many landlords. The South Down, Leicester, and Dorset breeds have been introduced, and in some instances intermingled with the native sheep. In the higher districts the sheep are shorn once, generally towards the end of June ; but in the vales, and southward of the Aëron, they undergo two shearings, the first about the end of May, the second about the 10th of October : at neither of these latter periods is the body completely stripped of wool, a circumstance which gives the animal an unsightly appearance : the fleece of the first shearing weighs from half a pound to two pounds, and that of the second from three-fourths of a pound to a pound. The horses are small, but strong and hardy, and much attention has of late years been paid to their improvement, both for draught and for the saddle. The rearing of hogs is an important part of the business of the farmer : they are, for the most part, fed on the refuse of the great quantities of potatoes that are grown on the fallows : their weight is various, and vast numbers are sold to be exported, chiefly to Bristol. The gardens produce an abundance of the ordinary kitchen vegetables, but are not distinguished, like those of the eastern parts of South Wales, for their pleasing neatness. Although orchards are not numerous in Western Wales, the richer valleys of this county, being well sheltered, are highly favourable to the production of fruit, and orchards are more particularly flourishing in the valley of the Teivy, from Lampeter down to the sea. The woods are of comparatively very small extent. The most common trees of native growth are, oak, ash, and alder ; but various others are frequently seen. The most extensive plantations in South Wales have been made on the estate of Havôd, by the late Thomas Johnes, Esq., to whom the county is much indebted for extensive improvements, dictated by a refined taste, both in its arboriculture and agriculture : they are of various kinds of trees, but chiefly of larch. There are several nurseries, which afford a supply of almost all kinds of young forest trees. The districts at present most distinguished for the luxuriant appearance of their woods are, the Vale of Teivy, from Llangedmore upwards, by Llêchryd, Newcastle-Emlyn, Dôl Haidd, Llŷs Newydd, and Llandyssil; the Vale of Aëron, which has its slopes finely decorated with groves, chiefly of oak; the banks of the Ystwith, in the vicinity of Havôd, the plantations around which seat occupy no less than fourteen hundred acres, and adjoin the extensive coppices of Crosswood; and, in the northern part of the county, the estate of Gogerddan: almost every rivulet is, besides, engulfed in a deep ravine, whose sides are clothed with oak, either protected and thriving, or neglected and consisting only of brushwood. The waste lands are of vast extent, and, including the tracts only partially cultivated or enclosed, have been computed to occupy nearly half the surface of the county: the greater part of them are, however, claimed as private property. In the lower parts of the county most of the commons, and the lands which were formerly cultivated in their open state, are now enclosed; but in the more elevated regions there are extensive tracts, which will probably be left for ever in their native wildness, to be depastured by the small hardy mountain sheep and cattle. All the wastes are included in Cardigan Upper, north of the river Aëron, except an elevated range of table land, extending from that river southward to within five miles of Newcastle-Emlyn, on the river Teivy. The fen of Cors Vochno, at the northern extremity of the county, before its enclosure under an act obtained in 1813, contained three thousand acres of sound salt marshes, bordering on the Dovey, three thousand acres of peat or moss, and three thousand five hundred acres of sands. The fuel in most extensive use is peat, of which the best in the principality is said to be obtained from the great bog of Cors Gôch, where it is in many places of unknown depth, and has been dug as deep as twenty feet. The peat in Cors Vochno is also of excellent quality and great depth: when well got in it kindles readily, and gives a greater external heat than most kinds of coal; and its ashes, like those of all the best kinds of peat, are small in quantity and very light. Some stone coal is obtained by sea from the mines of Pembrokeshire. The "Society for the Encouragement of Agriculture and Industry in the County of Cardigan" was established in the year 1784: in its transactions the county is regarded to be under the two distinct divisions of Upper and Lower, the boundary between which is formed by the river Aëron.

The whole of Cardiganshire is geologically included in the great slate and shale tract of South Wales, and produces in different places roofing slates of various qualities, flooring stones, &c., besides an excellent hard kind of building stone, of which the houses of Aberystwith exhibit good specimens, and a kind of sand-stone of a fine grain, found in Penbrŷn parish, which is little inferior to freestone, but of a darker colour. The stratification is in most places very irregular: the grey mountain trap rocks, which produce the excellent building stones above-mentioned, extend in prominent lines from north-east to south-west, the broadest constituting ranges of hills abounding with mineral veins: their stratification is in some places very irregular, while in others it presents regular quadrilateral columns of excessively close texture: it is the most extensively quarried on Llanwenog Hill, to the west of Lampeter; near Llêch-

ryd; and near Penbrŷn; forming good ashlar, tombstones, troughs, rollers, &c.: connected with the rocks are beds of indurated schist, porphyroids, &c. One range of these hills extends the whole length of the county, from the banks of the Dovey to the west of Machynlleth, through the mining districts, to Plumstone mountain in Pembrokeshire. The roofing slates, which vary in colour from grey to blue, are sometimes interstratified with argillaceous schistus of a softer texture, commonly called shale, which soon decomposes when exposed to the action of the atmosphere: this shale is also found singly in various places. The best blue argillaceous slates for roofing are quarried and dressed at Ynis Hir, near Cors Vochno; and various other quarries of the same material occur along the sea-coast; but none of any extent have been opened in the interior, and the slates are far inferior in size and quality to those of Carnarvonshire. The strata of blue schist also, in numerous places, afford excellent building-stones, of which the new gaol and the church tower at Cardigan are good specimens: the blue colour of this stone, when neatly worked, gives it a very pleasing appearance. Large veins of a very hard and glossy white spar, called hungry spar rider, frequently occur among the other strata. The strata nearest the surface, in the south-western part of the county, consist of the clay marl, which is sometimes used as a manure: the higher layers of it are brown and of an inferior quality; the lower are blue and richer, resting immediately on the schistose strata above described: the eastern and northern boundary of this tract of clay marl, crossing the Teivy into this county from the vicinity of Penboyr, in Carmarthenshire, curves north-westward towards the mouth of the Aëron, forming on the land side part of the periphery of a circle, within which is included the whole south-western part of the county: between Llanina and New Quay the cliff overhanging the sea is composed, for the most part, of this marl, which there varies in depth from six to twenty feet and upwards.

Cardiganshire forms one of the richest and most extensive mining fields in Britain. The veins generally bear east and west, with very few exceptions, which run in a transverse direction from north to south: the matrix is chiefly quartz, not unfrequently mixed with blende and spar, and imbedded mostly in grey mountain rock, though sometimes in argillaceous schistus: some veins containing lead-ore have been discovered even in the peat bogs. As it has been so long celebrated for its produce of silver, as well as of lead, a concise historical description of the working of its mines may not be uninteresting. Among these, the open and oblong trenches of the Roman miners, and the vertical pits or shafts of the Danes, have been recognised by different antiquaries. During a long period subsequent to the Norman conquest of South Britain, the property of all mines was claimed by the reigning monarch, and no private individual could dig for ore, even on his own estate, without especial leave from the crown. A patent, granted by Queen Elizabeth, in 1563, to Thomas Thurland and Daniel Houghsetter, two German adventurers and metallurgists, assigning to them, upon certain terms, "all the mines royal of gold, silver, copper, and quicksilver" within several specified counties of England, and the principality of Wales, became, in 1567, the foundation of a corporation consisting of twenty-four persons, among whom were several noblemen, called the "Society for the Mines Royal," within the several districts specified in the above-mentioned patent. The most eligible of the Cardiganshire mines were worked for some time at the joint expense and for the joint profit of this company; but it may be presumed that the latter was hardly a sufficient remuneration for the former, since the society was at length induced to let the whole of them to Mr., afterwards Sir Hugh, Myddelton, for the low annual rental of £400: this gentleman acquired by the speculation an immense fortune, which he wholly and nobly expended on that arduous undertaking, the construction of the New River, for the supply of London with water: the mine of Cwm Symlog was the most valuable of those worked by him, its ore producing forty ounces of silver to every ton of lead. After his death, in 1631, the royal mines of Cardiganshire were leased to Sir Francis Godolphin, Bart., of Cornwall, and Thomas Bushel, Esq.; and on the death of the former, the whole management of them devolved to the latter, who worked about six of them. Charles I., in 1637, granted this gentleman a license to coin the produce of his mines of silver, at Aberystwith, into pennies, twopences, sixpences, shillings, and half-crowns, instead of conveying it at great expense and risk, as formerly, to the mint in the Tower of London: this coinage was distinguished by being stamped with the ostrich plume which forms the crest of the Prince of Wales: Lundy Island, in the Bristol channel, was also granted to Mr. Bushel, as a dépôt for the produce of his mines. Favoured by these singular advantages, this gentleman rapidly acquired an immense fortune, with which, on the breaking out of the great civil war of the seventeenth century, he was enabled to render his royal benefactor signal service, by clothing the whole of his army, and advancing him a loan of forty thousand pounds: he afterwards raised a regiment from among his own miners, which he maintained to the end of the contest at his own charge. Aberystwith probably not being considered a place of sufficient security, the bullion, during that turbulent period, was conveyed to be minted at Shrewsbury: on the return of peace, Mr. Bushel changed the scene of his mining operations from this county to the limestone hills of Mendip, in Somersetshire; and from this period the extent of the works in Cardiganshire seems to have gradually declined. Bushel published several small tracts, from 1642 to 1649, in which he enumerates the mines of Darren-Vawr, Brÿn-llwyd, Tâl y bont, Goginan, and Cwm Ervin, in this county. It seems probable that he did not live later than the period of the Restoration, for at that time the mines royal of Cardiganshire became the property of a company, of which Sir John Pettus, author of Fodina Regales, was a member. Cwm Symlog, though deserted by the last proprietor for others in the neighbourhood more profitable, now again became a considerable silver mine, as also did those of Darren-Vawr, Cwm Ervin, Goginan, Tâl y bont, Cwm Ystwith, Tre'r Ddôl, Trawscoed, and Rhôs-Vawr: the smelting-houses and refining-mills of this company were situated, conveniently for exportation, on the river Dovey, in the township of Scybor y Coed, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Geneu'r-Glyn, and, from the use to which they were applied, were commonly called silver mills. The exercise of the prerogative of the crown, in claiming as mines royal all those of which the ores yielded silver sufficient to pay the expense of extracting it, and the loss of lead experienced in this process, occasioned several expensive and vexatious law-suits between the proprietors of the mines and the patentees of the crown, the last of which was concerning a very rich vein, discovered in 1690, at Bwlch yr Esgair Hîr, the property of Sir Carbery Pryse, and since commonly called the Welsh Potosi. Sir Carbery engaged the Duke of Leeds and other powerful noblemen as partners in his newly-opened mine; and by their interest was procured the celebrated act of the 6th of William and Mary, entitled, "An Act to prevent Disputes and Controversies concerning Royal Mines," which vested the mineral treasures in the proprietors of the soil, reserving to the crown the right of pre-emption at fixed prices, according to the value of the ores. Waller, agent to the company of mine adventurers of England, about the close of the seventeenth century, published a pamphlet for the information of his employers, containing a very favourable estimate of the mineral treasures of this county, a subject which he further illustrated, in the year 1700, by publishing an account of the Cardiganshire mines, with a map of the mining tract, and plans of nine different works, which was followed, in the same year, by an "Abstract of the present state of the mines in Bwlch yr Esgair Hîr, &c." After the death of Sir Carbery Pryse, his mining estates, through a female heir, became the property of Sir Humphrey Mackworth, who, in the year 1700, in conjunction with the other members of the company formed by Sir Carbery, took a lease, for ninety-nine years, of certain places, called Bwlch Cwm Ervin, Pwll yr Ynad, and Goginan, and afterwards carried on, at these and other places, numerous and extensive mining-works. About the year 1709, however, discords arose among the partners, which eventually ruined the mining interest in this district. In 1744, Esgair Hîr, Tâl y bont, Cwm Symlog, and most other leases in the county, were abandoned: Goginan, Cwm Ervin, and Brÿn-pica were retained, but not worked; while the four mines of Pencraig ddû, Gröau Gwynion, Cwm Ystwith, and Eurglawdd only were worked: and ever since that time only partial, temporary, and frequently ineffectual, trials have been made in search of ores by different adventurers, except for a short period under the direction of Mr. Lewis Morris, the Welsh antiquary, who, in 1750, was appointed agent and superintendent of the king's mines in Wales. Those now worked are numerous, but none of them are conducted on an extensive scale. Together with others now abandoned, they amount to about fifty: the greater number is situated in a district extending nearly from the shores of the Dovey, south-eastward across the Rheidiol and Ystwith, to the source of the Teivy; and most of the remainder in a line along the eastern bank of the latter river. Nearly all the mines now worked produce lead, with every ton of which, in the Cwm Symlog mine, are obtained forty ounces of silver; in that of Darren-Vawr, thirty-five ounces; and in that of Llanvair, one hundred ounces, the last being at this time considered the richest in Cardiganshire. This mine, too, produces a small quantity of copper-ore, as also do those of Ynys Cynvelin and Eurglawdd, near Tâl y bont. On a waste in the manor of Creuddyn, near Cwm Ystwith lead mine, much copper-ore was formerly raised, but very little has been procured of late years. Sulphate of zinc, blende, or black-jack, is obtained in vast quantities in the mining districts, and is generally worked with the lead: in some mines the latter is in the greater proportion, as at Llywernog, Penbank, &c.; but in others the ores of zinc predominate, as at Gwaith Côch, Nant y Meirch, Rhiw Regoes, Nant y Crair, and Llwyn Unhweh: some mines, indeed, are worked exclusively for the zinc. The quality, as well as the quantity, of lead-ore obtained from the different mines is very various; and it is most likely that there are other valuable mineral veins yet unexplored.

The chief manufacture is that of coarse stockings and flannels, almost wholly for home consumption; and, though of a domestic nature, it is expedited by carding machines scattered over the country at convenient distances, and by spinning-jennies in the farmers' and cottagers' houses. The Cardiganshire wool has long been noted for its felting quality, owing to which, and to the cheapness and abundance of peat fuel, the hat-manufactories are very numerous: in these are made most of the common hats worn in South Wales, which are strong and durable: the wool of the Michaelmas shearing is the best for this purpose. The above manufactures consume the greater part of the wool produced in the county. The fisheries, though formerly of considerable importance, are not now carried on extensively, though Cardigan bay affords great variety and abundance of fish: the kinds most sought after and taken are herrings and salmon, by a few boats belonging to Aberystwith and the other small ports: herrings generally make their appearance in the bay from the middle to the end of September. The salmon fishery in the river Teivy is very considerable, one hundred of the coracles described below being sometimes seen busily employed within the space of two miles in the navigable part of its course. The right of fishery, as far as the tide flows, which is to the weir at Llêchryd, is claimed by the crown; and a lease of the river was granted on that ground, but to no purpose, the peasant fishermen claiming it by immemorial prescriptive right. This county not only produces sufficient grain for the supply of its own inhabitants, but also exports considerable quantities of barley and oats to the western and southern coasts of England. Its commerce, however, is on a very contracted scale: the chief exports are, its mineral produce of lead, sulphate of zinc, and argillaceous roofing slates; cattle, sheep, and hogs to England; butter, as above-mentioned; wool, chiefly for the manufactures of the North of England; hats, to other Welsh counties; and leather, to Bristol: the chief extraordinary imports are coal and limestone. The external commerce of Cardiganshire is greatly facilitated by its maritime situation and the number of its ports, which are chiefly frequented by small coasting vessels. The most southern of these, namely that of Cardigan, is formed by the lower reaches of the Teivy, the entrance of which river is, however, much obstructed by a bar, covered at high water of neap tides by from ten and a half to eleven feet of water, and at ordinary spring tides from fifteen to sixteen feet. Aberporth, two leagues further eastward, has a secure road; and Llanina, or New Quay, has an excellently sheltered road, with a small pier. Aberaeron has a small harbour at the mouth of the Aëron, which has two piers, and the bar of which is dry at low water. The small port of Aberarth, almost contiguous to the latter, has likewise a bar, dry at low water. The port of Aberystwith, being greatly exposed to the south-west winds, is so much choked with sand as to prevent the entrance of ships of any considerable burden, except at spring tides, when the bar has about fourteen feet of water: this place, besides the articles above-mentioned, exports oak timber and poles to the Pembrokeshire collieries. The mouth of the Dovey also forms a harbour for small vessels, which has of late years greatly risen in importance.

The rivers, taking each an independent course to the sea, are numerous in proportion to the size of the county: the principal are the Teivy, the Ystwith, and the Rheidiol, or Rheidol. The Teivy issues in a very insignificant stream from the lake called Llŷn Teivy, situated near the highest summit of the mountains in the eastern part of the county, and flows immediately southward, over a rocky bed, to the vicinity of the ruined abbey of Strata Florida: hence it winds first westward and then southward to Trêgaron, receiving in this part of its course the Meyrig, Marchnant, Camddwr, and other small streams. Flowing south-south-westward from Trêgaron to Lampeter, a little above the latter town, and at the distance of eleven miles from its source, it becomes the southern boundary of Cardiganshire, which it continues to form throughout the rest of its course, separating it first for twenty-seven miles from Carmarthenshire, and afterwards from Pembrokeshire: a little below Trêgaron the Teivy is joined from the east by the romantic mountain stream called the Berwyn, which descends from a lake of the same name, five miles distant, and afterwards, before reaching Lampeter, receives from the same side the Brevi and the Clywedog. Below Lampeter it runs for the most part westward, until, after being joined successively from the north by the streams of the Croyddyn, Crannell, Clettwr, Cerdyn, and Cerry, and by another small stream at Cardigan, it turns nearly northward, a little below the latter town, and flows in a majestic stream into that expanse of St. George's channel called Cardigan bay, after a course of fifty-three miles. The Teivy is navigable up to Cardigan for vessels of rather more than two hundred tons' burden, and up to Llêchryd bridge, to which place the tide flows, for barges: its tributaries are more numerous than copious, and the greater part of its course is through narrow mountainous defiles. The salmon of the Teivy are esteemed particularly fine and delicious, and have a peculiar marbled appearance: great quantities are annually caught, dried, and sent to the London and other English markets: this is the most northern of the Welsh rivers in which the fish called the sewin is found. Giraldus states, that in his time this river was inhabited by the beaver; and on this, more than most other rivers of Wales, is used a small fishing boat of singular construction, called by the Welsh corwg, and by the English corruptly coracle, which is not adapted to carry conveniently more than one person: in form it is nearly oval, but flattened at one end like the stern of a common ship's boat, its length being usually from five to six feet, and its breadth about four. The frame is formed of split rods, which are plaited like basket-work, and covered on the outside, sometimes with a raw hide, but more commonly with strong coarse flannel, which is made water-proof by a thick coating of pitch and tar: a narrow board is fastened across the middle, on which the fisherman sits and guides his little bark with a paddle. When proceeding to their employment, or returning from it, the fishermen fasten these boats, the weight of which is generally from forty to fifty lb., on their backs, by means of a leathern strap attached to the seat, which they pass round their bodies. The Ystwith has its source among the hills on the borders of Montgomeryshire and Radnorshire, and, rushing westward in an impetuous torrent past the mines of Cwm Ystwith, and through a deep precipitous gulph, afterwards flows over a more level bed through the rich scenes of Havôd, and still further pursues a picturesque, but less romantic, course to Cardigan bay, into which it falls, after a course of about twenty-two miles, a little southward of Aberystwith, to which place it gives name. The Rheidiol, or Rheidol, rises in a small lake, called Llygad Rheidol, or "the Eye of Rheidol," on the western side of the Plinlimmon group of mountains, near the sources of the Severn and the Wye: the early part of its course, which it pursues south-westward, is distinguished by no remarkable feature; but its bed, as it approaches Ysppyty Cen Vaen, lies along the rocky bottom of a deep, precipitous, and woody gulph, where it is repeatedly thrown with prodigious violence, and in foaming torrents from a great height into natural basins, which foam like vast boiling cauldrons: immediately below the inn called the Havôd Arms it receives from the east the smaller river Mynach, which, darting through the deep cleft in the rocks which is crossed by the Devil's Bridge, throws itself into the Rheidol over a succession of precipices, and in an almost unbroken cataract: thus augmented, the Rheidol flows westward by Llanbadarn-Vawr, a little below which it turns southward by the town of Aberystwith, and falls into the sea near the mouth of the Ystwith. The town of Aberystwith has derived its name from its situation at the junction of the Ystwith with the Rheidol: these two rivers, having, at a subsequent period, become divided by the operation of floods, which caused them to enter the bay of Cardigan in separate places, were, a few years ago, artificially re-united, by a cut made in order that the land floods of both might more effectually keep open the mouth of the harbour. The Dyvi, or Dovey, a Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire river, forms the northern boundary of this county for about seven miles, from Llyvnant to the mouth of its small æstuary, and is navigable the whole distance. Between the Dovey and the Rheidol the principal streams which discharge their waters separately into the sea are the Clarach and the Leri. Southward of the Ystwith occur successively the Gwyre, or Gwyrail, which rises near Llanvihangel-Lledrod, and, flowing south-westward through the Cardiganshire barley tract, falls into the sea at Llanrhystid; the Arth, which issues from a small lake in the upper part of the hundred of Penarth, to which it gives name, and, running due west, falls into the sea at Aberarth; and the Aëron, which is next in magnitude to the principal rivers above described, and waters the rich valley to which it gives name: the latter stream has its source in a small lake called Llŷn Aedwen, in the parish of Llanrhystid, whence it flows southward to Llangetho, and thence in a very devious course by Talsarn and Tŷglyn, to the sea at Aberaëron. Various smaller streams also take each a distinct course to Cardigan bay. The celebrated river Tywy, or Towy, most of the course of which is in the county of Carmarthen, has its source in an extensive morass in the alpine valley of Berwin, in this county, near Llŷn Teivy: thence it takes its course southward, at first through a rugged, dreary, and inhospitable region, and afterwards through a more romantic and occasionally wooded vale, until it enters Carmarthenshire near Ystrad Fin, about eleven miles from its source: the principal streams which join the Towy from this county are the Camddwr, the Dethia, and the Pyscottwr. The small river Claerwen, which issues from a lake called Llŷn Rhuddon Vâch, among the mountains on the eastern border of the county, after separating it from Brecknockshire for a few miles, enters the latter in its course to the Irvon. The Elain, which rises near the summit of the mountains a little to the south of Cwm Ystwith, flows eastward to the Wye, which it joins a few miles below Rhaiadr in Radnorshire. The roads are now in general pretty good, although the communication between the different towns was formerly attended with considerable difficulty: the materials used in making and repairing them are the grey mountain rock and the more indurated of the slate strata. The passage over the Teivy has been more facilitated by the erection of bridges than that over most Welsh rivers, for it is crossed by thirteen above Cardigan: in those parts of the county where the grey mountain rock is not found, many of the old bridges are of timber. Cardiganshire is traversed from east to west by two principal lines of road from England. The road from London to Cardigan, continued to St. David's, enters across the Teivy from Llandovery, in Carmarthenshire, and passes through Lampeter, and down the valley of that river to Cardigan, whence it re-crosses the Teivy into Pembrokeshire. That from London to Aberystwith enters from Rhaiadr, in Radnorshire, and runs immediately westward to that town: the road from London to Trêgaron, in this county, branches from the latter at Presteign, in Radnorshire, through Radnor and Builth. A line of road extends from Aberystwith to Shrewsbury, by way of the Devil's Bridge, or Pont ar Vrynach; but it has not been so much used since the formation of a more level line up the valley of Rheidol to Eisteddva Gurig, where it joins the old road to the Devil's Bridge, which was opened in the spring of 1831, and forms one of the greatest of modern improvements within the county. Another improved line of road from Aberystwith to Machynlleth is much wanted.

The remains of antiquity are numerous and of various periods. In the churchyard of Ysppyty Cynvyn are four large stones standing upright in the ground, and forming part of a Druidical circle. Near the seat called Carrog, a few miles from Llanllwchairn, are two upright stones, about ten feet high and five thick, which, from the appearance of the ground in the vicinity, have evidently formed part of a circle of the same kind: and there are remains of another on a hill called Alltgoch, near the town of Lampeter. Another relic, of a no less remote period and of some celebrity, is that called Gwely Taliesin, "the Bed, or Grave, of Taliesin," situated on a mountain called Pen Sarn-ddû, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Geneu'r-Glyn: it consists of a rude stone chest, formed by five upright stones, with another of larger dimensions for a cover, or lid, measuring about six feet by three: this chest was placed in the centre of an artificial mound, surrounded by two concentric circles of stones, the larger about thirty feet, and the smaller twenty-seven feet, in diameter. At Llanio-issa, about seven miles above Lampeter, in the Vale of Teivy, very extensive remains of Roman buildings have been discovered, which Sir R. C. Hoare and others consider as indicating the site of the station or city of Loventium, and where there has evidently been an important Roman settlement: the ground for a considerable extent is strewn with fragments of bricks and earthen utensils, and on one spot have been traced the foundations of a building, one hundred and fifty feet long, and seventy-two broad: various coins and inscribed stones have also been found here. There is a small Roman camp in the vicinity of Lampeter, near the banks of the little river Dulais; and a square intrenchment, probably formed by the same conquerors, is visible on a farm called Tŷcam, in the parish of Llanwenog. The remains of the Via Occidentalis, and its branches in this county, are every where called Sarn Helen, or "Helen's Causeway," a corruption of Sarn Lleon, or "the Legionary Way." Entering it on the north from the station at Penallt, near Machynlleth, the main road proceeded in a direct line to Loventium, at Llanio, and traces of it are yet visible, first on a farm called Llwyn-rhingyll, in the parish of Llanbadarn-Vawr, and afterwards on another, called Brenau, in the parish of Llanvihangel y Creiddyn: adjacent to its course, in the Vale of the Teivy, below Trêgaron, is an artificial mount, called Tommen Llanio, perhaps the site of a Roman watch-tower. From the last-mentioned station the main line of the Via Occidentalis proceeded direct to Menapia, at the western extremity of Pembrokeshire, and has been traced below Lampeter, running parallel with the course of the river Teivy, which it crossed in the vicinity of Pencarreg, and is again visible on the Carmarthenshire side of the valley, along which it proceeded through the parishes of Llanllwney and Penboyr, in the latter of which some parts of it still remain entire. A branch of this road may yet be traced in many places, crossing the Teivy at the village of Llanvair, above Lampeter, and ascending, immediately beyond it, the mountains in the parish of Kellan, which bound this county on the south, in its course to the station at Llanvair ar y brŷn, in Carmarthenshire: another branch extended from the vicinity of Lampeter to the station at Carmarthen. The number of British fortifications in Cardiganshire is very great: one of the most ancient, and certainly the most remarkable, is situated on a farm called Ciliau, or "the Retreats," in the neighbourhood of Llandysilio-Gogo, and is a large circular enclosure, about sixty-eight yards in diameter, divided into three compartments, and surrounded by rude ramparts of stones, from which it has acquired the name of Y Garn Wen, or "the White Heap." Near the church of the same parish is an ancient circular fortification, called Castell Llwyn Davydd, and sometimes Castell Caerwedros, about two hundred feet in diameter, defended by two deep ditches, with ramparts of corresponding height. In the parish of Llanvihangel-Penbrŷn is a very extensive British camp, called Castell Nadolig, formed by three ditches and embankments, near which is a large tumulus; and at the distance of about half a mile is another, of equal size and strength, called Castell Pwntan. Near the village of Blaenporth are, an encampment called the Gaer, and two others, called respectively Caer Lonydd and Castell Tydur, the latter of which is on the sea-coast. There are divers ancient intrenchments within the limits of the county, namely, one called Cribyn Clottas, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Ystrad; another of considerable extent, called Castell Moeddyn, at the southern extremity of the parish of Llanarth; a third called Pen y Gaer, in the same vicinity; a fourth in the neighbourhood of the mansion called Llwyn Dyrys, on the banks of the Teivy, near which is a large artificial mound, or barrow; several in the parish of Lampeter, one of which is situated on the same eminence with the supposed Druidical stones above-mentioned; and a variety of small ones on the hills in the parish of Kellan. A short distance to the north-west of Trêgaron is an intrenchment of considerable extent, forming a segment of a circle, and strongly situated in the midst of a deep morass: it is commonly called Castell Fleming, from its having been considered as a work of some of the Flemish invaders of the country; but it is thought by antiquaries to be of British construction. The parish of Trêgaron, besides several of the sepulchral heaps of stones called carneddau, contains also a singular embankment of earth, extending from east to west a distance of several miles, called Cwys Ychain Banawg, or "the Furrow of the Bannog Oxen," from a fabulous tradition current in the neighbourhood: Dr. Meyrick, the historian of the county, considers it as the remains of an old British road. An ancient intrenched fortification, called Plâs Crûg, occupies the summit of a hill in a wide marsh, adjacent to the village of Llanbadarn. Near Wervilbrook, in the vicinity of Llandysilio-Gogo, are several carneddau, or sepulchral heaps of stones: divers monuments of the same kind are situated in the parish of Llanvihangel-Penbrŷn, and many others on the mountains in the parish of Kellan. Near the little river Frwd, in this parish, is a large stone called Llêch Cynon or "Cynon's Stone;" and on a mountain to the north are several kistvaens, one of which is called Bedd y Vorwyn, or "the Maiden's Grave." Besides the carneddau on these mountains, there are several single stones of great magnitude, only one or two of which, however, now retain their originally erect position. Various ancient upright monumental stones of large size, all bearing inscriptions much defaced, are visible near the church of Llandewy-Brevi; and a single one in a field called Maes Mynach, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Ystrad, together with a remarkable monument of the same kind, ornamented with Runic knots, but without any inscription. In the vicinity of Llanwenog is a very large barrow, called Crûg yr Udon; near the passage over the river Clettwr, called Rhŷd Owain, or "Owen's Ford," is another, called Tommen Rhŷd Owain; and on the summit of a hill in the vicinity of Llangranog is a third, which gives to the spot where it stands the name of Pen Moel Badell. About six miles from Llanrhŷtid is a lofty mountain, called Mynydd Trichrûg, from three tumuli near its summit. There are artificial mounts, supposed to be the sites of ancient fortresses, situated respectively at Castle Hill, near the point where the road from Aberystwith to Rhaiadr and that from Machynlleth to Trêgaron and Lampeter intersect each other; and a little to the north of the church of Lampeter, near the banks of the Teivy, in the parish of Llanwenog; besides which, in the parish of Llanbadarn-Vâch, near the seat called Mynachtŷ, are several, called Hên Gastell.

At the time of the general dissolution of religious houses there were, at Cardigan, a small Benedictine priory; at Llandewy-Brevi, a college of priests; at

Llanleir, a Cistercian nunnery; and at Ystrad-Flur, a Cistercian abbey, commonly called that of Strata Florida. Inconsiderable fragments of the walls yet point out the site of the abbey of Strata Florida: the chief relic is a beautiful round-arched gateway. On the premises of a house in the town of Lampeter, called the Priory, are some small remains of an ancient monastic edifice. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the churches of Cardigan; Eglwys Newydd, or New Church, within the grounds of Havôd; Llanarth, Llanbadarn-Vawr, Llandewy-Brevi, Llandyssil, Llansantfraed, and Trêgaron. There are striking remains of the castle of Aberystwith, and of those of Cardigan, Castell Gwalter (on the summit of a lofty hill near the church of Llanvihangel-Geneu 'r-Glyn), and Ystrad-Meirig. There are also inconsiderable remains of an ancient fortress at Aberaëron, called Castell Cadwgan; of Castell Stephan, or "Stephen's Castle," at Lampeter; of a fortress on a hill near the church of Llandyssil, formerly called Castell Gwynionydd, but now Castell Coed-von; and of an ancient fortress near Aberystwith, called Llanychaïarn Castle. On a mound near the village of Blaenporth anciently stood a fortress of great strength; a moated hill near the river Clettwr, in the vicinity of the farm called Castle Howel, indicates the site of an ancient mural fortification of the same name; at a place called Cil y Graig, in the parish of Llandyssil, is an artificial mound, the site of a castle called in the Welsh annals Castell Aber-einon; near the church of Bangor is a moated mount, called Castell Pistog; and near the village of Trêvilan is a lofty mound, on which anciently stood Trêvilan castle, though Dr. Meyrick has placed the site of this fortress at the small mounds called Hên Gastell, in the parish of Llanbadarn-Vâch, above mentioned. There are yet some fragments of the ancient town walls of Cardigan. This county contains several remarkable old mansions; and on the eastern part of the Teivy, below Llandewy-Brevi, are the ruins of an ancient and magnificent mansion, called, from the parish in which it is situated, Plâs Llanvair-Clywedogau, once the residence of the ancestors of the late T. Jones, Esq., of Havôd. The more modern seats most worthy of notice are, Alderbrook Hall, in the parish of Troedyraur, the residence of J. Lloyd Williams, Esq.; Blaenpant, in the parish of Llandygwidd, that of W. O. Brigstocke, Esq.; Bronwydd, in the parish of Llangunllo, that of Thomas Lloyd, Esq.; Coedmore, near Llêchryd, that of T. Lloyd, Esq.; Crosswood, that of the Earl of Lisburne; Derry Ormond, in the parish of Bettws-Bledrws, that of I. Jones, Esq.; Falcon Dale, that of — Harford, Esq.; Allt-yr-Odin, in the parish of Llandyssil, that of John Lloyd, Esq.; Gernos, in the parish of Llangunllo, that of Major Parry; Gelli dywyll that of W. O. Brigstocke, Esq.; Havôd, or Havôd-Uchtryd, the elegant and justly celebrated residence of the late T. Jones, Esq.; High Mead, in the parish of Llanwenog, the seat of Major Evans; Llanerchaëron House, in the Vale of Aëron, that of Colonel Lewis; Llanleir, in the parish of Ystrad-Meirig, that of Colonel Lewes; Llanvaughan, near Llanwenog, that of the late John Thomas, Esq., Rear-Admiral of the Red; Llwynduris, that of John Griffiths, Esq.; Mabus, in the parish of Llanrhÿstid, that of Colonel Lloyd; Noyadd Llanarth, that of Lord Kensington; Noyadd Trêvawr, in the parish of Llandygwidd, that of Captain Webley Parry; Pigeonsford, in the parish of Llangranog, that of G. B. I. Price, Esq.; Stradmore Vale, near the banks of the Teivy, below Newcastle-Emlyn, that of Dr. Sheriff; Troedyraur House, in the parish of Troedyraur, that of the Rev. Thomas Bowen; and Tÿglyn, in the parish of Llandewy Aberarth, that of the late Mrs. Thomas Jones Gwynne. Great improvements have of late years taken place in the appearance and comfort of the farm-houses and offices, which were formerly of a very inferior class, more particularly as wanting granaries. The appearance of the cottages is for the most part very wretched, to which the frequent want of good building materials greatly contributes: their walls are of mud, about five feet high, with a low thatched roof, surmounted at one end by a wattle and dab chimney, frequently held together by hay-rope bandages, and greatly inclining from the perpendicular. Fences of sods, or of stones and sods in alternate layers, are common in the tracts near the coast. The fences, which are entirely of sod and mould, are raised five or six feet high on a base of as many feet wide, from which they slope upwards to a breadth of three, two and a half, or two feet, with a double facing of green sods. These are effectual barriers, but the tracts where they are seen have a dreary and naked appearance, although of late years it has become a common practice to plant or sow furze and hawthorns on the tops of these mounds. The stones, sometimes placed in alternate layers in them, extend in length towards the centre of the bank; and those by which many of them are entirely faced are commonly laid according to the Roman method of building walls, as described by Vitruvius, and as seen in many old Roman edifices. The favourite and ordinary bread of the peasantry is that made from barley-meal, unleavened, and baked in thin cakes on cast-iron plates over the ordinary fires. On some of the hills separating the vales of the Towy and the Teivy oats and barley are sown together, threshed, kiln-dried, and ground into meal, from which is made a kind of bread called sipris. Oaten bread is sometimes used in the uplands, and rye bread is not uncommon in some parts of the county. Servants are hired at the autumn or spring fairs, but for the most part at the former: at Aberystwith, the first Monday in November and the first Monday in May are called "hiring Mondays," on which great numbers from the surrounding country meet for the purpose. This county contains several mineral springs, sulphureous, or powerfully chalybeate: two of the most remarkable are Fynnon y Graig, near Llÿn Teivy, and Aberystwith spa. The other chief natural curiosities of Cardiganshire are its waterfalls, of which the most remarkable, besides those of distinguished romantic beauty in the grounds of Havôd, are those of the small river Mynach, a little below the Devil's Bridge, which are four in number, and in immediate succession, the first being twenty, the second sixty, the third twenty, and the fourth about one hundred, feet in perpendicular height; those on the larger stream of the Rheidiol, into which the Mynach immediately falls, which are particularly sublime and romantic; and those on a tributary of the Teivy, near the church of Hênllan, called Frydiau Hênllan, or "the Hênllan Falls." There are also waterfalls and a salmon leap at Cenarth, in the parish of Llandygwidd.

CAREGRINA, or CREGRINA (CRÛGYNAU), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Builth, containing 119 inhabitants. This place is situated upon the banks of the river Edw, or Edwy, which falls into the Wye at Aberedw. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanbadarn y garreg annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small structure of mean appearance, consisting of a nave and a chancel, neither of which is ceiled; it has no tower, but there is one bell hanging under a small shed. This parish participates in the bequest of the Rev. Rees Powell, of Boughrood, who left certain property for charitable purposes, among which is the apprenticing of one child from it; and the Rev. Thomas Williams gave ten shillings per annum for the relief of decayed housekeepers. A little above the church there is an artificial elevation, surrounded by a moat, called Pennard's Mount, probably a corruption of the Welsh word Penarth, which is descriptive of its situation at the head, or in front, of a hill: though nothing authentic has been recorded of it, it was, most likely, at some remote period, occupied by a fortress, as it appears well situated for defending the pass of the river and the descent from the hills, being just above a bend of the river, communicating with an ancient castle in the parish of Glâscomb, from which it was easy to apprise Colwyn castle, the head of the lordship, of any approach. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £108. 3.

CAREW, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Pembroke, on the road from Narberth, containing 1020 inhabitants. This parish probably derives its name, which was perhaps originally Caerau, from several ancient British fortifications, upon the site of some of which a magnificent castle in the Norman style was erected by Gerald de Windsor, lieutenant to Ralph de Montgomery, and who, on the subsequent disgrace of that baron, was appointed by Henry I. castellan of Pembroke. Gerald married Nêst, daughter of Rhÿs ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, with whom, among other manors, he obtained that of Carew, on which he built a strong and superb castle, equally adapted to the purposes of a military fortress and a splendid baronial residence. Before Gerald was well fixed in his new palace, it was attacked by Owain, the son of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, who, being informed of the surpassing beauty of Nêst, at a banquet given by Caëdwgan, at the castle of Aberteivy, or, as some think, at that of Eare Weare, in the parish of Amroath, became enamoured of her, and assaulting the castle at night, with a party of his adherents, carried her off by force. This celebrated structure, of which the ruins plainly indicate its pristine grandeur, descended to William, the son of Gerald, who first assumed the name of Carew, probably corrupted from Caerau, and continued for several generations in his family, till the reign of Henry VII., when Sir Edmond Carew mortgaged the estate to Sir Rhÿs ab Thomas, who, it is generally believed, added the noble suite of state apartments on the north-east, and made it his residence during the latter period of his life. Sir Rhÿs being a knight of the most noble order of the garter, and unable from age and infirmity to attend his sovereign in London, on the celebration of St. George's day, kept that festival with princely magnificence at his castle of Carew, upon which occasion he entertained with sumptuous hospitality six hundred of the principal nobility and gentry of the surrounding country, whom he feasted for a whole week, and diverted with jousts, tournaments, and other exercises of chivalry. On the attainder of Gruffydd ab Rhÿs, son of the above nobleman, in the reign of Henry VIII., the estate was leased for a term of years to Sir Andrew Perrot and others, from whom the remainder of the term was subsequently purchased by Sir John Carew, lineal descendant of Sir Edward Carew, to whom the whole was granted in fee by Charles I. Thomas Carew, Esq., great grandson of Sir John, dying in 1760, without male issue, the estate was divided between his two daughters and coheireses, and is now the property of John Warrington Carew, Esq., of Cromcombe Court, in the county of Somerset. The castle was erected on a peninsular promontory of inconsiderable elevation, in the southern branch of Upton creek in Milford haven, and occupies a quadrangular area of considerable extent, defended at the angles with massive circular towers: the more ancient part, built in the reign of William Rufus, is in the Norman style of architecture, and the splendid range of state apartments, on the north-east, is in the most elaborate and finished style of the later English. The ruins are extensive, and may be regarded as among the most interesting and beautiful in the principality: the walls of several of the noble apartments and of the chapel are still remaining, and are replete with elegant detail; the former consisted of a noble range, two stories in height, lighted by lofty square-headed windows of elegant design, and enriched with beautiful tracery; and the exterior of the front was decorated with two lofty and spacious oriel windows. From the towers, to the summits of which an ascent is afforded by staircases in a dilapidated condition, an extensive and pleasing prospect is obtained of the haven, on one side, and of the surrounding country on the other, which abounds with interesting scenery, enlivened by numerous seats in the vicinity. Within the parish are several gentlemen's seats, of which the principal are, Milton House, formerly part of the extensive estate belonging to Upton castle, and now the property and residence of William Bowen, Esq., an elegant modern mansion, pleasantly situated within grounds tastefully laid out, and comprehending some interesting and diversified scenery; Freestone Hall, the residence of J. Allen, Esq., commanding from the grounds some of the finest views in the county, embracing Lawrenny and its fine æstuary, Clareston, and the hundred of Rhôs, to the west; and Wilsdon, a substantial modern house, the seat of George Donne, Esq. This last was erected on the site of an ancient family mansion, in which Oliver Cromwell took up his quarters, while besieging the castle of Pembroke: during his abode here, he was confined to his bed by an attack of the gout, and, in writing a despatch to the parliament, is said to have spilled some ink upon the coverlid, which is still preserved in the family. The parish contains a vast quantity of excellent limestone, which is conveyed in small craft of twelve or fifteen tons' burden to the upper parts of this county and of Cardiganshire. Coal of inferior quality is procured on the north side of the parish, but only for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, not rated in the king's books, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a spacious and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, comprising a nave and aisles, a chancel, and a north transept; the floor is paved with bricks, several of which bear curious inscriptions. In the north transept, which was the sepulchral chapel of the owners of the castle, is an altar-tomb, on which are the recumbent effigies of Sir John Carew and his lady, with the date 1637; and in the south aisle are the effigies of a crusader and a priest, but without either date or inscription. In the churchyard is an ancient building, apparently coeval with the church, which is occasionally used as a parochial school, the master being appointed by the vicar. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Near the turnpike gate is a perfect cross, of that kind usually called St. Catherine's, of which the circular head is fixed into a tall shaft, ornamented with scrolls and tracery, rising from a substantial pedestal; in one of the compartments into which the shaft is divided there is an illegible inscription. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £406. 13.

CARMAIN, an extra-parochial district, in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (S.E. by E.) from Cowbridge. The population is returned with the parish of Llantrithyd. This place is locally in the parish of Llantrithyd, and consists of only a farm of about one hundred and twenty acres, with a contiguous plot of twenty-four acres, tithe-free, the property of Henry Seymour, Esq., who has here a cottage ornée, pleasantly situated on rising ground above the village of Llantrithyd. A great part of the parish of Llantrithyd is the property of this gentleman.

Seal and Arms.

CARMARTHEN (CAERMARTHEN), an inland port, borough, market town and parish, and a county of itself, locally in the hundreds of Elvet and Derllys, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 216 miles (W. by N.) from London, on the road to Milford, containing 9995 inhabitants. This place is allowed by all writers to be of very remote antiquity, though they materially differ in assigning its origin. According to some, it was the capital of a principal division of the island, called by the Britons Dyved, and by the Romans Dimetia; and by others its origin is attributed to Maximus, a Roman general, who, having espoused Helena, daughter of Euddav, Duke of Cornwall, is said to have built Carmarthen, Cardigan, and Haverfordwest. From the concurrent testimony of all antiquaries it appears to have been the Maridunum of Ptolemy, and the Muridunum of Antoninus, one of the principal stations in the country of the Dimeta, situated on the Via Julia, or great Roman road, which formed the chief line of communication between this remote part of Britain and the more eastern portions of the island, and, in its course westward through the present county of Monmouth, divided into two branches, which re-united at this place. From Maridunum the Via Julia was continued to the furthest extremity of the present county of Pembroke; and another road, also branching from this station, extended northward to Loventium, in the present county of Cardigan. The Roman station is supposed to have occupied the site upon which the castle was subsequently erected; and this opinion is greatly strengthened not only by the natural advantages of the situation, and its peculiar adaptation for the site of a Roman camp, but also by existing vestiges of ramparts and earthworks enclosing a quadrilateral area, and the discovery of Roman coins, chiefly of the Lower Empire, and of other Roman relics, among which is one supposed to have been an altar, now preserved in the garden of the vicarage-house. After the departure of the Romans from Britain, that part of Dimetia which now constitutes the present county of Carmarthen became part of the principality of Ceredigion; and the princes of that territory, who assumed a kind of superiority over the petty sovereigns of South Wales, selected Maridunum as the principal seat of their government, and consequently made it the metropolis of South Wales. Its modern name of Carmarthen, or Caer Fyrddin, as it is called by the Welsh, (by a change of the convertible consonants f and m, common in their language), implies "a military station fortified with walls," and perfectly agrees with the description given by Giraldus Cambrensis, who calls it "Urbs antiqua coctilibus Muris." Its history, for nearly four centuries, is involved in obscurity; nor does any mention of it worthy of notice occur till the year 877, when, on the division of the kingdom of Wales among the three sons of Roderic the Great, the seat of government of the princes of South Wales, which had heretofore been fixed at Carmarthen, was transferred to Dynevor, a place strongly fortified both by nature and art, and consequently more suited to the character of the times than their ancient residence, which, according to the Welsh annals, had been repeatedly assailed during the continued struggles among the native chieftains for the sovereignty of South Wales, and which probably at that early period was in the possession of the Saxons, who at that time were making frequent incursions into this part of the principality. In the year 1021, Hywel and Meredydd, two Welsh chieftains, aspiring to the sovereignty of South Wales, which they intended to divide between them, obtained the assistance of Eulaf, or Aulaf, with a large army of Irish and Scots, and, landing on the coast of Pembroke, advanced to Carmarthen, where they were encountered by Llewelyn, the reigning prince, and his brother Conan, who put them to flight after a severe engagement, in which Llewelyn was slain. In 1038, Howel, Prince of South Wales, in the fourth attempt which he made to recover his dominions from the usurpation of Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, advanced to a place called Pen Cader, a few miles to the north of Carmarthen, bringing his wife with him, to share in the victory which he too sanguinely anticipated. But his army was entirely defeated by Gruffydd; and Howel himself narrowly escaped, leaving his wife a captive to the conqueror.

The Myvyrian Archaeology frequently notices, during the eleventh century, a fortress at Rhŷd y Gors, or "the boggy ford," on the bank of the river Towy, about half a mile below the town, where a road was discovered some few years since, leading directly to the river, on the opposite bank of which are the remains of a circular camp, evidently designed to protect the ford, or pass. It is not, however, known at what time, or by whom, the castle of Carmarthen was originally built: the first notice of it occurs about the year 1116, when Gruffydd ab Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, a native prince of South Wales, whom Henry I. had dispossessed of his hereditary dominions, and who had passed the greater part of his minority in Ireland, after carrying on a desultory warfare against the Norman invaders of his territory, resolved to make a more powerful effort for the recovery of his right. With this view he attacked the castle of Carmarthen, which, from the strength of the fortifications and the number of the garrison, resisted all his attempts. But Gruffydd, having received a considerable accession of forces, and obtained possession of the surrounding country, aware of the importance of that fortress in the hands of his enemies, renewed his efforts, and advanced again to besiege it. In the mean time the Normans, foreseeing the danger, and conscious of their own insufficiency for its defence, invited to their aid the Welsh chieftains who had become vassals to the English monarch, each of whom, in succession, they appointed to defend it for fourteen days; and Owain ab Caradoc, who was among the first to obey the summons, took upon himself the command of the garrison. Gruffydd, having informed himself of the state of the fortifications, advanced with great secrecy, and ordering his men, upon the first assault, to raise the shout of victory the garrison was thrown into confusion, and Owain ab Caradoc, being deserted by his men, was killed upon the ramparts. The castle was taken and dismantled, and Gruffydd, having plundered and afterwards demolished the town, retired laden with booty to his retreat in the forest of Ystrad Tywi. The castle and town were subsequently restored by the Normans, and remained, for short periods only, in the alternate possession of these invaders and the Welsh, by each of whom they suffered severely. In 1137 it was destroyed by Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, and again by his sons in 1143. In the following year, Gilbert Earl of Clare, having recovered a considerable portion of the territory of which he had been deprived by Gruffydd, rebuilt the castle, and garrisoned it with Normans, who were immediately attacked by Cadell, son of Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, to whom it was surrendered, on condition that the lives of the garrison should be spared: the victorious chieftain repaired and strengthened the fortifications, and for some time retained possession of Carmarthen, from which place he made repeated incursions into the territories of the Norman settlers in that part of the country. The castle, which appears to have been an object of continual attack during the hostilities that prevailed between the English and the Welsh, being in the early part of the reign of Henry II. in the hands of the English, was assailed in 1159, by Rhŷs ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, and eldest brother of Cadell, who was ultimately compelled to raise the siege, in consequence of the powerful succours thrown into it by the Earls of Bristol and Clare, whom King Henry had sent to its relief, and of the presence of the English monarch's Welsh allies, Cadwaladr, Cynan, and Hywel, sons of Owain Gwynedd, with their forces. The English monarch, in 1163, received at Pen Cader the submission of Rhŷs, who there did him homage, and gave hostages for his future good behaviour. Notwithstanding which, in 1195, during the absence of King Richard I. in Palestine, that turbulent prince again laid siege to the castle, which, after a feeble resistance, he took and demolished, and afterwards laid waste the adjacent country. In 1212, Rhŷs Vychan, a powerful chieftain, and one of the sons of Rhŷs ab Gruffydd, fighting against his nephews Rhŷs and Owain, who were in alliance with King John of England, was taken prisoner, and confined in this town, but was soon after released, on giving hostages to that monarch for his future good conduct. In 1215, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, in an expedition against the foreign settlers in this part of the principality, invested the castle of Carmarthen, which he took and dismantled, after a siege of five days; but on doing homage to Henry III. at Gloucester, in 1218, he promised to restore it and others to the English, together with all the dependent territory. In the following year, however, instead of performing his promise, he repaired the fortifications; and placing in it a strong garrison of his own forces, kept possession of it till the year 1223, when the Earl of Pembroke captured it after an obstinate defence, and put the garrison to the sword. Llewelyn, apprised of this event, sent his son Gruffydd, with an army of nine thousand men, to give battle to the earl; and Gruffydd, advancing to Carmarthen from Kidwelly, drew up his forces on the opposite side of the river Towy. The earl crossing the river to meet him, a sanguinary battle ensued, which terminated doubtfully, darkness alone parting the combatants, who remained in sight of each other for several days, on the opposite sides of the river; but, owing to a scarcity of provisions, Gruffydd was eventually compelled to withdraw his forces, and retire into North Wales.

From this period the castle appears to have appertained for a considerable time to the English crown. The Earl of Pembroke, in 1233, having quarrelled with Henry III., and being joined by Owain ab Gruffydd, Rhŷs Vychan, and Maelgwyn ab Maelgwyn, laid siege to the castle, which held out for three months, and, being relieved by a reinforcement of troops, and a supply of provisions, which arrived by sea, the confederates were compelled to raise the siege. In 1256, Henry sent a large army by sea to this place, for the protection of his vassals in South Wales, who were frequently attacked by the native chieftains. After the entire subjugation of the principality by Edward I., Carmarthen was constituted the metropolis of the district to which it gives name, and which was then first formed into a county by that monarch, who established in it his courts of chancery and exchequer and the great sessions for South Wales. In the reign of Henry IV., Owain Glyndwr, having obtained the assistance of an army of twelve thousand men from France, under the command of the Marshal de Montmorency, and being joined by several of the Welsh chieftains, advanced from Milford to Carmarthen, in 1405, and laid siege to the castle, which, together with several other fortresses in the neighbourhood, was soon surrendered to him; but, upon the subsequent defeat of his foreign auxiliaries, the principal men of the county abandoned his cause, and returned to their allegiance to King Henry. About the year 1450, a grand Eisteddvod, or congress of the Welsh bards, was held in this town, against which the synod of the primitive bards of Glamorgan strongly protested, as tending to subvert the ancient institutions of their order. Soon after the debarkation of the forces of the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., at Milford Haven, a division of his army passed through this town, under the conduct of the celebrated Rhys ab Thomas, who rejoined the young prince at Shrewsbury, with a powerful body of Welsh adherents whom he had collected in his march. In the persecutions on account of religious tenets which took place during the reign of Mary, Dr. Ferrars, Bishop of St. David's, was accused of heresy and condemned to be burnt at the stake, which sentence was carried into execution at the High Cross, in this town, on the 30th of March, 1555. Carmarthen was visited by the plague in 1604, and again in 1606, when the pestilence raged with such fatality that the sessions were held this year at Golden Grove, to avoid the contagion, which re-appeared here in 1651. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, the castle, which had been garrisoned for the king, was taken for the parliament by Colonel Laugharne, who afterwards, abandoning the cause of the parliament, withdrew the garrison to Pembroke castle, where, being joined by Colonel Poyer, who had also come over to the royal cause, he made a memorable stand against the authority of that assembly. In 1648, the castle reverted to the parliament, and was ordered by Oliver Cromwell to be dismantled; in which state it remained, part of the keep only being used as a common gaol, till 1787, when the principal part of it was incorporated with the new county gaol, completed in 1792.

The town is beautifully situated on the north-western bank of the navigable river Tywi, or Towy, about nine miles from its influx into that portion of the Bristol channel called Carmarthen bay, on a moderate eminence, which commands some of the finest views in the Vale of Towy, and imparts to the town a striking and picturesque appearance. It is above a mile in length, and about half a mile in breadth, and consists of several streets, the two principal meeting near its centre, where formerly stood the High Cross, the site of which is now occupied by the fish and butter market: the descent to the bridge, an elegant stone structure of seven arches, surmounted with an iron balustrade, is inconveniently narrow and precipitous, as are also several of the smaller streets which lead down to the water side. The principal streets contain a large proportion of good houses and many excellent shops, and in the minor streets there are several of respectable character. Considerable improvement has taken place of late years by modernizing old buildings and erecting new ones in a style of comfort and taste suited to the improvement of modern times: among the latter are, Picton-Terrace at the western end of the town, and Waterloo-Place to the north. The principal streets are well paved, and lighted with gas, first introduced here in 1821, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with excellent water, conveyed from springs in the neighbourhood into public conduits in various parts of the town, by iron pipes laid down at the expense of the corporation, in 1803. At the western end of the town, near the entrance from Pembrokeshire, is a column, erected by public subscription, at an expense of £3000, to the memory of Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Picton, G. C. B., who represented the borough in parliament, and was slain at Waterloo. It consists of a pedestal and column, sixty-four feet in height, supporting a colossal statue of the general, nine feet and a half in height, habited in the Roman costume, and having a sword in the left hand. The pedestal on which the figure stands displays a tasteful arrangement of shields and halberts, and at the angles of the platform are mortars mounted on carriages. On one side of the pedestal of the column is an inscription, recording in the English language the various exploits of the general during his military career, and on the opposite side is a literal translation of it into the Welsh language: the other two faces are respectively occupied with representations in alto relievo of the storming of Badajos and the battle of Waterloo, in both of which he particularly distinguished himself. The ornamental parts of this column were finely executed by F. H. Bailey, R. A., but the composition of which they are formed has not withstood the influence of the weather. The environs are adorned with neat villas and some pleasingly varied scenery; and the view of the town, with its castle and bridge, the vessels in the river, and the bold and diversified character of the hills by which it is terminated, is strikingly beautiful. The Cambrian Society in Dyved, for the preservation of the remains of ancient British literature, and for the encouragement of the national music of the harp, established in 1818, under the patronage of Dr. Burgess, late Bishop of St. David's, and now Bishop of Salisbury, is at present nearly extinct; and the Cwmreigyddion Society, for the encouragement of Welsh poetry, by the distribution of medals and premiums, is also in a declining state: the affairs of both these societies are transacted here. The theatre, an old mean-looking building, is open during the months of November and December, when dramatic pieces are performed every evening; and concerts and balls are occasionally held at the principal inns. Races take place annually in September, and continue for two days, on the first of which the Carmarthen stakes of £5 each, with an addition of £40 from the fund, are run for by all horses; a sweepstakes of £5, with £30 added from the fund, by all horses bred in Carmarthenshire and the adjoining counties; and a sweepstakes of £10 each, with a tradesmen's purse of £30: on the second day the Dynevor stakes of five sovereigns each, with an addition of £50, are run for by horses of all ages; a hunters' stakes of five sovereigns each, with £20 added from the fund, by half-bred horses; the county members' plate of fifty sovereigns by horses bred in South Wales; and a forced handicap of five sovereigns, with £20 added from the fund, by the beaten horses. The race-course, which is well adapted to the purpose, is about four miles distant from the town, higher up the vale. During the races, which are usually well attended, balls take place alternately at the two principal inns.

The port of Carmarthen, though only a creek to that of Llanelly, carries on a small foreign, and a very considerable coasting, trade; and, from the great increase in the shipping within the last five years, application has been made by the merchants to have it constituted an independent port. The principal exports are, British timber, bark, marble, slate, bricks, lead-ore, leather; manufactured goods, grain, butter, and eggs; and the principal imports are foreign timber, pitch, rosin, tallow, coal, culm, malt, and manufactured goods for the supply of the town and neighbourhood. In the year ending January 5th, 1830, one hundred and thirty-six thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine bushels of oats, one thousand four hundred and seventy bushels of barley, seven hundred and sixty bushels of wheat, and seven hundred and forty bushels of malt, were shipped from this port; and previously to that time, the average quantity of butter, of which no separate entries are now kept in the custom-house books, was annually twenty-two thousand casks, weighing eighty lb. each; and the average value of the eggs annually sent away is £6050. During the year ending January 5th, 1831, thirteen vessels from foreign parts, of the aggregate burden of one thousand five hundred and three tons; and four hundred and twenty coasting vessels (including different arrivals of the same vessel), of the aggregate burden of sixteen thousand eight hundred and fifty tons, entered inwards at this port: and in the same year, three vessels from foreign parts, of the aggregate burden of four hundred and thirty-three tons; and one hundred and seventy-four coasting vessels (reckoning as above), of the aggregate burden of eight thousand nine hundred and nine tons, cleared outwards: in the course of that year also, the amount of duties paid to the custom-house was about £3000. The number of registered vessels belonging to the port is fifty-one, the aggregate burden of which amounts to two thousand one hundred and ninety-five tons, and which employ one hundred and fifty-two men. Towards the close of the year 1830, a weekly communication was established between Bristol and Carmarthen, by the Frolic steam-packet, which was unhappily lost off the Nass sands, in its voyage from Tenby to Bristol, in March 1831, when all on board perished; and since that time this mode of communication has not been renewed: there are, however, vessels called Bristol traders, which sail alternately every week. With that city, which is regarded as the emporium of South Wales, Carmarthen carries on a very extensive trade, obtaining from it large quantities of goods of various descriptions, with which it furnishes an extensive and populous district entirely dependent on it for supplies. The quay, which at spring tides is accessible to ships of three hundred tons' burden, extends several hundred yards along the north-western bank of the river, and is commodious. The river Towy is celebrated for its salmon and sewin fisheries, in which several of the poorer inhabitants are allowed to employ themselves throughout the year, with the view of preventing them applying for parochial relief, to the great detriment of the fisheries, and to the injury of the health of the consumers. There are three weekly markets, on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday: the last, which is the principal, is abundantly supplied with corn and every article of consumption: the market on Wednesday is chiefly for meat, poultry, butter, and vegetables; and that on Friday is almost disused, except for fish, which is also exposed for sale every day in the week: dairy produce of every description is remarkably cheap here. Fairs, chiefly for cattle, are held on April 15th, June 3rd and 4th, July 10th, August 12th, September 9th, October 9th, and November 14th and 15th. The corn market is held in an area beneath the guildhall, and on market days the guildhall square is occupied by temporary booths for the sale of hats, shoes, hardware, and other articles. The markets for cheese, and butchers' meat and poultry, erected by the corporation in 1801, are situated in Red-street: the latter is quadrangular, with covered shambles round the sides, and a range down the centre. The fish and butter markets, as before observed, occupy the site of the old cross, at the junction of the leading thoroughfares: the roof is supported by a range of plain pillars, and surmounted by a clock turret: the market for cattle and pigs is at present held in Lammas-street.

The borough, which is of great antiquity, probably possessed several municipal privileges under the native princes of South Wales, who made this place the seat of their government, and these are said to have been subsequently confirmed and extended by charter of Edward I.; but the earliest charter of incorporation of which there is any authentic record is that of Henry VIII., which was afterwards confirmed by James I., who constituted the borough a county of itself, under the designation of "the county of the borough of Carmarthen," and substituted two sheriffs for the bailiffs appointed under the former charter. This form of municipal government remained till the fourth year of the reign of George III., when the inhabitants petitioned for a new charter, which was granted, on the 27th of July, 1764, and ordained that the government should be vested in a mayor, recorder, two sheriffs, twenty common-councilmen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, sword-bearer, two serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers, under the style of "The Mayor, Burgesses, and Commonalty." Six of the burgesses, called peers, are, together with the mayor and recorder, justices of the peace within the borough (which is co-extensive with the parish of St. Peter), with power to fill up vacancies in their number from among the burgesses. The mayor is also coroner, clerk of the market, and the king's admiral on the river Towy, with a jurisdiction extending from Carmarthen bridge to the sea, and, with the two sheriffs, is annually chosen, from among the burgesses, on the Monday after the festival of St. Michael: the recorder, who must be a barrister, and the town-clerk, who is also clerk of the peace, clerk of the assize, and prothonotary, retain their offices for life: the mayor and sheriffs must be resident within the borough, or are otherwise liable to a penalty not exceeding £100. The qualification requisite for the mayor, recorder, and peers, is either a freehold of not less than £75 per annum, a leasehold of not less than £100 per annum, for a term of thirty years, or a personal estate of not less than £2000. The qualification for a burgess is either a servitude of seven years to a resident freeman; a life interest within the borough of not less than £4 per annum, held for three years prior to application for admission, unless acquired by inheritance or marriage, in which cases actual possession is sufficient; or an actual tenure to the amount of £10 per annum within the borough, held for three years prior to the time of application. The burgesses are exempt from serving on juries out of the borough, except on matters in which its interests are concerned, and are free from all tolls and customs throughout the kingdom. The borough first received the elective franchise in the 27th of Henry VIII., since which time it has continued to return one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses generally, in number about seven hundred, of whom between three and four hundred are resident. By the late act for amending the representation of the people, which, however, has caused no alteration in the boundaries of this borough, the town of Llanelly has been united to Carmarthen in the return of a member to parliament: this act vests the franchise in the former resident constituency, if duly registered according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided they are capable of registering as the act demands: the number of such tenements within the limits of the borough is seven hundred and thirty-eight: the sheriffs are the returning officers. The corporation hold general courts of session twice in the year, at which the mayor presides, assisted by the recorder and justices, for the trial of all offenders not charged with the commission of capital crimes. The mayor, recorder, and town-clerk, also hold a court of record, every alternate Monday, commonly called the Mayor's Court, or Fortnight Court, which may sit for two days, if requisite, for determining all manner of pleas, with the power of issuing process to hold to bail in actions for debt, to an unlimited amount; but that process is seldom applied for in this court, such proceedings being generally carried on in the court of great sessions, in which also actions above forty shillings are now usually brought and determined, and the business of the Fortnight Court, which is tolerably extensive, is now by custom principally confined to the recovery of debts under forty shillings, though actions above that amount are occasionally tried and determined. The sheriffs are empowered to hold their courts monthly, for the county of the borough; and courts of pie powder are attached to the markets and fairs. The mayor and justices, or two of them, of whom the recorder must be one, have power to hold a court of view of frankpledge, twice a year, within the borough. Petty sessions are also held weekly; and the assizes and general quarter sessions for the county, and the election of the two knights of the shire, take place at Carmarthen, as the county town. The guildhall, in which all the public business for the borough and for the county is transacted, is a handsome modern structure, supported on a range of columns of the Doric order, surmounted by an entablature and cornice: the principal front is ornamented with three lofty Venetian windows, the central compartment of each of which is circular-headed, and separated by Ionic columns from the side compartments, on the outer sides of which are pilasters of the same order. In the centre is a grand flight of stone steps, leading through the middle compartment of the central window, which opens with folding-doors into the principal story, containing, besides the hall in which the courts for the borough and county are held, a grand jury room, in which is an excellent portrait of Lieut-General Sir Thomas Picton, G. C. B.; a room for the transaction of county business; and a banqueting-room. Beneath are the offices of the clerk of the peace, and the remainder of the lower area is appropriated to the use of the corn market. The gaol for the borough is a neat and commodious building, adapted to the reception of eight prisoners in separate cells, and contains three day-rooms and four airing-yards. The county gaol and house of correction occupy the site of the ancient castle, and are partly incorporated with its remains: the buildings were begun in 1789, and completed in 1792: the appearance of the exterior is appropriately massive, without any unnecessary heaviness, and the interior, which is arranged upon the plan recommended by the philanthropic Howard, comprises, in the portion appropriated as a gaol, four compartments for the classification of prisoners, eighteen day-rooms, including apartments for debtors, and four airing-yards; and in the house of correction, four compartments for classification, six work-rooms, four day-rooms, and four airing-yards: both departments are well adapted to the system of classification, and each of them is capable of containing twenty-six prisoners in separate cells, or sixty by placing more than one in the same cell.

Henry VIII. is said to have meditated the removal of the seat of the ancient diocese of St. David's from that city to Carmarthen; but abandoned his design on the representation that the remains of his grandfather, Edmund of Lancaster, were interred in the cathedral of the former place, which would probably, after the removal of the see, fall into decay. The town is wholly within the parish of St. Peter, to which, by charter of the 4th of George III., the Priory-street, or Old Carmarthen, was united, the whole forming what is now called the borough of Carmarthen. The living of St. Peter's is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Principal and Tutors of St. David's College, Lampeter, to whom, since the last presentation in 1816, it has been ceded by the crown, in whose gift it was previously. Of the five churches which formerly existed here, only those of St. Peter and Llanllwch are remaining; the others, not being used for sacred purposes, have long since been suffered to fall into decay. The church of St. Peter is situated without the walls of the ancient Carmarthen, but nearly in the centre of the present town: it is supposed to have been originally a cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, but of the ancient building only the nave, chancel, and south transept, are remaining, and these have been greatly disfigured, by the insertion of modern windows of incongruous character, and other injudicious alterations. After the suppression of the monasteries, and the neglect of the other churches, it was probably found necessary to enlarge St. Peter's church; and at this time the north aisle, which is of much later date than the rest of the building, is supposed to have been added to it. The interior is handsomely fitted up, and divine service is performed twice every Sunday in the English, and twice in the Welsh language. There are some very ancient and interesting monuments, among which the most remarkable is one to the memory of Sir Rhys ab Thomas, who attended the Earl of Richmond to Bosworth Field, and for his signal services on that memorable occasion was, immediately after the battle, made

Knight of the Garter, and was invested with divers other distinctions. This monument, which was removed at the dissolution from St. John's priory, consists of an altar-tomb, on which are the recumbent effigies in alabaster of that warrior and his lady, the former in complete armour, booted and spurred, with long flowing hair, the hands upraised in the attitude of prayer, and a short sword lying by the right side: the tomb is richly ornamented with small figures, escutcheons, and shields charged with armorial bearings. There were also three other effigies in alabaster of individuals of the same family, which were destroyed by the masons, some years since, and converted into plaister. The church, or chapel of Llanllwch is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural features: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Peter's. Owing to the great want of accommodation in these edifices, it has for some time been in contemplation to erect an additional church, to defray the expense of which a considerable sum was raised by subscription; but, in consequence of the inability of the parliamentary commissioners to grant pecuniary assistance, the design is for the present relinquished. There are two places of worship each for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Calvinistic Methodists and Unitarians.

The free grammar school was founded by the Rev. Morgan Owen, D. D., who was promoted to the see of Llandaf in 1639: he endowed it with £20 per annum, chargeable on the tithes of the parish of Ishmael, in this county, which was subsequently increased by the Rev. William Jones, who gave a house and garden adjoining the school-room in Lammas-street. It has an exhibition of £4 per annum at Queen's College, Cambridge; and boys from this school have the preference to two exhibitions at Jesus' College, Oxford, which are open to the whole of the county of Carmarthen. The patronage of the school, which was a licensed institution, and from which young men were admitted into holy orders, prior to the establishment of St. David's College, at Lampeter, is vested in the corporation, who intended to found an exhibition of £10 per annum for boys from it at that college; but it is supposed that it will not be accepted, unless thrown open to the principality at large, which the corporation refuse to accede to. Here is an institution called the Presbyterian College, for the education of fourteen young men intended for the ministry, which owes its origin, as is reported, to some of the ejected ministers in the reign of Charles II., and which has of late years been under the management of a board of directors in London: there are at present twelve students, who, in addition to the advantages of a gratuitous academical education, receive from the funds of the institution an allowance, for four years, of £20 per annum, for their maintenance while in the college: it has not been stationary in this town, to which it was last removed from Swansea, and is held in a house, hired for the purpose, adjoining the Independent chapel, in Lammas-street. Many distinguished dissenting ministers have received their education in this establishment, and young men intended for the ministry in the church of England were formerly admitted, though not on the same foundation, to participate in the literary advantages it afforded. Belonging to the college are, an excellent theological library, containing about four thousand volumes, and a valuable philosophical apparatus. Among the most eminent men that have presided over this institution may be noticed, John Jones, L.L.D., compiler of the first Greek and English Lexicon, and author of several elementary works; and Dr. Abraham Rees, author of the Encyclopædia which bears his name, was for many years one of the visitors. Two houses were left by an unknown benefactor, as an endowment for instructing six young men in mathematics and navigation, the rental of which has long been received by the Rev. Mr. Peter, minister of the Independent congregation, and theological professor to the college, but there are no students on the foundation. A Lancasterian school, under the superintendence of a committee, was established in 1813, for teaching boys reading, writing, and arithmetic: it is supported by subscription, and one hundred and fifty boys at present receive gratuitous instruction. National schools, for which two spacious and commodious rooms have been erected by public subscription, aided by a grant of £150 from the National Society, have been established, for the instruction of children of each sex, that for girls in 1818, and that for boys in 1822, having previously existed for many years as Sunday schools, under the direction of the minister and a committee: in these schools, which are liberally supported by subscription, one hundred and twenty boys and the same number of girls are gratuitously instructed. There are also Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Charles Powell, Esq., in 1687, bequeathed a house and stable, to be converted into six rooms, with a garden to each, for the residence of six aged men, and £300 to be invested in the purchase of lands for their endowment: the inmates receive each an annual allowance of £2. 15. in money, coal to the amount of ten shillings, shoes and stockings of the value of £1. 4., and, every alternate year, a blue gown and a hat, together worth £2. 15. The Rev. Edward Meyrick, treasurer of St. David's, gave a house and garden for the use of a charity school and lending library. Sir Rice Rudd, of Aberglasney, Bart., by deed bearing date the 16th of Charles I., charged certain premises with an annual payment of £25, towards the support of a charity founded by Bishop Rudd and his lady, to which also he gave the hospital, or almshouse, in St. Peter's-street, with all its lands and appurtenances. Of the charity founded by Bishop Rudd nothing whatever is known: the rent-charge of £25 is at present received by the proprietor of Aberglasney, in the parish of Llangathen, and paid to the inmates of the hospital in St. Peter's-street, who must be natives of the county of Carmarthen. Alderman John Philipps, in 1730, gave £200 to be laid out in land, or on other good security, directing the produce to be given annually to the most deserving of the indigent inhabitants of the county of the borough, not receiving parochial relief. There are also numerous other small donations and bequests for distribution among the poor.

The ancient castle occupied a spacious quadrangular area on the brow of a hill rising abruptly from the river Towy, enclosed on the south-west, south-east, and north-east by lofty walls, defended in the centre by semicircular bastions, at the southern angle by a strong square tower, and at the eastern and western angles by massive circular towers. The principal entrance was in the north-west front, and was guarded by an advanced gateway: the keep and principal buildings were situated in the northern angle of the area. The few existing remains of this fortress, being incorporated with the gaol, are concealed from public observation, except one of the entrances and portions of the walls above the river. There are only considerable remains either of the priory of St. John, or of the convent of the Grey friars in Lammas-street: the former was founded for Black canons, about the year 1148, but by whom is uncertain; its revenue at the dissolution was £174. 8. 8., and the site, in the 35th of Henry VIII., was granted to Richard Andrews and Nicholas Temple: the latter was a cell to the monastery of St. Augustine, at Bristol, and the site was granted by Henry VIII. to Thomas Lloyd, and, in the 5th of Edward VI., to Sir Thomas Gresham. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was situated on the south side of the guildhall, in a street of that name; but not being used after the Reformation, it was converted into dwelling-houses, on the timbers of the roofs of which may be discerned the heads of saints, which formed part of its original ornaments. Near the remains of the Grey friars' house, in Lammas-street, are some vestiges of another church, supposed to have been the chapel belonging to that convent. The church of the priory of St. John was taken down after the suppression of religious houses, and several of the ancient monuments were removed into St. Peter's church. In the garden of the vicarage-house is still preserved a Roman altar, of a cubic form, in the upper surface of which is a cavity, probably the patella, for holding the blood of the victim. Near the northern part of the town, in a field called the Bulrack, or Bulwark, are the remains of a Roman camp, the prætorium of which may be clearly distinguished by the superior elevation of the ground within the area, and which evidently appears to have been the campus æstivus of the principal station. The remains of a causeway have recently been discovered, extending in a line from the priory to the castle, and apparently indicating the direction of the Via Julia Montana, which led to Maridunum from the east, and here joined the Via Julia Maritima, which, having its course nearer to the sea, is supposed to have passed through this station from east to west, in the line of the present turnpike road. The village at the extremity of this causeway still retains the name of Pen y Sarn, "the Head of the Causeway;" and it is related by Giraldus Cambrensis, who flourished about the close of the twelfth century, that, in his time, Roman bricks might be seen in the walls by which the town was surrounded. Near Llanllwch are some imperfect remains of an extensive encampment; and an intrenchment on a smaller scale, but in a very perfect state, which was probably thrown up during the great civil war, may be seen in a field near the gas-works. Carmarthen is said to have been the birth-place of the celebrated Merlin, or Ambrosius, whose exploits were the subject of the romances of former ages: his mother is said to have been the daughter of a king of South Wales, and he is supposed to have taken the name of Merddyn, or Merlin, from the place of his nativity, and to have spent much of his time in seclusion in a grove, about three miles to the east of this town, still called Merlin's Grove. His extraordinary skill in various sciences, especially in the mathematics and astronomy, caused him to be regarded as a magician in the dark age in which he lived. The Rev. Lewis Bailey, D.D., Bishop of Bangor, was a native of this town: he was the author of the "Practice of Piety," which passed through many editions, and was translated into the French and Welsh languages. Walter D'Evereux, Earl of Essex, and father of the accomplished and unfortunate nobleman who suffered in the reign of Elizabeth, was buried here. Sir Richard Steele was for some years a resident at Carmarthen, where he is said to have composed his play entitled "The Conscious Lovers." He married the daughter and only child of Jonathan Scurlock, Esq., of this place, and towards the close of his life retired to a small estate called Tŷ-Gwyn, on the opposite bank of the river, in the parish of Llangunnor: he died at his house in King-street, Carmarthen, at a very advanced age, and was interred in the family vault of the Scurlocks in St. Peter's church. A neat monument was erected to his memory, in the church of Llangunnor, by the late William Williams, Esq., of Ivy Tower, in the county of Pembroke. Carmarthen gives the inferior title of marquis to the noble family of Osborne, Dukes of Leeds. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £3072. 5.

CARMARTHENSHIRE, a maritime county of SOUTH WALES, bounded on the west by Pembrokeshire, on the north by Cardiganshire, on the east by Brecknockshire, on the south-east by Glamorganshire, and on the south by the broad estuary of the Burry river, and Carmarthen bay, in the Bristol channel: it extends from 51° 30' to 52° 2' (N. Lat.), and from 3° 45' to 3° 58' (W. Lon.); and includes nine hundred and seventy-four square miles, or six hundred and twenty-three thousand three hundred and sixty acres. The population, in 1831, was 100,655.

The territory at present forming the county of Carmarthen, at the period of the Roman invasion of Britain, was, according to Ptolemy, included in the country of the Dimetæ, the Dyved of British writers; and contained one of their chief cities, called by the same author Maridunum, and by Antoninus Muridunum, which has been identified with the present Carmarthen. The subjugation of this district is ascribed to Julius Frontinus, about the year 70; and from that commander the name of the road which crossed it from east to west, called Julia Strata, or Via Julia Maritima, was derived: according to Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart., and others, it was also traversed by the Via Julia Montana, or Superior. Besides the station of Maridunum, on the first-mentioned road, it contained another important one at Llan-vair ar y brŷn, or "St. Mary's church on the hill," near Llandovery. When the Romans had withdrawn their forces from Britain, and the country became divided into numerous petty states, modern Carmarthenshire was for the most part included in the principality of Ceredigion, or Cardigan, the history of which, for a long period, is involved in obscurity. About the middle of the ninth century it was annexed to the other dominions of Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, Prince of Gwynedd, who united the whole of Wales into one kingdom. On his death, in 876, he allotted to his son Cadell the territory of Caredigion, or South Wales, including, besides the present counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, those of Brecknock, Glamorgan, Monmouth, and Pembroke, and fixed the seat of government at Dynevor, in the vale of Tywi, where he had erected a palace, though the successors of Cadell removed it to Carmarthen, where it continued, until the progress of the Anglo-Norman invaders compelled the native princes to retire to the former residence. Cadell, the year after he had entered upon his government, invaded the dominions of his brother Mervyn, and took forcible possession of the kingdom of Powys, but was, in his turn, invaded by his other brother, Anarawd, sovereign of North Wales, who committed dreadful ravages in the counties of Carmarthen, Cardigan, and Pembroke, burning the houses and destroying the corn. On the death of Cadell, in 907, he was succeeded in his government of South Wales and Powys by his eldest son Hywel, who holds so distinguished a rank in Welsh history, by the name of Hywel Dda, or Hywel the Good, and who, in 940, on the decease of Idwal Voel, son of Anarawd, added the kingdom of Aberffraw to his other dominions, and became sovereign of all Wales. During the compilation of this monarch's celebrated code of laws, which continued in force throughout the principality until its subjugation by Edward I., and was retained, in some districts, until its union with England in the reign of Henry VIII., he held an extraordinary council in this county, at his hunting seat of Whitland, in the vicinity of St. Clear's. Hywel died, after a long and peaceful reign, in 948, leaving four sons, Owain, Rhun, Roderick, and Edwin, who, relinquishing the kingdom of North Wales to Ievav and Iago, the sons of Idwal Voel, partitioned among them the principalities, or lordships, of South Wales and Powys: the government of Dynevor fell to Owain, who, though defeated with his brothers in a battle fought with the princes of North Wales, in Cardiganshire, yet, in the year 950, when the latter were making a predatory incursion into Pembrokeshire, compelled them to retreat with such precipitation, that a great part of their army was drowned in the Teivy, which forms the northern boundary of Carmarthenshire. The contest thus begun, between the sons of Hywel and the princes of North Wales, was long maintained by both parties, but at last terminated in favour of Ievav and Iago, who subjected the whole of Wales, and held the kingdom of Dynevor under their dominion for several years. Owain, being driven from his own government, seized, in 958, upon the district of Ewyas, in the Vale of Usk, forming part of the territories of Morgan Mawr, King of Glamorgan; but the quarrel to which this gave rise having been referred to the arbitration of Edgar, the Anglo-Saxon king of England, that monarch gave his award in favour of the king of Glamorgan, and forbade the encroachments of Owain. On a rupture between the two princes of North Wales, Owain seems to have seized the opportunity to regain possession of his dominions, for, in 966, he met Edgar at Caerlleon, in Monmouthshire, to arrange with him for the payment of the tribute which the laws of his father adjudged to be due to the king of England. Einon, son of Owain, with some of his father's troops, invaded Gower, and afterwards assisted in repelling an incursion of the Saxons under Alfred, Earl of Mercia, into Brecknockshire and Gwent. On his death, he was succeeded in the command of his father's troops by his youngest brother Meredydd, who, in 985, invaded North Wales, and having slain its prince, Cadwallon, in battle, shortly subjugated the whole of that kingdom. On the death of his father, Meredydd took possession of the government of South Wales also, to the exclusion of the sons of his elder brother, the eldest of whom, Edwin, having raised an army, and obtained considerable succours from the Saxons and Danes, entered Cardigan, and advanced through Pembrokeshire and along the coast of this county to Kidwelly, and into Gower; but a reconciliation being speedily effected between Edwin and his uncle, their united forces proceeded to ravage the territories of Ithel, Prince of Glamorgan, in which expedition they sustained a signal defeat. The frequent invasions of the Danes, and the hostilities of the neighbouring states, afforded exclusive employment in South Wales for the whole of Meredydd's forces; so that the people of North Wales, having the power of exercising their own choice, transferred the government to Idwal, son of Meirig, whom Meredydd, on being informed of this revolution, made an immediate attempt to dethrone, but without success.

Both these chieftains died soon after, Meredydd leaving issue only one daughter, who had been married to Llewelyn ab Sitsyllt, lord of Essyllt, in Powys, when he was only fourteen years of age; and who was yet in his minority. Aedan, who had succeeded to the dominion of North Wales, after a contest in which he slew his rival, Conan ab Hywel, in battle, taking advantage of Llewelyn's youth, reduced the kingdom of South Wales, without much difficulty, in the year 1000; but in 1015, the young prince, being then of full age, and having assembled a sufficient number of forces, gave battle to Aedan, routed his army, and slew that prince himself. By this signal victory Llewelyn became not only master of the kingdom of Dynevor, or South Wales, but also of that of North Wales. In 1020, an adventurer from Scotland, calling himself Rhun, and pretending to be the son of Meredydd, appeared in South Wales, and, having prevailed upon some of the most powerful chieftains to espouse his cause, found himself in a short time at the head of a sufficient force to take the field. Llewelyn, who was then in North Wales, hearing of these proceedings, hastened southward with his forces, and encountered Rhun at Aberguilly, near Carmarthen, where the latter had already arrayed his army in order for battle: the conflict was long and pertinaciously maintained, but at last terminated in favour of Llewelyn, who pursued his advantage with so much vigour, that Rhun was overtaken and slain. In the following year, Hywel and Meredydd, sons of Edwin, accompanied by Eulaf, or Aulaf, and a large army of Irish and Scots, landed in South Wales, with a view to the conquest of that kingdom, and, having pillaged the church of St. David's, in Pembrokeshire, advanced to Carmarthen, where they were met and routed by Llewelyn and his brother Conan: this engagement, however, proved fatal to Llewelyn himself, through the treachery of Madoc Min, Bishop of Bangor. Llewelyn left one son, named Gruffydd, who was in his minority: availing themselves of this circumstance, Iago, son of Idwal, took possession of the principality of North Wales, while the kingdom of Dynevor was usurped by Rhydderch, son of Ies-

ty, lord of Glamorgan; but the latter, in 1031, lost both the kingdom and his life in an engagement with Hywel and Meredydd, who had again invaded South Wales with a powerful army of Irish and Scots. The sons of Conan ab Sitsyllt soon rose in arms against these princes, to avenge the murder of their uncle Llewelyn, and, in this enterprise, they slew Meredydd, but failed in their efforts to dethrone Hywel. Gruffydd, being now of age, asserted his claims to his father's dominions, and the people, flocking to his standard from all quarters, soon took the field against Iago, Prince of North Wales, whom he defeated and slew; then, marching southward, he compelled the states of South Wales also to acknowledge his sovereign authority, and defeated Hywel in various attempts to recover his dominion there. The latter, undismayed by his ill fortune, still repeatedly took the field, aided by parties of Danes, who pillaged the country; but at last, being attacked unawares, he was defeated and slain by Gruffydd. On the death of Hywel, the sovereignty of South Wales was claimed by Rhydderch and Rhys, sons of Rhydderch ab Iestyn, who, with a powerful army raised in Glamorgan, fought an obstinate but indecisive battle with Gruffydd, after which both parties withdrew their forces. Soon after this event, some partisans of Caradoc, son of Rhydderch ab Iestyn, came from Gwent and Glamorgan into this county, where, in alliance with some of Gruffydd's discontented subjects, they attacked the possessions of that prince's friends, of whom they put several to death; but Gruffydd, leading his forces southward, punished his rebellious nobles by laying waste their estates in Dyfed, Ystrad Tywi, or Carmarthenshire, and Gower in Glamorganshire. In 1056, Gruffydd's brother Rhys was defeated and slain in his invasion of Glamorgan and Gwent; and, soon after, Gruffydd himself experienced a similar catastrophe in a battle fought against Caradoc, son of Rhydderch ab Iestyn, aided by the Saxon chieftain, Harold, with a powerful body of forces. Harold gave the sovereignty of Dynevor to Meredydd ab Owain, thought to have been descended from Hywel Dda, who, in 1069, was defeated and slain on the border of Glamorgan, by Caradoc, who had engaged in his cause a considerable body of Norman forces from England. Caradoc died in the following year, and was succeeded in his government of South Wales by his son Rhydderch.

In 1072, Rhys ab Owain, the grandson of Hywel Dda, who had for some time remained in obscurity in the Isle of Man, suddenly appeared in South Wales, to assert his claim to the dominion of that principality; and, having collected a considerable body of forces in this county and that of Brecknock, marched northward, and defeated the troops of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, the reigning prince of North Wales, who was himself treacherously slain during the action. Rhys then turned towards Dynevor, but gave Rhydderch a friendly meeting, in which terms were entered into so little satisfactory to Rhydderch's relatives, that the latter was soon after put to death by his cousin, Meirchion ab Rhydderch, and Rhys became sovereign of all Wales. In 1074, however, he was attacked by Goronw and Llewelyn, the sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, aided by a large force from Glamorgan, by whom he was twice defeated, and in the last engagement taken prisoner, and afterwards put to death. In 1077, Rhys ab Tewdwr, a descendant of

Hywel Dda, who had been compelled to take refuge in Armorica, on the usurpation of the principality of Dynevor by the princes of Glamorgan, came into South Wales, with the view of recovering to himself that sovereignty, now held by Iestyn ab Gwrgan, Prince of Glamorgan; and his pretensions being favoured by the hatred which prevailed against the latter, the native chieftains consented to his assumption of the sovereign authority. Rhys, in 1080, assisted to place Gruffydd ab Conan on the throne of North Wales, and afterwards invaded the territories of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, in Glamorgan; but he had no sooner withdrawn his troops, than the latter retaliated by ravaging Ystrad Tywi, or Carmarthenshire, and Brecknockshire, whence he carried away a large booty. In the same year also, William the Conqueror marched an army into South Wales, and, abstaining from all hostilities, received the feudal homage of the Welsh princes, and performed a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. David, in Pembrokeshire. In 1087, the sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn raised so formidable an insurrection in South Wales, that Rhys was compelled to retire to Ireland; but having obtained from his brother-in-law, the king of Dublin, a large body of Irish forces, he returned to South Wales, where he was joined by many of his friends, and gained a complete victory over his enemies. Having suppressed a rebellion in Dyfed, Rhys had shortly afterwards to oppose Iestyn, Prince of Glamorgan, and his Norman auxiliaries, by whom he was totally defeated within the limits of the present county of Glamorgan, and, according to the Welsh chronicles, was soon after taken and beheaded by Iestyn; but Mr. Jones, in his History of Brecknockshire, thinks that he retired to Caerbannau, in that county, and was slain fighting against the Normans under Bernard Newmarch. From this period the kingdom of Dynevor, in consequence of civil dissensions, fomented by the Norman monarchs of England, and the encroachments of the Norman barons, rapidly declined in power and extent, and was soon reduced within the boundaries of the present counties of Carmarthen and Cardigan. The defeat and death of Rhys and his eldest son left the government without a head, until the year 1092, when Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, Prince of Powys, a man of bold and enterprising spirit, assumed the sovereignty of South Wales, and carried on an almost uninterrupted series of contests, either with the Norman lords, or with the English monarch himself. William de Londres, one of the Norman knights who had assisted Robert Fitz-Hamon in the conquest of Glamorgan, led a powerful force, in 1094, into Kidwelly and Ystrad Tywi, now included in this county, and at the former place built a castle to secure his conquests. Cadwgan, and Gruffydd Prince of North Wales, were both compelled, at one time, by a formidable insurrection of the subjects of the latter, to withdraw to Ireland; but they returned the next year with a large body of Irish mercenaries, and re-established themselves in their respective governments. Cadwgan continued for some time upon amicable terms with Henry I., but at last became embroiled with that monarch, owing to the misconduct of his son in forcibly carrying away to Powys, Nest, the wife of Gerald de Windsor, governor of the castle of Pembroke. Henry urged the nobles of Powys to avenge the insult, not only by the destruction of Owain himself, but also by attacking the possessions of his father Cadwgan, both of whom, finding the whole country in arms against them, fled to Ireland; but in the following year Cadwgan returned, and, having made his peace with Henry, was restored to his dominions. Owain also returned after a short interval, and, being unable to appease the king's displeasure, engaged in a desultory warfare with the lords marcher, which once more drew upon Cadwgan the resentment of Henry, who sent for him to London to answer for the conduct of his son, and there detained him a state prisoner. Henry, however, once more restored to him his honours and possessions, which he enjoyed only for a short time, being assassinated, in 1110, by his nephew, Madoc ab Rhyrid.

On this event, Henry was enabled, by the divided and unsettled state of the whole country, to effect the conquest of the sovereignty of South Wales, which he held for several years, to the exclusion of various competitors. In 1113, Gruffydd ab Rhys, eldest surviving son of Rhys ab Tewdwr, who, during his minority, had resided in Ireland, came to South Wales, where he was encouraged by Gerald de Windsor, who had espoused Gruffydd's sister, to assert his claim to the principality; but Henry, being soon apprised of his designs, took prompt steps to frustrate them, and Gruffydd was obliged to seek refuge at the court of Gruffydd ab Conan, Prince of North Wales, where he was shortly joined by his brother Hywel, who had effected his escape from Montgomery castle. But Gruffydd ab Conan entertaining a design of delivering up these young princes into the hands of the king of England, they made their escape by sea to South Wales, and Gruffydd ab Rhys, having reached this county in safety, determined to prosecute his claims by open warfare. His cause was eagerly espoused by his countrymen, and he soon commenced active hostilities, at the head of a large body of warriors, by entering Gower, where he made an unsuccessful attack on Swansea, and, having ravaged the surrounding country, returned into Ystrad Tywi with great booty. He afterwards successively attacked the Norman castles of Llandovery and Carmarthen, but without success; and in 1114, he again marched towards Gower, capturing on the way the castle of Kidwelly from William de Londres. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Itinerary, states that, a few years after, Gruffydd's wife, Gwenllïan, attended by her two sons, led in person a body of troops into the vicinity of this fortress, where she was defeated, made prisoner, and put to death, with several of her followers, by Maurice de Londres, grandson of William. Whether or not this may have been, the reputation which Gruffydd acquired by these expeditions greatly added to the number of his followers; and Henry, regarding this affair as important, encouraged his Norman and Flemish vassals, and such Welsh adventurers as had something to expect from his favour, to unite their forces against him. Gruffydd, aware of the advantages derived by his enemies from the king's possessing so strong a fortress as the castle of Carmarthen, in the heart of his little dominion, led his forces against it with great secrecy, and took it by surprise: he then marched into Cardiganshire, where he was frequently successful against the Norman lords, but experienced a severe loss in an incautious attack upon the castle of Aberystwith. The English sovereign, finding that Gruf-ydd was completely master of the country, engaged Owain ab Cadwgan and Llywarch ab Trahaern, by liberal promises, to lead their forces into South Wales to the assistance of his vassals, and they accordingly entered the Vale of Tywi; but Gerald de Windsor, who had recovered his wife from the hands of Owain, and was now in arms in support of Henry's dominion, in revenge for the injury he had received from that profligate chieftain, fell upon him unawares, when attended only by a few forces, and slew him, after a short conflict; and this event terminated the expedition, for Llywarch, seeing that the king's vassals, on whose co-operation he depended, were not to be trusted, withdrew his forces. Some other expeditions were undertaken, but with the like ill success; and, in 1121, Henry concluded a peace with Gruffydd, ceding to him a large portion of the ancient kingdom of Dynevor. In 1130, however, the English monarch, on the complaints of the Norman lords, ordered Gruffydd to be again attacked; but the latter, with his own troops and the assistance of Hywel ab Meredydd, a chieftain of Brecknock, acting wholly on the defensive, succeeded in driving the Norman and Flemish invaders from his territories, and then despatched an embassy to Henry, to ascertain the particulars of his offence, which information was refused him.

On the accession of Stephen to the English throne, in 1135, he sent to Gruffydd a peremptory summons to attend him without delay in London, to answer complaints which had been preferred against him; but the latter, instead of complying, having been joined by several native chieftains of both North and South Wales, overran the whole of Cardiganshire and Pembrokehire, repeatedly defeating the forces of the Norman lords with great slaughter: after this series of victories, which had nearly proved fatal to the English settlers in South Wales, Gruffydd held a grand festival at his palace in this county, to which he invited all the princes and nobles of Wales and the Marches, and which continued for forty days. Gruffydd, after having revised the existing laws of his people, died in 1136, and was succeeded by his eldest son Rhys, the earlier part of whose reign seems not to have been marked by any important event. One of the first transactions recorded is an expedition of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, against the Normans and Flemings in Cardiganshire and the contiguous counties, in which he is stated to have destroyed the castle and town of Carmarthen, of which the Norman lords had again obtained possession. A similar incursion was made a few years afterwards, in 1144, by Owain's sons; and Stephen was so fully employed in maintaining himself on the English throne, that he was unable to exercise any power in behalf of his vassals in this country, who, however, carried on hostilities independently of their sovereign; and, in 1145, we find the Earl of Clare in possession of the castle of Carmarthen, though the chief exertions of Rhys and his brothers, at this time, seem to have been directed against the attempts of these lords to reinstate themselves in their dominion over this part of Wales. In the same year, Rhys and his brother Cadell recovered possession of the castles of Carmarthen, Dynevor, and Llanstephan, all on the Tywi. The last-named fortress was immediately after beset by a large force of Normans, English, and Flemings, but was successfully defended by Meredydd, the brother of Rhys. The castle of Carmarthen was committed to the custody of Cadell, who repaired and strengthened the works, and made repeated incursions from it into the neighbouring territories of the Norman settlers, devastating more particularly the lands of Kidwelly and Gower. He afterwards joined his forces to those of his brother Meredydd, in an expedition with a powerful army into Cardiganshire, from which they returned laden with booty. Other similar expeditions were afterwards undertaken; and Rhys, having nearly rebuilt and greatly strengthened his royal castle of Dynevor, began to concert a plan for the total expulsion of the foreign settlers from Wales, in which, however, he could obtain no co-operation from the other Welsh chieftains. On the accession of Henry II. to the English throne, Rhys refused to join in the general peace offered to that monarch by the Welsh; but, being summoned to the English court, an accommodation was speedily effected, by which Henry was to cede to Rhys the district of Cantrev Mawr, in which stood his castle of Dynevor, and some other lordships, at that time in his possession; and to deliver up to him several castles, which he was to hold as securities for the ratification of the treaty: for these the Welsh prince rendered homage, and returned to his country, leaving two of his sons at the English court, as hostages; but the conditions, on the part of the English king, were but partially fulfilled. Gilbert Earl of Clare, after recovering some of those estates, in Cardiganshire, which had been taken from him in the reign of Stephen, proceeded to attack the possessions of Rhys, in Carmarthenshire: the latter complained to the king of England, but receiving only evasive answers, he attacked and destroyed several of the castles of the English, and obtained forcible possession of the territories, which, in violation of the agreement before mentioned, had been withheld from him. While he was besieging the castle of Carmarthen, King Henry despatched against him a powerful army, under the command of the Earls of Bristol and Clare, augmented by the forces of the prince of North Wales: Rhys withdrew his men to the mountains of Cevn Rhester, and the confederated army, finding no enemy to oppose, encamped for a short time in the Vale of Tywi, and then removed into North Wales.

On the return of Henry from Normandy, in 1163, being informed that Rhys had, during his absence, continued to molest his vassals, he led an army into South Wales, as far as Pencader, in this county, ten miles north of Carmarthen, where, before the commencement of hostilities, some of the chieftains of Brecknockshire interfering, matters were so arranged that Rhys, on condition of retaining certain districts, gave two of his nephews as hostages for his future submission. These the king delivered into the custody of the Earl of Gloucester, who inhumanly put them to death; and, on this act of treachery, the Welsh prince again flew to arms, and proceeded against the possessions of Gloucester, in Cardiganshire, and afterwards against those of other English proprietors, in Pembrokeshire. After this expedition, which proved completely successful, he was joined in his operations against the English by Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, and the chieftains of Powys: this confederacy was soon attacked by the English monarch, but the blow fell upon North Wales, whither Rhys led his troops to the common defence of their country. He afterwards again invaded Cardigan and Pembroke, and returned to his castle of Dynevor, loaded with spoil; but, for a long period subsequent to this expedition, he remained on the most friendly terms with the English monarch, whom he met at Cardiff, on his way to Ireland, in 1172, and again at Tâlacharn, now commonly called Laugharne, in this county, on the king's return from that country. Some time after, when Henry was about to leave England for France, he appointed Rhys chief justice of South Wales. On the accession of Richard I. to the throne, in 1189, Rhys once more became the enemy of English power, and, having mustered his forces, laid siege to the castle of Carmarthen, which he took and demolished, and then proceeded towards the Marches, where he captured several castles, and returned to Dynevor in triumph: on this occasion he strengthened the castle of Kidwelly, rendering it handsomer than any of his other fortresses. Rhys died in 1196, being then styled Arglwydd, or lord, which title was transmitted to his descendants, having lost his rank and authority as a sovereign by his forced submissions to the English monarch. He was succeeded in his territories and his lordship of South Wales by his son, Gruffydd ab Rhys, who was attacked and made prisoner at his castle of Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire, by his brother Maelgwyn, aided by Gwenwynwyn, son of Owain Cyveilioc, lord of Powys, but was released in the year following by the English lords, into whose custody he had been given by Gwenwynwyn, and, in 1199, succeeded in expelling his usurping brother from his domains in Cardiganshire: on the death of his brother Meredydd, in 1201, he also seized upon his estates and his castle of Llandovery, the latter of which, on the death of Gruffydd in the year following, fell into the possession of Maelgwyn, from whom it was taken, in 1204, by Rhys, son of Gruffydd, who had succeeded to the territory of his father. Rhys afterwards took and fortified Llangadock castle, in this county; but his uncle, assisted by his ally Gwenwynwyn, forced him to abandon his conquests, of which, however, he re-possessioned himself on Maelgwyn's withdrawing his forces into Cardiganshire. About the year 1209, Rhys Vychan, or Rhys Grŵg, brother of Maelgwyn, who had hitherto been on friendly terms with his nephews, Rhys and Owain ab Gruffydd, turned his arms against them, and took the castle of Llangadock; but they marched against that fortress with all their forces, destroyed the garrison, and razed it to the ground. Rhys Vychan, fearing also the power of Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, who had espoused the cause of the younger chieftains, departed for England, where he obtained a supply of troops from King John; and returning with these reinforcements, he invested and took the castle of Llandovery: Maelgwyn also, on making submission to the English monarch, was allowed a large body of English auxiliaries, with which he marched into Cardiganshire. After some refractory conduct on the part of the young lords, who had refused to do homage to the English king, they were received into favour; but the uncles soon after throwing off their allegiance, Rhys and Owain carried on a protracted warfare against them, and at last implored the assistance of King John in the recovery of their property, of nearly the whole of which their uncles had by degrees deprived them. That monarch ordered Viscount Foulke to demand of Rhys Vychan the castle of Llandovery, with the territory appertaining to it, for the use of young Rhÿs and his brother; but all accommodation of that kind being refused, the English commander, attended by the two brothers, with all the forces they could collect, marched towards Dinevor, and, being met on the way by Rhÿs Vychan, a battle ensued, in which the latter was defeated with considerable loss. From the field of action he retreated towards Dynevor, and, having reinforced the garrison of that fortress, burned the town of Llandilo-Vawr to the ground, and retired to the most inaccessible parts of the neighbouring country. Foulke and the young lords assaulted the castle with such vigour, that the next day the garrison surrendered, on condition of being allowed to depart with their arms; and the remainder of the district submitted without resistance. Rhÿs Vychan removed his family to Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire, but was himself shortly after taken prisoner at Carmarthen, and committed to the king's prison there, but soon released on giving hostages: after the departure of Foulke, the castle of Llandovery surrendered to Rhÿs ab Gruffydd.

This young prince having been reconciled to his uncle Maelgwyn, their united forces invaded Pembrokeshire: these chieftains afterwards did homage to Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales; and Rhÿs attacked several of the English vassals, taking first the castle of Kidwelly, in this county, and afterwards advancing into Glamorganshire. The same year, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth led a large army into South Wales against the English settlers; and in the course of the expedition, in which he was assisted by the forces of Rhÿs ab Gruffydd, his brother Owain, and their two uncles, he took the castle of Carmarthen, which he razed to the ground, and afterwards those of Llanstephan, St. Clear's, Talacharn, or Laugharne, and Emlyn, in this county, besides others in Cardiganshire. Afterwards, young Rhÿs and his brother, in alliance with Llewelyn, attacked the territories of Llewelyn's son-in-law, Reginald de Breos, in Brecknockshire: Llewelyn placed a strong garrison in the castle of Carmarthen, and is also stated to have given Rhÿs Gruffydd permission to do homage to the king of England for some of his lands. Rhÿs afterwards quarrelled with Llewelyn concerning the possession of his castle of Cardigan, but was reconciled to him through the mediation of Henry III., and died in the course of the same year. In the absence of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, then engaged in Ireland on behalf of the English monarch, Llewelyn took several of that nobleman's castles in South Wales, the garrisons of which he put to the sword, and replaced with his own soldiers; but the earl, on his return in 1223, retaliated upon the possessions and subjects of Llewelyn, taking the castles of Cardigan and Carmarthen. The Welsh prince, to oppose his progress, despatched into Carmarthenshire his son Gruffydd, who, having arrived at Kidwelly, intended to have taken up his quarters there; but hearing of a conspiracy that had been formed by the inhabitants to betray him to the Earl of Pembroke, he set fire to that town, and marched towards Carmarthen, where the earl was then posted. The latter crossed the river Tywi, and gave him battle; and the obstinate engagement that ensued was terminated only by the darkness of the night, when both commanders withdrew their forces, neither of them having obtained any advantage: the earl kept his troops in Carmarthen, and Gruffydd encamped for a few days at some distance on the opposite side of the river, but his provisions beginning to fail, he withdrew into North Wales, and the earl retired into Cardiganshire. Rhÿs, son of Rhÿs Vychan, having made his father prisoner, in 1226, obtained from him, as the condition of his liberation, the castle of Llandovery, in this county. In 1233, Richard Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, in consequence of a quarrel with Henry III., in which he was aided by Owain ab Gruffydd, Rhÿs Vychan, and Maelgwyn, son of Maelgwyn ab Rhÿs, who had died in 1230, committed great devastations on the lands of many of the English settlers, and laid siege to the castle of Carmarthen, which successfully resisted his assaults for three months, when the arrival of succours by sea compelled the earl to abandon his enterprise. About this time Rhÿs Vychan died at Llandilo-Vawr, in this county; and his death was followed soon after by that of his nephew, Owain ab Gruffydd, whose possessions descended to his son Meredydd, while those of Rhÿs were shared between his sons Meredydd and Rhÿs, also named Rhÿs Vychan in the Welsh annals. On the death of Davydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, King Henry sent Nicholas de Myles to Carmarthen, with a commission for Meredydd ab Rhÿs Vychan and Meredydd ab Owain to assist in dispossessing Maelgwyn Vychan, son of Maelgwyn ab Rhÿs, of his territories, which the latter abandoned, and retired into North Wales. Rhÿs Vychan, in 1254, obtained possession of the castle of Carreg Cynnen, in this county, which his mother had placed in the hands of some of the English settlers: and having his territory of Builth, in Brecknockshire, taken from him by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, who gave it to Rhÿs' brother Meredydd, he obtained from King Henry a powerful force to aid him in recovering that portion of his territories which was held by Meredydd; and, with these auxiliaries, commanded by Stephen Bacon, he came by sea to Carmarthen, and thence marched against Dynevor castle. Llewelyn, however, sent a large force to the relief of this fortress; and the Welsh leaders, Meredydd ab Owain and Meredydd ab Rhÿs, being thus reinforced, gave battle to the English army, which they totally routed, in one of the most sanguinary conflicts that ever occurred in the principality, with the loss of about two thousand men: Llewelyn's troops afterwards proceeded towards Pembrokeshire, destroying in their march the castle of Llanstephan, in which it is thought that the remains of the English army had taken refuge. In 1258, the Welsh nobility held a convention, in which they solemnly bound themselves to maintain the common cause of their country against the attacks and encroachments of the English; but Meredydd ab Rhÿs soon passed over to the side of the English king, and, during a truce which existed about this period, was sent, in company with Patrick de Canton, the king's lieutenant, to Carmarthen, to negotiate a peace with Llewelyn, who, on his part, appointed commissioners to meet them at Emlyn, now called Newcastle-Emlyn, in this county, and among the number sent his own brother Davydd. Patrick, learning on his journey that his own followers were more numerous than those of the Welsh deputies, attacked the latter unawares with great fury, and slew several of their men, while the chieftains themselves escaped with great difficulty: Davydd their leader, however, immediately raised the surrounding country, and, overtaking the offenders, slew Patrick, with the greater number of his attendants. Edward I., soon after his accession to the English throne, at the same time that he invaded North Wales in person, sent into South Wales a powerful army under the command of Payen de Chaworth, who laid waste the territories of several of the native chieftains, and took possession of the castle of Dynevor, which he had found in the hands of Rhys ab Meredydd, who at that time took part with the English. Edward, on his second and final invasion of North Wales, again had a powerful force actively employed in the southern part of the principality, under the Earl of Gloucester and Sir Edward Mortimer: these noblemen encountered the Welsh forces opposed to them at Llandilo-Vawr, where they completely defeated them. Edward, having accomplished the subjugation of Wales, provided for its future government by the laws contained in the celebrated statute of Rhuddlan, the provisions of which did not interfere with the territories of the lords marcher, in which they exercised jura regalia, but erected the districts which had of late years belonged more immediately to the princes of the house of Dynevor, and were then in the possession of the crown, into the present counties of Carmarthen and Cardigan, which were placed under the same laws and regulations as those of England.

For some years the country remained peaceable; but, during Edward's absence in France, Rhys ab Meredydd, whom that monarch had knighted for his services in aid of the subjugation of South Wales, revolted from his allegiance, took the castles of Llandovery and Dynevor, and burned several towns: Edward sent against him the Earl of Cornwall, who, advancing with his forces into this county, compelled Rhys to abandon the field, and then proceeded to attack his castles. On account of the approach of winter, the Earl of Cornwall suspended his operations, and granted the enemy a truce; and as soon as Rhys found that the English commander had withdrawn his forces, he again took the field, and besieged the castle of Emlyn; but Robert de Tibetot, the justiciary of South Wales, suddenly raising a large force, with the intention of opposing him, he fled to Ireland. Three years afterwards Rhys returned into South Wales, and, having collected a large body of partisans, fought a fierce and sanguinary battle with the justiciary, in which he was defeated with the loss of four thousand men; and being himself taken prisoner, he was shortly after executed as a traitor at York, and his possessions were bestowed on Tibetot in reward for his services. The only important manifestation of public opposition to the authority of the kings of England after this period, in which this county had any share, was at the time of the great revolt under Owain Glyndwr: at this period the French landed twelve thousand men in aid of that chieftain at Milford Haven, whence they marched towards the English border, by way of Carmarthen, the castle of which they took; but on the retreat of the French, the chief men of the county soon after abandoned the cause of Glyndwr, and renewed their allegiance to the English sovereign. On the landing of the Earl of Richmond in Pembrokehire, in August 1485, to contest the possession of the English crown with Richard III., he was immediately joined from this county by Rhys ab Thomas of Abermarlais, the most powerful subject in this part of the island, attended by a numerous body of his friends and adherents, who afterwards led part of the earl's small army through Carmarthenshire into Brecknockshire, in which progress its ranks were swelled by great numbers favourable to the cause, collected by the light of the beacons. Rhys was knighted on Bosworth Field, being the first who received that honour from Henry VII.: and, for his eminent services throughout this contest, Henry appointed him governor of all Wales, constable and lieutenant of Brecknockshire, chamberlain of South Wales in the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, and seneschal of the lordship of Builth in Brecknockshire. Invested with these powers, Sir Rhys calmed the disorders which had arisen from the unsettled state of the supreme government, and fully restored obedience to the laws. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, Richard Vaughan, the first earl of Carberry, about the year 1644, enjoyed the rank of general over this county, together with those of Pembroke and Cardigan, by commission from Charles I.; but, although the forces under his command were far more numerous than those of the parliamentary leaders sent against him, he made no opposition to their progress, and the latter made themselves masters of the country: nevertheless, Vaughan was shortly after created Baron Emlyn, and lord of Carmarthen, yet received not the least molestation from the parliament, and was in high favour with Cromwell. After the great battle of St. Fagan's, in Glamorganshire, this county was the scene of several skirmishes between Colonel Horton, the victorious parliamentary commander in that engagement, and Colonel Poyer, his defeated adversary.

Carmarthenshire is in the diocese of St. David's, and province of Canterbury: it is almost wholly included in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, which comprises the deaneries of Carmarthen, Kidwelly, Llandilo, and Llangadock, in Carmarthenshire, and that of Gower in the county of Glamorgan: four of its parishes are comprised in the archdeaconry of Cardigan: the total number of them is seventy-six, of which fifteen are rectories, thirty-eight vicarages, and twenty-three perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the hundreds of Cathinog, Cayo, Derllys, Elvet, and Perveth (each of which has Higher and Lower divisions), and the three comots, or hundreds, of Carnwallon, Iscennen, and Kidwelly, which form a separate liberty, distinct from the rest of the county, having its own bailiff, coroner, &c. It contains the boroughs, market towns, and ports, of Carmarthen and Llanelly; the incorporated market and sea-port towns of Kidwelly and Laugharne; the market towns of Llandilo-Vawr, Llandovery, Llangadock, and Newcastle-Emlyn; and the small sea-port of St. Clear's. One knight was formerly returned to parliament for the shire, which, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, will henceforward send two, and one representative for the borough of Carmarthen, to which that of Llanelly has been made contributory: the county member was, prior to the passing of the act, elected at Llandilo-Vawr, but they are now to be elected at Carmarthen: the polling-places are Carmarthen, Llandilo-Vawr, and Llandovery. This county is in the South Wales circuit: the assizes, and the Epiphany, Easter, and Michaelmas quarter sessions are held at Carmarthen, and the Midsummer quarter sessions at Llandilo-Vawr: the county gaol and county house of correction are at Carmarthen: there are thirty-five acting magistrates for the county. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £37,957, and the expenditure to £37,978, of which £30,863 was applied to the relief of the poor.

Nearly the whole of the surface of Carmarthenshire is hilly, but it seldom attains a mountainous elevation: by far the greater portion is comprised in the slate tract of South Wales, which occupies all the northern part of the county, from Cwm y Dwr and the river Tywi to its northern and western confines. Here a broken chain of hills, connected with the mountain of Plinlimmon, in Montgomeryshire, and forming for the most part one side of the Vale of Teivy, extends from Brecknockshire towards the sea. On the eastern side of Carmarthenshire commences the long chain called the Black Mountains, which thence extends into Monmouthshire, a conspicuous summit of which, called Y Van, or Ban Sir Gaer, "the Carmarthenshire Beacon," is the highest summit in the county, being two thousand five hundred and ninety-six feet above the level of the sea. This striking and picturesque eminence is separated by a deep and narrow chasm from another of similar appearance, but rather superior elevation, in Brecknockshire; and the summits of both are usually noticed together as Bannau Sir Gaer, or the Carmarthenshire Beacons, to distinguish them from the hills near Brecknock, called Bannau Brecheiniog, or the Brecknockshire Beacons. They are included in the line of red sand-stone soils which extends in a direction generally from east to west across the whole of the southern part of the principality; and hence, suddenly contracting, passes south-westward in a tract of a few miles broad, bounded on the north by the slate district, and on the south by limestone, to the innermost part of Carmarthen bay, and thence west by north into Pembrokehire. From this, beyond a narrow range of limestone, the rest of the county, forming its south-eastern extremity, is included in the great coal field of South Wales, and contains Bettws mountain, being part of a chain which diverges from the Black Mountain, near the upper end of the Vale of Tawe, in Brecknockshire, and thence stretches along the banks of the Amman and Loughor nearly to the sea. The valleys, through which run the rapid and sometimes impetuous streams descending from the more elevated districts, are distinguished for their picturesque beauties, more especially that of the Tywy, or Towy, one of the most extensive in South Wales; but the smaller valleys are of more uniform appearance than those of Glamorgan and Cardigan. The mountainous tracts are for the most part bleak and dreary, except to the north of Llandilo-Vawr and Llandovery, where the scenery has the general character of that of Cardiganshire, upon which it borders. On the shores of the Burry river and the bay of Carmarthen, from Loughor to Kidwelly, are several extensive salt marshes; and Laugharne marsh, on the northern side of the bay, comprises two thousand acres of excellent land, besides a large sandy tract. This county contains several small lakes worthy of notice: of these, Llyn Tegwyn, sometimes called Pwll yr Escob, or the "Bishop's Pool," of a circular form and about half a mile in diameter, is remarkably situated at its northern extremity, and on the highest summit of Mynydd Mawr, or the Great Mountain, a few miles to the westward of Llandeibie. A lake of the most limpid water, in form nearly a parallelogram, and about a mile in length, is situated at the bottom of the almost perpendicular declivity of the upper part of the Carmarthenshire Beacon: its scenery is rendered awfully grand by the precipitous rocks which overhang it; while, so great is its elevation, that the snow remains unmelted on its shores for seven months in the year. There are also two small lakes at the foot of a lofty hill, near which stand the ruins of the abbey of Talley.

The climate partakes of the great humidity which characterizes that of the western parts of Wales, and which, though favourable to the production of grasses, prevents, in many situations, the perfect and seasonable ripening of corn; more particularly in the Vale of Towy, which opens south-westward to the accumulated vapours of the Atlantic, and up which are attracted dense clouds and mists that are broken by the mountains towards the source of that river, and fall in frequent showers: the harvest commences in few places before the third week in August, except in the south-western part of the county, where it begins towards the close of July, or early in August. Except on the mountains in the eastern and northern parts, the air is in general extremely mild, and hoar frost scarcely ever occurs in the Vale of Towy, save on the southern side, where, the sun being excluded, the frost, after having set in, commonly continues the whole day. The Vale of the Teivy, on the northern side of the county, is not subject to the same degree of humidity as that of the Towy, the range of mountains separating them intercepting the rains from the south, and causing them to be precipitated almost wholly on the southern side. The climate of the higher mountains is cold, wet, and tempestuous.

The soils are very various. In the slate and coal tracts, occupying so much of the surface, they are for the most part of an inferior quality: peat is here found in all the hollows, and sometimes upon the slopes of the mountains; while unfertile clay abounds near their surface in many other places. The soils resting on the slate, which is for the most part of a greyish colour, are poorer wherever the latter assumes a blue cast. The clay of the coal tract contains a considerable admixture of sand, and is therefore less stubborn and more easily brought under tillage than that of the slate. The red soils are in general of an excellent kind and depth for either tillage or pasture; and barley produced on this land, southward of the Vale of Towy, is in great request for seed on the soils of the slate tract. In general, the limestone soils are very shallow; but limestone forms the substratum of a part of the rich tract of Laugharne marsh. The soil of the valleys is for the most part of a light brown or red colour, and a very rich quality, which increases in their descent towards the sea, in proportion to the length of the course of the streams which traverse them: the banks of the Towy and the Taf are more particularly distinguished for their exuberant fertility.

The general system of farming is injudicious, the ground being exhausted by a constant succession of corn crops. Agricultural societies for the encouragement of improved systems of culture, by the distribution of prizes, have been formed in different parts of it ; and the Norfolk system has of late years been introduced on several extensive farms, and various superior modes of management adopted in other places. In the enclosed lands the proportions under grass and under tillage are about equal. Wheat is most extensively cultivated in the Vales of Towy, Llangendeirn, and Llandeibie, in the neighbourhood of St. Clear's, and in Laugharne marsh, which is, nevertheless, chiefly a dairy farm ; but the climate not being favourable to the growth of this grain, good samples are very scarce, and the quantity raised not near sufficient for the supply of the inhabitants of the county, who are therefore under the necessity of importing a great deal from Bristol. The produce in the vales of Towy and Teivy, and in the other richer lowlands, is from twenty to twenty-five bushels per acre, but on the uplands only from ten to fifteen. Barley succeeds better, and produces good crops in bulk, but generally ill-coloured, and frequently thin-bodied, owing to almost incessant rains and damps : the best quality grows on the northern side of the hills separating the vales of Towy and Teivy : the produce on the uplands averages about thirteen bushels per acre, though it is sometimes as low as nine, and sometimes as high as twenty. Oats are very extensively cultivated, more particularly on the uplands, and are the most profitable crop grown : the produce is generally small, but in the vale of the Teivy it is sometimes as much as fifty bushels per acre : large quantities of oats, though of an inferior quality, are annually exported to Bristol and other markets, together with some barley. On some of the hills, separating the vales of Towy and Teivy, oats and barley are sown together, and the produce, being kiln-dried and ground, is made into a kind of bread, called sipris : oaten bread is also frequently used among the hills. Peas are very little cultivated, and beans only in Laugharne marsh. Buckwheat is occasionally grown ; potatoes commonly. Turnips are sometimes grown, but suffer greatly from being choked by the natural grasses produced by superabundant moisture. Vetches are sown in some instances, as also are flax and hemp, more particularly in Laugharne marsh. The principal artificial grasses are trefoil, red and white clover, and rye-grass : lucern is cultivated in a few places. After a course of tillage, more particularly in Laugharne marsh, the land is sometimes left to recover its native sward without being sown with any kind of grass seeds, but this practice is gradually falling into disuse. The beautiful Vale of Towy is the tract most distinguished for the excellence of its grass lands, more particularly from Llangadock down to Carmarthen, and thence to the sea, in which latter extent they consist chiefly of drained marshes : next to this the banks of the Tâf are most noted. In those parts of the county which border on Cardiganshire and Pembroke-shire the pastures are frequently fogged ; that is, they lie ungrazed from June until March, when the grass becomes of great value, and, owing to the mildness of the winter, has suffered no damage. Meadows conveniently situated have, in a few instances, been brought under a system of artificial irrigation. The chief produce of the dairy is butter and cheese : the former is exported in considerable quantities to Bristol and Merthyr-Tydvil, in casks containing about one hundred lb. ; while the cheese, which is made almost exclusively of skimmed milk, is chiefly consumed in the county. Lime is the most common manure, and is frequently brought from a considerable distance : the practice of folding sheep is generally pursued on the upland farms. The agricultural implements are for the most part of a light and improved construction ; the ploughing teams generally consist of two horses with a driver. Waggon's are sometimes seen in the more level parts of the county, but carts are every where in more common use : these are drawn by one horse in the shafts, and two abreast before him, which are usually driven in hand, and guided by a single rein fastened to the bridle of the near leader. The most common kind of cattle is a native black breed : on the mountains they are very small, but in the vales and richer lands attain a middling size, though they are every where ill-shaped and unprofitable for the dairy. Besides these, Carmarthenshire contains also black Pembroke-shire cattle, better known as the Castle-martin breed, which are chiefly found in the parts bordering on that county ; some of the brown Devonshire breed ; and, in the neighbourhood of Llandovery, Llangadock, &c., a few of the Herefordshire sort. The breed of sheep for which it is most distinguished is that of its mountains, which occupies more particularly the high bleak and open tracts between the Teivy and the Towy. Little attention is in general bestowed on these sheep : some of them are horned, and for the most part they have white faces and legs : their wool is short and coarse, and is used in the manufacture of flannels, blankets, ordinary cloths, and felt hats : the general average weight of the wethers of this small, hardy, and intractable race is from eight to twelve lb. per quarter. Many South Down sheep have been introduced. The horses are in general compact, bony, and of a middling size, and many for the saddle are handsome. The hogs are partly of the old slouch-eared kind, and partly of the same intermingled with the short-eared Chinese breed : great numbers are reared, and exported chiefly to Bristol. The genial climate of the districts bordering on the coast is particularly favourable to horticulture : there are but few orchards. This county, which was formerly well wooded, is now the reverse : various plantations have, however, been made of late years by different gentlemen ; and at Velindre, near Newcastle-Emlyn, are several extensive nursery-grounds for forest trees. About one-third of the county consists of wastes, many of which are not common, but have been appropriated in respective portions to the adjacent estates. One-half of them is supposed to be capable of improvement by cultivation, and is now being enclosed ; but the other half, owing to superior elevation and other difficulties, can never receive such amelioration. They are depastured by the occupiers at large within the several manors to which they belong, subject only to the restriction that no one must turn upon them more than his farm will support during the winter. Numerous flocks of the small mountain sheep are kept upon most of the hills, together with a few inferior cattle and horses : but the highest elevations, during the winter, are occupied by no kind of stock. The greatest extent of these wilds is on the hills between the rivers Towy and Teivy : the rest lie to the south-east of the Vale of Towy, on the red sand-stone tract, on the limestone hills, and on the mountains of the coal tract : those on the Black Mountains, occupying parts of each of these three districts, on the eastern side of the county, are very extensive and elevated. A greater number of acres of waste land has, of late years, been enclosed (under the sanction of acts of parliament), in this county than in any other of South Wales. In the south-eastern parts of it coal is the principal fuel, being there obtained in great abundance: in the parts remote from the coal tract, peat and turf are frequently used.

The mineral productions are various and important, but consist chiefly of coal and iron. The south-eastern part of the county is included in the great coal and iron tract of South Wales, bounded on the north by a narrow range of limestone, which, running eastward from the border of Pembrokeshire, appears first in the parish of Pendine below Laugharne, and then dips under the inner part of the bay of Carmarthen, to Llanstephan, whence it takes a north-easterly direction through the parishes of Kidwelly and Llangendeirn, by the lake on the Great Mountain and the village of Llandeibie, and over the Black Mountain into Brecknockshire. The deepest part of the mineral basin, of which this limestone range forms the northern rim, extends from the vicinity of Llanelly eastward nearly to Neath in Glamorganshire; and from this tract the strata of the whole formation rise to the surface in every direction. The beds of coal rising immediately to the north and south of Llanelly are of a bituminous quality, but those lying lower in the formation, and appearing on the surface, between four miles north of Llanelly and the limestone range, are of the kind called by the Welsh glo caled, and by the English "stone coal," and of excellent quality: the latter species neither soils the fingers, nor flames when ignited, being entirely devoid of bitumen: this coal is the sort chiefly burned in the county, for which purpose the culm or dust of it is mixed with clay and formed into balls, which, when ignited, emit a strong heat. Of the bituminous coking coal of the higher strata, which is of excellent quality, large quantities are raised in the neighbourhood of Llanelly, of which part is consumed in the county, and the rest exported. The iron-ore accompanying the coal strata is worked near Llanelly, as it also was formerly on the Great Mountain, from which latter situation it was conveyed by a tram-road to the furnaces at Llanelly. In the vicinity of Kidwelly, accompanying the limestone which forms the northern edge of the coal and iron tract, copper-ore is found in great abundance, but at present is worked only on a limited scale, and is conveyed by land carriage to Llanelly, where it is smelted. The only lead mine is one belonging to Lord Cawdor, situated in the slate tract, at Rhandir y Mwyn, in the parish of Llanvair ar y brÿn, about six miles above Llandovery, in the Vale of Tywi: this was formerly one of the most extensive works of the kind in the kingdom, and its produce was conveyed by land carriage to Llanelly, to be smelted; but it is now discontinued. The principal building stones obtained are, anomalous ranges of freestone in the slate tract, one of which is worked at Cwm Cerrig Nadd, near Ystyfylan Carn, about three miles north-east of Carmarthen; the siliceous stone of the red sand-stone tract; the freestone of the coal measures; and semi-indurated shale, which, for want of better materials, is frequently used in the slate tract. Great quantities of argillaceous slates, of a good quality, are raised at Coed Gwili, two miles from Carmarthen: several other quarries are worked in the dingles to the north-west of the Towy; and micaceous schist forms part of the strata of the Carmarthenshire Beacons, and of the coal tract. Firestones, for ovens, are obtained in some parts of the red sand-stone and slate tracts. In the parish of Llangendeirn are several marble quarries, in the range of limestone forming the northern border of the coal tract: this marble has a black ground variegated with white, bears a beautiful polish, and is wrought on the spot into chimney-pieces, &c., which are exported chiefly to Bristol: it is also used for tombstones in the surrounding country. Lime is obtained from some detached rocks about Llandilo and Dryslwyn, in the Vale of Towy; as well as in the continued line from the southern side of the Carmarthenshire Beacons, westward by Clogau Mawr, Cerrig Cynnen, Llandeibie, Mynydd Mawr, Llangendeirn, &c.; and under the head of Carmarthen bay, to Llanstephan Castle and Pendine. Fossil impressions of plants are common in the strata of sand-stone, alum shale, &c., lying contiguous to the coal beds. The manufactures and commerce of Carmarthenshire are by no means extensive. The chief manufacturing district is that of which Llanelly forms the centre, where the great abundance and excellent quality of the coal obtained in this part of the county have caused the establishment of three copper-works and two iron-foundries. A few years ago there were also iron and tin works at Carmarthen and Kidwelly, the former of which have been wholly abandoned at both places; and the tin-works at the latter are now conducted only on a very limited scale. All these works have been established in their present situations for the convenience of obtaining coal, and of maritime conveyance. Considerable quantities of woollen stockings are knitted by the women in the mountainous districts, and many of them brought for sale to the fairs: many hides and skins are tanned, dressed, and exported. The principal articles of export are, butter for the English border counties, Bristol, the great mineral tract of Glamorgan, &c.; considerable quantities of wool for the manufactures of the North; leather for Bristol, &c.; coking and stone coal, and culm; iron, in pigs, bars, bolts, and castings; tin plates; copper, in plates or unmanufactured; lead; and marble. The chief imports are shop goods, for the most part from Bristol; copper-ore, from Cornwall, Anglesey, &c., to be smelted; and tin, from Cornwall, to be manufactured. According to the custom-house regulations, this county has but one port, that of Llanelly, to which all the rest are creeks. The fishery off the coast is nearly monopolised by a Dartmouth company, which supplies the market of Bristol with much of its white fish, by trolling here: the main bed of fish extends from Worms Head, in Gower, westward towards Tenby, in Pembrokeshire, and southward several leagues around Lundy Island: the species are basse, mullet, whittings, cod in small quantity, turbot, bret, soles, maiden rays, and flat-fish.

The principal rivers are the Tywi, or Towy; the Tâf, or Tave; the Llychwyr, or Loughor; the Teivy; and the Gwendraeth Vawr and Gwendraeth Vâch, or Greater and Lesser Gwendraeth. The largest of these, and one of the finest in South Wales, is the Towy, which rises in the wildest part of Cardiganshire, between Strata Florida and the border of Brecknockshire: after a southerly course of about ten miles, it enters Carmarthenshire near Ystrad-Fin, and pursues the same direction through a romantic valley, for about eight miles further, to Llandovery: approaching this place, the mountains recede on each side, leaving in the interval a rich and beautiful valley of considerable width, through which the Towy winds south-westward, gradually assuming a more majestic character: after a further course from Llandovery of about twenty-seven miles, it reaches the metropolis of the county, where it becomes navigable for vessels of three hundred tons' burden, and whence it winds southward a distance of eight miles through fertile marshes, and falls into the Bristol channel in Carmarthen bay, near the village of Llanstephan: the influence of the tide extends upwards to the distance of about a mile above Carmarthen. The fish of this river are much esteemed, more particularly its salmon and sewin, the latter of which are found only in the rivers of South Wales that take a southerly or westerly course. This river, running through the centre of the county, collects the great mass of its waters: its chief tributaries from the north are the Gwili, which joins it at Aberguilly; and the Cothi, which rises at Cwm Cothi, near the border of Cardiganshire, and falls into the Towy above the mouth of the Gwili, after a course of about twenty-four miles: from the south it receives the waters of the Brân, near Llandovery; those of the Sawddwy (which descends from the small lake at the foot of the northern steep of the Carmarthenshire Beacon), near Llangadock; and those of the Cynnen to the south of Llandilo; besides innumerable smaller streams on both sides. The Tâf, or Tave, has its source in the Llanvyrnach mountains, in Pembrokeshire, and, having formed for a short distance the boundary between that county and Carmarthenshire, enters the latter, and flows south-eastward to St. Clear's, where, on receiving the Cowyn, it becomes navigable, and thence flows through a rich and level tract, by the town of Laugharne, emptying itself into the bay of Carmarthen through a small æstuary, after a course of about twenty-four miles: this river is navigable to Laugharne for large ships, and to St. Clear's for those of one hundred tons' burden: besides inferior streamlets, the Tâf receives the small rivers Morlais and Cathgenni. The Loughor rises in a copious stream from a limestone rock called the Eye of Loughor, in the parish of Llandilo-Vawr, and near the western extremity of the Black Mountain: near its source it forms a fine cascade in precipitating itself over a ledge of limestone rocks, eighteen feet in height, and thence, flowing southward, is joined from the north-east by the Ammon, a stream considerably larger than itself: still proceeding southward, and receiving the waters of various smaller streams, it soon becomes the boundary between this county and that of Glamorgan; and at last, after a course of about fourteen miles, enters the creek of Loughor, near the town of that name, in Glamorganshire: this noble æstuary, however, on being joined by an insignificant stream from Gower, receives the name of Burry River, and, sweeping westward round the south-eastern extremity of the county, joins the bay of Carmarthen a little below Llanelly, where its mouth is contracted by the north-western extremity of the county of Glamorgan: this creek is navigable for vessels of small burden up to Loughor, and is distinguished for its fine salmon and sewin. The Teivy, which has its source in the mountains of Cardiganshire, becomes the northern boundary of Carmarthenshire at Kellan, and so continues for a distance of twenty-seven miles, until it is joined by the small stream of the Cuch, which, for some distance, separates the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke: the scenery on the banks of this river, below Lampeter, is beautifully picturesque: its salmon is of a particularly fine sort, and it is the most northern river in which the sewin is found. The Gwendraeth Vawr has its source in the lake on the Great Mountain, and thence flows south-westward: the Gwendraeth Vâch, taking a nearly parallel course, flows through the town of Kidwelly, and joins the Gwendraeth Vawr a little below that town: their united waters are discharged into the bay of Carmarthen through a small æstuary opening westward, after a course of about six miles: the lesser Gwendraeth is navigable for vessels of small burden up to Kidwelly. Various canals have been projected in the mining parts of the county, but the only one yet constructed is the Kidwelly canal, made about the year 1766, which is about three miles long: it was originally called "Keymer's," and was private property, having been formed for the purpose of a ready communication between some coal mines and the small harbour of Kidwelly. Some years ago, however, it was transferred to a company known as the "Kidwelly Canal Company," by whom it was extended a distance of two miles up the Vale of Gwendraeth; and a branch, three miles and a half in length, was constructed to communicate with Pembrey harbour. The rail-roads are of small extent, pervading only the limited district which comprises the mines and manufactures. The principal one, which forms a communication between the mines and works of Mynydd Mawr, or the Great Mountain, and the port of Llanelly, commencing at the former, where coal and iron were formerly raised in vast quantities, is carried down to Llanelly, a distance of thirteen miles; and from this place a branch three miles in length has been extended westward, under the provisions of an especial act of parliament, to Pembrey, a distance of three miles. Carmarthenshire is intersected in almost every direction by good turnpike roads. The road from London to St. David's, by Oxford and Gloucester, runs the whole length of the county from east to west, entering from Trêcastle, in Brecknockshire, and passing through the towns of Llandovery, Carmarthen, and St. Clear's, into Pembrokeshire: that from London to Cardigan branches from this at Llandovery to Lampeter, in Cardiganshire; and from Trêcastle there is a branch into this county through Llangadock to Llandilo-Vawr. The road from London to Haverfordwest by Cardiff enters from Loughor in Glamorganshire, and passes through Llanelly, Kidwelly, and Laugharne, into Pembrokeshire.

Among the most remarkable ancient British remains is a large Druidical circle of upright stones, of about twenty yards in diameter, in the parish of Llanboidy: this is called "Buarth Arthur," and sometimes "Meini Gwyr," and the entrance to it is by an avenue of smaller stones of a similar description. Near this is a large cromlech, called Gwael y Vil ast, or Bwrdd Arthur, "Arthur's Table," formed by a rough flat stone, of about ten feet in diameter and three feet thick, supported upon four others placed perpendicularly in the ground. Near Convil in Elvet is another very large cromlech, now nearly destroyed, surrounded by upright stones placed at irregular distances; and in its vicinity is a large tumulus, or barrow: other tumuli occur in different places, more particularly in the parish of Llanvihangel ar Arth, near the banks of the Teivy; higher up the same valley is one called Y Castell, or "the Castle," in the adjoining parish of Llanllwny; another in the parish of Newchurch, or Eglwys Newydd; another, a very remarkable one, at Trelech ar Bettws, consisting of loose stones with a thin covering of earth; and several others in the parish of Penboyr. In the parish of Convil in Elvet is a very remarkable earthwork, consisting of an embankment about eighteen feet in height, and nearly a mile and a half in length, called the Line. In the same neighbourhood is also a very large British encampment, of an oval form; and near this are two tumuli. Other encampments of similar origin may be traced on Grongar Hill, overlooking the Vale of the Towy, and near Golden Grove, in the same neighbourhood. Near Llanduvaen, in the vicinity of the Black Mountain, are some remarkable excavations, supposed to have been the sites of ancient British habitations; and south-eastward from Llangadock is a hill, forming the extremity of the Black Mountain range in this direction, called Tri Crûg, or the "Three Hillocks," from three large heaps of stones raised upon its summit, which are conspicuous objects to a great distance around, and near which are the remains of a large circular encampment. The Roman road, the Via Julia Maritima, entered Carmarthenshire at Loughor, and proceeded to the present town of Carmarthen, whence it is judged to have been continued by or near the village of Llanboidy to the station Ad Vice-simum, in Pembrokeshire; but no traces of it have yet been discovered in this county. The Via Julia Montana, the course of which rests only on conjecture, is thought by some to have entered from Brecknockshire at Tâl y Sarn, in the parish of Mothvey, and thence proceeded by Llangadock and Llandilo-Vawr to Carmarthen, where it joined the Via Julia Maritima; but others, among whom is Sir Richard Colt Hoare, are of opinion, that, from Rhÿd y Briw, in Brecknockshire, it reached the same point by Trêcastle and Llandovery. Several vicinal ways have been traced through parts of the county: one of these, called the Sarn Helen, entering from Lampeter in Cardiganshire, may be traced as far as the New Inn on the road towards Carmarthen, where all appearance of it is lost: this formed the communication between the station Loventium, in Cardiganshire, and that of Maridunum, at Carmarthen. Another, also called the Sarn Helen, led from the station at Llanvair ar y brÿn, to that of Loventium in Cardiganshire, and may be traced from the former place, passing near Llanyerwys church, to the valley of the small river Twrch; while a third, from Llanvair, takes a north-easterly course along the Vale of the Brân into Brecknockshire, through which it was continued to the station on the Ython, in Radnorshire. The remains of Roman occupation discovered at Llanvair ar y brÿn are remarkably numerous, consisting of bricks, pottery, coins, lamps, &c. A great variety of Roman coins has been found, more particularly at Killymaenllwyd, in the parish of Llanboidy; in that of Convil-Cayo; and in that of Penboyr: some of these are among the most ancient that have been found in the island: various other minor relics of that people are occasionally discovered in other places, more especially near Convil-Cayo, where a golden torques has been found; and Roman encampments may yet be seen on Grongar Hill, and in a field on the northern side of the town of Carmarthen, called the Bulrack, and near the church of Penboyr.

At the period of the Reformation there were in this county, at Aberguilly, a considerable college of prebendaries, priests, &c.; at Alblanda, or Whiteland, called in Welsh Tŷ Gwyn ar Tâff (the white house on the river Tâf), a Cistercian abbey; at Carmarthen, an Augustine priory and a house of Grey friars; at Kidwelly, a Benedictine priory; and at Talley, a Premonstratensian abbey: prior to that era there was also a small alien priory at St. Clear's. There are remains of the abbeys of Talley, near Llandilo-Vawr, and Whitland, about five miles from St. Clear's, and also of the priory of Carmarthen: in the parish of Llanllwny, near the church, are some remains of a priory, called by the inhabitants Yr hên Briordy; and upon a farm, called Maes Nonny, or the "Nun's Field," in the same neighbourhood, are those of a nunnery. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the churches of Carmarthen, Kidwelly, and Laugharne. There are remains of the castles of Carmarthen; Carreg Cynnen, about four miles east of Llandilo-Vawr; Dynevor, near Llandilo-Vawr; Dryslwyn, on a singular detached eminence in the Vale of Towy; Kidwelly; Laugharne; Llandovery; Llanstephan, near the mouth of the Towy; and Newcastle-Emlyn: the remains of the castle of Kidwelly are more perfect than those of any other similar edifice in the principality: Carmarthen and Dynevor castles were the chief residences of the princes of South Wales. The modern seats are numerous; some of them are noble edifices, and many of them elegant. Among those more particularly worthy of notice are, Aberguilly, now the only episcopal residence belonging to the see of St. David's; Aberglâsney, the residence of John W. Philipps, Esq.; Abermarlais, that of Admiral Sir Thomas Foley, G. C. B.; Court Henry, that of the Rev. Henry Green; Dôlcothy, that of — Johnes, Esq.; Dôlhaid, that of — Lloyd, Esq.; Glanbrân, that of Col. Gwynne; Glanrhÿdw, that of J. E. Saunders, Esq.; Glyn hîr, that of Mrs. Dubuisson; Golden Grove, that of Earl Cawdor; Iscoed, that of the Rev. Edward Picton; Kilgwyn, that of Major J. P. Gwynne Holford; Killymaenllwyd, that of John Rees, Esq.; Llanelly House, that of William Chambers, Esq.; Llanstephan Place, that of George Meares, Esq.; Llÿs Newydd, that of Thomas Lewis, Esq.; Llwynbrân, that of Captain Rice; Maes Gwynne, that of Walter R. H. Powel, Esq.; Middleton Hall, that of — Adams, Esq.; Dynevor Castle, that of Lord Dynevor, lineally descended from the celebrated Rhÿs ab Thomas, who was knighted by Henry VII.; Rhÿdygors, that of D. J. Edwardes, Esq.; Stradey, that of — Lewis, Esq.; Taliaaris, that of the late Lord Robert Seymour; Ystrad, that of John Jones, Esq.; &c. The farm-houses and offices, and the cottages, are in many instances of an inferior kind, the chief cause of which in the slate district is the want of proper materials for their construction: in that district, and in some places in the other parts of the county, the walls of the cottages are often built of mud, about five feet high, the roof being of thatch, and the chimney of wattle and dab, held together by bandages of hay-ropes. In different parts of the county are springs possessing medicinal properties, and noted in their respective vicinities for the cure of various disorders: those of the greatest celebrity and most resorted to are chalybeate, and are situated in Middleton Hall Park, near the village of Llanarthney, about seven miles above Carmarthen, in the delightful vale of Towy. In the parish of Convil-Cayo are two very strong sulphureous springs, of ancient fame, and a chalybeate spring; and near Convil in Elvet is a chalybeate water, called "the spring of Fos-Sana," which, from its name, is supposed to have been known to the Romans, and called by them Fons Sana: other mineral springs occur in the parish of Penboyr and some other places. In the parish of Llandeveyson, near Llandilo, is a spring which ebbs and flows twice every day, and is called Fynnon or Nant y Rheibio, "the bewitched well or brook." The fences in the slate and coal tracts frequently consist of dry, stone walls: in these districts the holly is very common and flourishing. In this county, as in those of Pembroke and Cardigan, there is a remarkable intermixture of landed possessions, a small patch of land often lying isolated in the midst of an estate belonging to another individual: this was particularly the case with the estates of Sir Rhys ab Thomas, which, besides the demesnes attached to his castles and manors, were scattered all over this part of the country, in small and unconnected tenements. The manners of the people are considered to be, on the whole, less pleasing than in most parts of Wales: this is more especially remarked at the western extremity of the county, the rudeness of the inhabitants of which is attributed to their habitual jealousy and dislike of their neighbours of Pembrokeshire, who are descended from the Anglo-Norman and Flemish colonists of that region.

Arms.

CARNARVON (CAERNARVON), a sea-port, borough, and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, in the parish of LLANBEBLIG, locally in the hundred of Isgorvai, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 250 miles (N.W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is the county town of Carnarvonshire, and may be regarded as the metropolis of North Wales, owes its origin to the Roman station Segontium, so named from its situation on the river Seiont, which, rising in the lake of Llŷn Peris, falls into the Menai straits near the spot. It was the most important post occupied by the Romans within the limits of North Wales, and communicated with the station Deva, now Chester, by the ancient Watling-street, and with South Wales by the road since called the Via Occidentalis. This station is by Nennius, in his catalogue of British cities, called Caer Cystenig, or "the castle of Constantine;" and the writer of the life of Gruffydd ab Cynan states that Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, built a castel at Hén Gaer Cystenni, which the Latin translator has rendered "in antiqua urbe Constantini Imperatoris." From the situation of Segontium, opposite to Mona, or Anglesey, it obtained the British name of Caer yn Arvon, signifying the strong hold in the country opposite to the isle of Mona; and this appellation, with a very trifling alteration, was transferred to the present town, which subsequently rose from the ruins, and was partly built with the materials, of the ancient station. After the departure of the Romans from Britain, the city of Segontium was frequently the residence of the British princes of North Wales, who assumed and exercised supreme authority over the petty states into which the Roman province of Britannia Secunda was now divided. Cadwallon, son of Cadvan, who distinguished himself by his valour in opposing the inroads of the Saxons into North Wales, and who was killed while fighting against them in Northumbria, in the year 676, was the first of these princes that held his court in this place, which was probably selected, on account of the strength of its fortifications and the security of its situation, as a residence for their families, while they themselves were employed in the prosecution of the wars in which they were almost incessantly engaged, not only with the Saxons, but also with the Irish and Picts, and at a later period with the Danes, who were continually making predatory incursions into their territories. Carnarvon continued to be the residence of the native princes till about the year 873, when Roderic the Great transferred, or rather restored, the seat of government to Aberfraw, on the southern shores of the Isle of Mona, or Anglesey, where it had been originally established, in the fourth century, by Caswallon Law-hîr, the first native sovereign, and where it afterwards remained for several centuries.

Soon after the Norman conquest of England, Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, having nearly subdued the whole of North Wales, in which he committed the most frightful ravages, erected several fortresses in different parts of the principality, in order to secure his conquests, and among them the castle at this place, which was probably the first building of any importance near the site, and was perhaps the origin of the present town, which, though it is supposed to have taken its name from Edward I., to whom its foundation has been attributed, is mentioned under that name at a much earlier period. Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, having banished his brother Cadwaladr, the latter engaged in his service several Irish chieftains and a large body of troops, and landed at Abermenai, a few miles to the south-west of Carnarvon, where he was opposed by Owain, with a powerful army. But the two brothers having amicably adjusted their differences, without having further recourse to arms, the Irish were so incensed, that they detained Cadwaladr a prisoner, until they received their stipulated remuneration. That prince, having given them two thousand head of cattle, was set at liberty; and Owain, being apprised of this, suddenly attacked the Irish, and, having slain great numbers of them, took from them not only the cattle given by Cadwaladr, but other spoils and prisoners captured by them in the adjacent country. Giraldus Cambrensis, who accompanied Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, on his route through Wales, to preach the crusades, in 1188, mentions this place in his Itinerary; and a charter granted by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth to the priory of Penmon is dated from Carnarvon, in the year 1221. Edward I., immediately after his subjugation of the principality, struck with the importance of a situation so well calculated by nature for security and strength, erected a magnificent castle in this place, to keep the native chieftains in subjection, and to render himself master of his newly acquired dominions, and more especially of the districts in the vicinity of Snowdon, which had been the safe retreat of numbers who set his power at defiance, and still refused to submit to his authority. In this castle he generally resided, while engaged in completing the conquest which he had achieved, and occasionally held his court; and, if not the original founder of the present town, he certainly laid the basis of its subsequent importance and prosperity. This splendid fortress, which for its extent and architectural beauty was the admiration of the country, and of which the remains strikingly display its original grandeur and magnificence, occupies the summit of a compact schistose rock, boldly projecting into the bay of Carnarvon, and bounded on one side by the Menai, on another by the æstuary of the Seiont, and on the third, and partly on the fourth, by a creek, or inlet, from the strait. It was commenced in the year 1282, and is said to have been completed in the short space of one year, Edward having compelled the native chieftains not only to procure artisans and labourers, but also to contribute large sums of money towards the expense of its erection, to which also he appropriated the revenues of the archiepiscopal see of York, which had been kept vacant for that purpose. The walls of the ancient Segontium furnished a portion of the materials, limestone was brought from Anglesey, and breccia, or grit-stone, from the vicinity of Vaenol, near Bangor, for the conveyance of which heavy substances the straits of the Menai afforded every facility. Probably only so much of the castle was completed, within that short period of time, as was necessary for the immediate accommodation of a garrison, as, from a document formerly in the exchequer of Carnarvon, it would appear that the whole of this stately pile was not completed in less than twelve years. The first governor was John de Haverling, under whom, with a chaplain, surgeon, and smith, was a garrison of forty armed men, of whom fifteen were cross-bowmen, and the remainder performed the duty of watch and ward. This establishment, according to Sir John Doddridge's historical account of North Wales, published about the commencement of the seventeenth century, was afterwards differently constituted, and consisted of a constable of the castle, a captain of the town (whose office was occasionally held with that of constable), twenty-four soldiers, for the safe custody both of the castle and the town, and a porter of the town gates.

Notwithstanding all the vigilance and precaution of Edward, that monarch experienced much difficulty in repressing the free spirit of his new subjects, and in 1283, the Welsh chieftains firmly refused either to yield obedience to him as sovereign, unless he would consent to reside in Wales, or to any other person who was not a native of their country. The English monarch, with a view to reconcile them to his government, immediately despatched a messenger to his consort Eleanor, at that time near her confinement, requiring her presence at Carnarvon, for which place she immediately set out, though in the depth of winter, and, performing the journey on horseback, through the almost impassable roads of the country, arrived at the castle, where she was afterwards delivered of a son, on the 25th of April, who, from the premature death of his elder brother, succeeded to the throne by the title of

Edward II., and from the place of his birth was styled Edward of Carnarvon. This prince, immediately after his birth, was presented by his father to the Welsh chieftains, as their future sovereign; and in the year following, Edward, who was then at Bristol, issued from that place a writ tending to conciliate his Welsh subjects, and declaring the town of Carnarvon, among other places in the principality, to be for ever free from the payment of the tax called talliage. With a view to allure the Welsh from their retreats in the mountains, and to encourage trade, that monarch granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, and endowed them with many privileges. In 1289, Adam de Wetenhall was constable of the castle, which office Edward probably conferred afterwards upon his distinguished favourite, Sir Roger de Pulesdon, whom, in 1284, he appointed sheriff and "keeper" of Anglesey, and who resided in a mansion at Carnarvon, called after his name Plâs Pulesdon. Sir Roger having been commanded, in 1294, to levy a subsidy in certain parts of North Wales, towards defraying the expenses of the war with France, the inhabitants had recourse to arms, to resist this novel imposition, and put that officer to death. The insurgents, headed by Madoc, an illegitimate son of Prince Llewelyn, afterwards made a sudden attack upon Carnarvon, at that time crowded with Englishmen, who had assembled at the great fair held there; and having surprised the castle and the town, they massacred the unarmed and defenceless English, and, plundering the town, set it on fire; nor were they subdued until the king himself led an army into the Welsh territory. The young prince Edward, in his 16th year, received the homage of his Welsh subjects at Chester, being invested, as symbols of his authority, with a chaplet of gold round his head, and a silver sceptre in his hand. After the accession of this prince to the throne of England, Carnarvon was for a short time the retreat of Piers Gaveston, the imperious favourite of that monarch, who landed there on his return from Ireland, whither he had been banished. In 1402, the town was assaulted by the troops of Owain Glyndwr, but was valiantly and successfully defended for Henry IV., by Ievan ab Meredydd, and Meredydd ab Hwlkin Llwyd of Glynllivon, to whom, under the command of an English captain, the custody of the castle had been entrusted. So closely was the place besieged on this occasion, that it was found necessary to convey the corpse of Ievan, who died during the siege, by sea, round the peninsular part of the county, for interment at Penmorva.

During the parliamentary war, the castle and town, which were garrisoned for the king, were besieged and taken, in 1644, by Captain Swanley, who captured four hundred prisoners, and obtained a large quantity of arms, ammunition, and plunder. The royalists, however, recovered possession of the place, and Lord Byron was appointed governor; but in 1646 it was again besieged by the parliamentary forces, under Major-Gen. Mytton, to whom the garrison surrendered it on honourable terms. In 1648, Sir John Owen, with a party of royalists, besieged in this town General Mytton and Colonel Mason, who held it for the parliament; but Sir John withdrawing a part of his forces, to intercept Colonels Carter and Twisselton, who had been sent by the parliament to its relief, and were advancing towards Carnarvon, was defeated and taken prisoner near Aber, on the road to Aberconway; the siege was consequently raised, and soon after the whole of North Wales submitted to the parliament.

The town is delightfully situated at the mouth of the river Seiont, which here falls into the Menai strait, and within four miles of Aber Menai, where that strait unites with the sea in St. George's channel: it is surrounded with lofty and massive walls continued from the castle, which are defended by circular bastions at convenient intervals. On the embattled parapets was formerly a fine walk, carried round the whole circuit of the walls, in which were originally only two gates, both defended by two massive towers; the one on the east, looking towards the mountains, and communicating with the new town by means of a bridge thrown over the moat by which the walls are surrounded, and the other on the west, towards the Menai strait, communicating with the Anglesey ferry. Other entrances have been subsequently opened from the suburbs and the extensive ranges of new buildings which are situated without the walls. The plan of the town is regular: the streets, though narrow, intersect each other at right angles, and are well paved and lighted under the provisions of a local act of parliament; a gasometer is now nearly completed, for the purpose of lighting them and the public buildings, &c., with gas: the houses are in general neat and well built, and the inhabitants are supplied with water conveyed by pipes from the mountains. The salubrity of the air, the convenience of its situation for sea-bathing, and the beautiful scenery in the neighbourhood, have made this town the permanent residence of numerous respectable families, and the frequent resort of visitors, for whose accommodation a spacious and elegant hotel has been built, by the Marquis of Anglesey, within the walls, and close upon the shore of the Menai: attached to this establishment, which is replete with every accommodation, is a bath, supplied with sea water by an engine, and furnished with every requisite appendage. Several respectable lodging-houses have also been built for the reception of the increasing number of visitors, whom the advantages of its situation, and the many interesting and pleasing excursions which the vicinity affords, attract to this place during the summer season. The theatre, a small, but neat and well-arranged, building, is opened during the summer months; a billiard-room has been fitted up in one of the towers on the walls, and on the wall extending from the Eagle tower of the castle, along the shore of the Menai, is a broad terrace, forming a pleasant promenade, commanding, at high water, a fine view of the Isle of Anglesey and St. George's channel.

The port, which is a creek to that of Beaumaris, carries on an extensive coasting trade with Liverpool, Bristol, and Dublin: the principal exports are slates, of which about thirty thousand tons are annually shipped from this place, and copper-ore; and the principal imports are, timber from the American colonies, and coal and other commodities from the neighbouring coasts: the coal is deposited on wharfs for the supply of the town and the adjacent country. About twenty vessels are employed in the foreign trade, having an aggregate burden of one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven tons, and employing one hundred and ten men; and in the coasting trade, about one thousand one hundred vessels are engaged, of the aggregate burden of fifty-one thousand two hundred and twenty-six tons, navigated by three thousand five hundred men. Great quantities of fish are taken off this part of the coast, for the supply of the town and neighbourhood, which affords employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants. The harbour has been greatly improved under the provisions of two successive acts of parliament, carried into operation by trustees empowered to levy certain rates and duties on the tonnage of all vessels entering the port; buoys have been laid down on the bar, to mark the entrance; and a breakwater has been constructed at Llanddwyn Point, seven miles to the north-west, forming a secure station for vessels: to point out these and to facilitate the entrance, two beacons have been erected on the high land at Llanddwyn. A station also has been established here for pilots commissioned by the corporation of the Trinity House, with comfortable residences provided for them by the trustees under the act for the improvement of the port, who also pay them an annual stipend for the care and management of a life-boat, which was presented to this port by Admiral Crawley. A patent slip is now being constructed in the harbour, to facilitate the repairing of vessels, and extensive and commodious quays and wharfs have been made, under the provisions of the local acts before noticed. A rail-road has been formed from the town to the slate quarries in the vale of Nantlle, extending for nine miles into the parishes of Llanllyvni and Llanddwrog; and the slates and copper-ore are conveyed in waggons, and deposited in wharfs built on the banks of the river Seiont. The custom-house is a small building of no architectural pretensions, situated outside the town walls, on the terrace extending from the quay to their northern extremity. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied with provisions of all kinds, particularly with butcher's meat, fish, and vegetables. The fairs, principally for cattle, are on March 12th, May 16th, August 12th, September 20th, and December 5th. A new market-house and shambles were built in 1831, at the expense of the corporation, and the old shambles have been converted into a corn market.

Corporate Seal.

This town, the first in the principality that received a royal charter, was, as before observed, constituted a free borough by Edward I., almost immediately after his conquest of Wales: the burgesses were allowed to have a prison for misdemeanants, independently of the sheriff of the county, and were permitted to form a mercantile guild, and invested with divers privileges. If any villein, or bondman, lived within the precincts of the town for a year and a day, either possessing lands or paying scot and lot, he could not be reclaimed by his lord, but became enfranchised, and entitled to all the immunities of the borough: the burgesses were exempted, in every part of the kingdom, from the payment of talliage, lastage, passage, murage, pontage, and every other local imposition and tax: Jews were not permitted to reside in the borough; nor could the burgesses be convicted of any crime committed between the rivers Conway and Dovey, which district included nearly the whole of the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, except by a jury of their own townsmen. By the charter the government is vested in a mayor, who is always the constable of the castle (that office being at present held by the Most Noble the Marquis of Anglesey), two bailiffs, a recorder, and steward, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two stewards, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The constable of the castle holds his office by patent, and the bailiffs are chosen annually from among the burgesses, on the 29th of September; and, with the mayor or constable of the castle, are justices of the peace within the borough. Carnarvon, with the contributory boroughs of Aberconway, Criccieth, Nevin, and Pwllheli, to which Bangor has recently been added, returns one member to parliament: the elective franchise was granted in the 37th of Henry VIII., and the right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, but is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly registered agreeably to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner, or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of voters under the ancient municipal regulations of the borough, at the time of passing the act, was four hundred and eighty; and the number of houses of the yearly value of ten pounds and upwards, situated within its limits, which comprise from two-thirds to three-fourths of the parish of Llanbeblig, and were not altered by the late boundary act, is about three hundred and eighty: the bailiffs of Carnarvon, at which place the election is always held, are the returning officers. The freedom is acquired by residence within the borough, and by gift of the burgesses. The corporation formerly held courts for the trial of all offenders not accused of capital crimes, but have discontinued to exercise that privilege for many years, and the bailiffs usually commit prisoners to the county gaol, for trial at the general quarter sessions. Courts leet and baron were formerly held, but the only court now held is one for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, at which the recorder presides, and of which the jurisdiction is co-extensive with the borough. The guildhall is composed of two of the ancient towers upon the wall, which have been fitted up and accommodated to that purpose. The assizes and sessions for the county, and the election of a knight of the shire, are held at Carnarvon, as the county town. The county hall is an appropriate building, but not distinguished by any architectural features of importance; and the county prison, to which purpose one of the towers has been converted, and the house of correction, are not entitled to particular notice, either as regards their arrangements or structure. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated within the walls, appears to have been originally erected for the use of the garrison only: it has been elegantly fitted up as a chapel of ease to the parish church, which is about half a mile distant. A gallery was erected in it, in 1829, with funds belonging to the National school, and the rents of the seats are appropriated to the support of that institution; and one hundred and fifty free sittings have been added by means of a grant of £100 from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels. There are places of worship within the parish for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The National schools for boys and girls were erected in 1820, at an expense of £350, raised by subscription, and a grant of £100 from the parent society: in these schools two hundred boys and two hundred and twenty girls are gratuitously instructed, under a master and a mistress, partly by the produce of the pews in the gallery of the chapel, and partly by subscription. Certain lands and tenements in the parish of Llanrŷg were bequeathed by John Morris, for apprenticing poor children of the borough; and the interest of several donations and charitable bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £200, is annually distributed among the poor.

The Roman Segontium occupied a quadrangular area of about seven acres, on the summit of an eminence gradually sloping on every side, and was defended with strong walls of masonry, of which, on the south side, there are extensive portions, now in an almost perfect state. There are also vestiges of walls in several places, and within the area are the remains of a building of tiles, plastered over with a smooth and very hard cement, which appears to have been a hypocaust. A golden coin, inscribed T. DIVI. AVG. FIL. AVGVSTVS, was found within the area of the station, which is intersected by the road from Carnarvon to the parish church of Llanbeblig; and in digging the foundations of Cevn Hendré, on part of the site, in 1827, several Roman coins and valuable relics were discovered. Among the latter was found a very thin piece of gold, four inches long and one inch broad, inscribed with mystic characters, principally Greek, which, from their form, appear to be of the second century, and by the import of the names and epithets, of which some are Hebrew, shew it to be a Basilidian talisman. The Basilidian heresy, according to Irenæus, prevailed in Gaul immediately after the Apostolic age, and the discovery of this curious and valuable relic, which is now in the possession of the Rev. T. Trevor, of Cevn Hendré, by whom it was found, proves how rapidly those doctrines spread through the remotest provinces of the Roman empire. Between Segontium and the present town of Carnarvon, on the steep bank of the river Seiont, was an ancient Roman fortress, one of the out-posts belonging to that station, the walls of which, from eleven to twelve feet in height, and six feet in thickness, enclosed a quadrangular area, seventy-four yards in length and sixty-four in breadth: at one of the angles was a heap of stones, probably the ruins of a tower, or circular bastion, the foundation of which was discovered by digging, in which were found the horns of deer, and skeletons of smaller animals. On removing the earth, there appeared to have been a similar bastion at each of the angles of the fort, which seems to have been intended to protect the landing from this part of the river at high water. On the opposite side of the Seiont are vestiges of similar fortifications, other out-posts connected with the principal station, of which the strong post called Dinas Dinlle, on the summit of a circular artificial mount on the shore of the Menai strait, and on the verge of an extensive marsh to the south-west of the present town, was the principal. On very slender and conflicting historical testimony, resting chiefly on the authority of Matthew of Westminster, and on the discovery of a stone inscribed with the letters s. v. c., which was found in a vault among the ruins of Segontium, this place is supposed to have been at one time the residence of the Emperor Constantine, whose father Constantius is stated in the Flores Historiarum to have been interred here. The remains of a chapel, founded during the continuance of the Roman empire in Britain, by Helena, mother of Constantine, are said to have been visible little more than a century ago; and a well in the vicinity, which was formerly in repute for the efficacy of its water, still bears the name of that princess.

The remains of the once important castle of Carnarvon occupy a spacious quadrangular area on the west side of the town: the external walls are very extensive, and in many parts almost entire; they are from eight to ten feet in thickness, and within them runs a corridor, forming a communication with every part of the castle, and opening into the numerous towers which at intervals rise from the battlements of the walls to a very considerable height: of this corridor, a portion, nearly seventy yards in length, is still entire, and is lighted by narrow apertures, through which arrows might be discharged with security against an assailing enemy. Of the towers, thirteen in number, and from the battlements of which rise slender embattled turrets, some are pentagonal, some hexagonal, and others octagonal: two are loftier than the rest, of which one, called the Eagle Tower, from the sculptured devices with which it is ornamented, and in particular from that of an eagle finely sculptured in stone by a Roman artist, and brought from the ancient Segontium, is singularly beautiful: it is pentagonal, and is surmounted by three slender octagonal embattled turrets. The principal entrance is on the north side, through a handsome gateway, under a massive tower, the front of which is decorated with a statue of the founder, with his hand upon his sword, which is half drawn, or probably half returned into the scabbard: the gateway was defended by four portcullises, the grooves of which are remaining, and also the ponderous hinges on which the gates were hung. The smaller entrance, called the Queen's Gate, and through which Queen Eleanor is said to have entered the castle immediately after its erection, is on the south-east, and considerably above the level of the ground on the outside: it is defended by two portcullises, and was probably at that time to be approached only by the drawbridge over the moat; this entrance leads into the Eagle Tower, in a small apartment in which Edward II. was born. In the area, which was anciently divided into an outer and an inner ward, the buildings are in a more dilapidated state than might be expected from the external appearance of the castle: many of them are almost indiscriminate heaps of ruins, and in several of the towers the rooms are merely skeletons of what they were originally. The state apartments appear to have been extensive and commodious, and were lighted by ranges of windows of elegant design, enriched with tracery; and, from the numerous remains of ornamental detail of beautiful character, appear to have been as well adapted to the purposes of a magnificent palace, as the other parts of the building were to those of an impregnable fortress. The staircase of the Eagle Tower is the only one remaining entire; and from the summit an extensive prospect is obtained over the neighbouring parts of Carnarvonshire and the Isle of Anglesey. The prevailing character of the castle, especially in the state apartments, is the decorated style of English architecture; and in the construction of the towers, and those parts of the building which were intended for defence, a happy combination of elegance with security, and of ornament with strength, appears to have been pre-eminently regarded throughout this stupendous and beautiful structure, which, even in its present state of ruin and decay, retains an air of majestic grandeur, and, from its commanding situation, forms a most striking object, towering proudly above the rocks which line the coast, and forming a prominent and interesting feature in the scenery of the surrounding district. Carnarvon gives the title of earl to the family of Herbert.

CARNARVONSHIRE, a maritime county of NORTH WALES, bounded on the east by Denbighshire; on the south by the north-westernmost part of Merionethshire, and by that portion of St. George's channel called Cardigan bay; on the west by that portion of St. George's channel included in the right angle formed by the promontory of Llyn and the southern shore of Anglesey, and commonly called Carnarvon bay; on the north-west by the long, narrow, and rocky strait of the Menai, which separates it from Anglesey; and on the north by the broad expanse of the Irish sea. It extends from  $52^{\circ} 45'$  to  $53^{\circ} 18'$  (N. Lat.), and from  $3^{\circ} 58'$  to  $5^{\circ} 12'$  (W. Lon.); and comprises an area, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, of three hundred and nineteen thousand five hundred and twenty statute acres, or nearly five hundred square miles. The population, in 1831, was 65,753.

The patriotic exploits of the ancient British inhabitants of this county, to whom, during the successive attacks which they experienced from the Romans, Saxons, Normans, and English, its mountain fastnesses frequently afforded refuge, and the events of importance in the Welsh annals of which it has been the scene, have rendered its early history peculiarly interesting. It derives its name from the ancient province of Arvon, in which it was almost wholly included, and which was so called from its situation opposite to Môn, or Mona, the Isle of Anglesey, that name signifying "adjacent to Mona:" its principal town, from having been a fortified station of the Romans, obtained the British appellation of Caer yn Arvon, of which the present name of the town of Carnarvon is a contraction. On the conquest of Wales by Edward I., this name was also appropriated to the shire, which was then created, and which comprises the whole of the ancient province of Arvon (excepting only the comot of Ardudwy, which is in that of Merioneth), with the addition of the comot of Creuddyn, taken from the province of Perveddwlad. The ancient British inhabitants were the Ordovices, who occupied the whole of North Wales. After the Roman conquest of South Britain, which was first extended into this part of it by Suetonius Paulinus, soon after the year 58, it was included in the district called Venedotia, forming part of the great province of Britannia Secunda. Under the Roman dominion, the territory forming the present county of Carnarvon contained the station Segontium, which was situated close to the town of Carnarvon, and that of Conovium, at Caerhên, or Caerhun, near Aberconway; besides being traversed by two considerable roads, viz., the Via Occidentalis, which entered it from the station Heriri Mons at Tommen y Mŵr, in the parish of Festiniog, in Merionethshire, and proceeded directly to Segontium; and a branch of the northern Watling-street, which entered it from the north-western parts of Denbighshire, and passed by Conovium also to Segontium. The latter place (called by the Welsh Caer Segont), and Deganwy, on the eastern bank of the Conway, at its mouth, were for a long period the residences of the princes of North Wales, affording greater safety for their families than any other places in their dominions, during the almost perpetual warfare in which they were engaged. Caswallon, the first prince of North Wales of whom we find any authentic account, had his seat of government at Aberfraw, in Anglesey; but his son and successor, Maelgwyn, usually resided at Deganwy in this county; and it was he who, in the year 552, endowed the see of Bangor with lands and franchises, and built the town of that name near the shores of the Menai. Maelgwyn was succeeded by his son Rhun, who carried on a long and sanguinary war against the Saxons of Northumbria, and, on his return into Wales, bestowed great and peculiar privileges on the men of Arvon, as a recompense for having detained them so long from their families on that northern expedition: these are called in the Welsh chronicles Breinniau gwyr Arvon. Deganwy, having been destroyed by lightning in the year 809, thenceforward ceased to be a royal residence. About the year 819, Egbert King of the West Saxons invaded North Wales, desolating the whole country, as far as the mountains of Snowdon, and then proceeded to attack the island of Mona, afterwards called Anglesey. Carnarvonshire was subsequently, in 853, entered by the hostile forces of the Mercian King Burhred, who advanced through it into Anglesey. In the division of Wales into three principalities, by Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, sovereign of all Wales, one of which he left to each of his three sons, the territory now forming this county was included in that of Gwynedd, or North Wales, the seat of the government of which he had fixed at Aberfraw, and was inherited by his eldest son Anarawd, who also succeeded to the title of Brenhin Cymru Oll, or "King of all Wales." At this period the Snowdonian range of mountains, in this county, guarded by two rivers, the Conway on the north, and that which discharges itself through the Traeth Mawr on the south, and extending completely from the northern extremity of the bay of Cardigan to the bay of Beaumaris, formed a natural barrier over which the Welsh usually retreated when pressed by the English forces, and the principal defiles of which were defended by strong fortifications. Thus the passage of the Conway was guarded by the castle of Deganwy, and the pass of Bwlch y Ddauvaen by that of Caerhên; a fort was constructed at Aber, Dôlwyddelan castle and a watch-tower in the valley of Nant-Francon, and Dôlbardarn castle in that of Nant-Peris; while the passage over the Traeth Mawr, or great sands, was defended on one side by the strong castle of Harlech, in Merionethshire, and on the other by that of Criccieth, with a watch-tower at Kestel Gyvarch, and a fort at Dôlbenmaen; the disposition of the whole displaying in that rude age considerable military skill.

About the middle of the tenth century, the sons of Hywel Dda, princes of South Wales, in their invasion of North Wales, then governed by two princes named Ievav and Iago, laid waste the whole country as far as the Conway, on the banks of which river, at Llanrwst, they were opposed by Ievav and Iago, who completely defeated them, and pursued them into their own dominions. About the year 1055, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, the Saxon leader Harold invaded North Wales, by command of that monarch, to inflict punishment for the ravages committed by the Welsh on the border, and advanced to the mountains of Snowdon without opposition; but soon after, having entered into terms of peace with Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, and his ally, Algar Earl of Chester, he returned into England without proceeding further. Edward, however, soon received fresh provocation from the Welsh, in the conquest of whose country he determined to employ the whole force of his kingdom, and entrusted the execution of this important enterprise to Harold. This leader, having first made a partial invasion of North Wales, and retired, fitted out a fleet at Bristol, with which he sailed round the Welsh coast, while his brother Tostig penetrated with a strong body of horse through the northern part of the principality, the Welsh fleeing to their accustomed retreat, the mountains of Snowdon. Harold, on receiving intelligence of the advance of his brother, landed, and joined him with his infantry; and with these united forces he made himself master of all the more level tracts. Sensible that, in a mountainous region, broken by rivers, defiles, and forests, his soldiers ought to feel as little encumbrance from their arms as possible, he provided his infantry with targets made of hides, and other lighter kinds of armour; and, leaving his cavalry on the plains, under the command of his brother (excepting only a few horse, which, supported by small parties of heavy-armed infantry, he ordered to follow as a body of reserve), he himself advanced at the head of his troops into the mountains, and, having driven the Welsh with great slaughter out of their inmost recesses, at length compelled them to sue for peace; thus subduing those who had never before yielded to the Saxon arms. In the year 1073, Gruffydd ab Cynan, son of Iago ab Edwal, a competitor for the sovereignty of North Wales, who had made a descent in the Isle of Anglesey with a body of Irish troops, crossed the Menai strait into this county. Trahaern, the reigning prince, on this unexpected invasion, collected as many troops as he could, and marched to attack his rival, whom he encountered on Bron yr Erw, just beyond the south-eastern border of the county, near Harlech, in Merionethshire, when the latter was defeated and compelled to recross the Menai in haste. This territory shared with the rest of the northern parts of the principality in the dreadful ravages committed upon them by Hugh Earl of Chester, about the year 1079: this powerful Norman, in order to preserve the conquests which he had made in North Wales, erected different castles, among which was that situated near Bangor. In 1096, at the secret instigation of Owain ab Edwyn, lord of Englefield, and other chieftains of North Wales, a formidable army of English invaded this country, under the command of the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury; and Gruffydd, the reigning prince, unable in time to collect a force sufficient to oppose them, retired to the mountains. The two earls, meeting with no opposition, continued their march through Carnarvonshire to the shores of the Menai, and crossed that strait into Anglesey, into which Gruffydd had further retreated: this county soon after, however, witnessed their retreat; but the Earl of Chester, in the course of the expedition, rebuilt the castle of Deganwy, the ancient seat of the Welsh princes. In 1115, Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of North Wales, having agreed to deliver up to Henry I. of England Gruffydd, the son of Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, who had taken refuge in his court at Aberfraw, the latter, obtaining intelligence of his design, suddenly withdrew; but Gruffydd ab Cynan, discovering the place of his retreat, sent out a body of horsemen to take him prisoner and conduct him back: fortunately for the young prince, he had just time to take sanctuary in the church of Aberdaron, a privileged place at the southern extremity of the county, from which the prince of North Wales commanded him to be taken out by force; but the clergy, obstinate in defence of their immunities, so effectually resisted the efforts of his soldiers, that they were unable to effect his orders; and in the night the partisans of the young prince secretly carried him into South Wales, where he subsequently experienced a series of romantic adventures.

In 1210, the Earl of Chester made an inroad into North Wales, and rebuilt the castle of Deganwy, at the mouth of the Conway, which, a little before, had been destroyed by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, the reigning prince of North Wales, who, in return, invaded the earl's territories, and desolated a great part of them. This inroad greatly irritated the English monarch, John, who, in revenge for it, invaded North Wales with a powerful army. Llewelyn, thinking it prudent to retire before the storm, ordered the inhabitants of the most exposed districts to remove with their goods and cattle to the mountains of Snowdon. The English army advanced along the sea-coast to the castle of Deganwy, lying opposite to these mountains on the other side of the river Conway, where it remained for some time. But Llewelyn so infested the roads with light parties, as, by cutting off their supplies of provisions from England, to reduce John and his forces to the greatest distress: the soldiers, whenever they stirred from their camp, were exposed to massacre; the Welsh, from their knowledge of the country, and their being posted on the heights, having the advantage in almost every skirmish. From this situation, after considerable loss, the king thought it prudent to retreat into England; but, recruiting his forces, he repeated his invasion a few months after, and, crossing the Conway into this county, encamped on the banks of that river. From that position he sent a detachment of his army, with proper guides, to burn the town of Bangor, which they effected, and seized Rotpert, bishop of the diocese, before the high altar. After this, Llewelyn entered into negotiations for peace, through the medium of Joan, his wife, who was John's illegitimate daughter, but obtained it only on hard conditions. Davydd, son of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, taking advantage of the infirmities of his father's old age, seized on a great part of the territories belonging to his brother Gruffydd, leaving him in possession only of the cantrêv of Lleyn, forming the southernmost part of the county; and, to allay the ferment produced by the consequent division of interests, the Bishop of Bangor proposed a conference between the two princes. Gruffydd, in consequence of this mediation, began his journey from Lleyn, in company with that prelate, to meet his brother; but the latter caused him to be seized on the road, and confined in the castle of Criccieth, on the shore of Cardigan bay, in this county, a circumstance which gave rise to a long and bloody civil war. On the invasion of North Wales by Henry III., in 1245, Davydd, the reigning prince, being unable to oppose him in the open country, retired to the mountains of Snowdon, leaving the march of the English monarch unimpeded as far as the æstuary of the Conway, where Henry halted, not venturing to pass that river and enter the mountain defiles, while the native forces were hovering about him in detached parties. Here he employed himself in rebuilding the castle of Deganwy: but the Welsh did not remain inactive spectators of a work of so hostile a nature, and which, if suffered to be completed, was likely to give a deadly blow to their independence. During the ten weeks that Henry was occupied in erecting this fortress, his army, which lay encamped in the open field, endured numberless hardships, from being but thinly clad and ill-sheltered during the cold weather, which set in towards the close of the summer; from a frequent scarcity of provisions, receiving only a precarious supply from Chester and Ireland; and from being greatly harassed, and their numbers reduced, by the incessant attempts which the Welsh made to cut off their straggling parties, and, in the night, to storm their camp; but after one of these conflicts, in which the English had the advantage, the latter brought in triumph to their camp the heads of nearly one hundred Welshmen. While in this perilous condition, a vessel laden with provisions for their supply arrived from Ireland, but, owing to the mariners' want of caution, was stranded, on the ebb of the tide, on the shore westward from the mouth of the Conway, towards the mountains. The Welsh hastened to take possession of the prize, but received a check from its commander, Sir Walter Bisset, who with great spirit and ability defended the vessel until a reinforcement of Welshmen, who were the English sovereign's vassals in the Marches, had succeeded in crossing the river Conway to his assistance. Having repulsed the assailants, the English party pursued them with great slaughter up into the mountains, a distance of six miles; and, on their return, flushed with success, pillaged of its books and plate the abbey of Aberconway, and set fire to its offices. With a rage bordering on phrenzy, the native forces rushed down the mountains to preserve this venerable pile, the object of their deepest reverence, and which had lately become the mausoleum of their princes. Finding the English overloaded with plunder, they the more easily slew great numbers of them, wounded others, and made many prisoners, while the remainder, plunging into the river to escape the fury of their assailants, perished in the water: several gentlemen of rank, and about one hundred others of the English, fell by the sword. The prisoners were at first only put into confinement; but the Welsh, being informed that their enemies had lately put to death some chieftains of their nation, subsequently hanged them all, and then, with barbarous rage, cut off their heads, and, tearing their dead bodies in pieces, threw the mutilated limbs into the Conway: many of these prisoners were Welshmen, under the command of the lords of Powys, who had joined the enemies of their country. The vessel, which was still aground, was again attacked with great violence, and as bravely defended until midnight, when, on the flowing of the tide, the Welsh were obliged to retire, and, during the night, the party commanded by Sir Walter Bisset, leaving the ship, escaped to the English camp. In the morning, it being then low water, the Welsh returned to the vessel, and, finding it deserted, carried away nearly the whole of the cargo, much of which consisted of wine, and, having fired the ship, effected their retreat: the only part saved by the English was seven tuns of wine, which they obtained by drawing them out of a part of the vessel not consumed by the fire. Henry, having at length completed the important fortress of Deganwy, in spite of all the efforts of the Welsh to prevent him, placed in it a numerous garrison, well supplied with provisions and all kinds of military stores, and then withdrew into England, with the harassed remains of his army, at the end of October.

The territories of the Welsh prince were now reduced to the present counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, with the barren parts of the adjoining districts, and, sinking under the weight of his misfortunes, Davydd died at his usual residence at Aber, on the sea-coast near Bangor, and was buried in the abbey of Aberconway. During the more prosperous course which the affairs of the Welsh took, in the first years of the reign of his successor, Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the latter, in 1257, laid siege to the newly-erected castle of Deganwy, on the possession of which he well knew the fate of his country in a great measure depended. Alarmed for the safety of this important fortress, Henry hastened to its relief; and, on the advance of the English army, Llewelyn raised the siege and retired across the Conway to the Snowdonian mountains, taking care to break down the bridges, obstruct the roads, plough up the meadows, render the fords impassable, and remove the women and children, with all the cattle and provisions, out of the adjacent country. He did not venture to advance further than on the former occasion, but was enabled to maintain his position at Deganwy until Michaelmas, by the aid of a fleet belonging to the Cinque-Ports, which supplied his army with provisions. The winter, however, coming on, and having suffered severely from a furious attack made by the Welsh from the mountains, Henry was at last compelled to abandon the field to Llewelyn, and, with the remnant of his army, was obliged to make a precipitate and inglorious retreat to Chester. Some time after, Llewelyn succeeded in capturing the important fortress of Deganwy, which he immediately destroyed; but, in 1263, he was once more compelled to take refuge in the mountains of Snowdon, by the advance of an English army under Prince Edward, who, however, was called from the campaign by other important affairs. On his invasion of Wales, in 1277, after his accession to the English crown, by the title of Edward I., he advanced to Aberconway, and Llewelyn again sought refuge in the mountains of Snowdon, where the vigilance of the English monarch prevented him from receiving supplies of provisions from Anglesey and other places, whence he had formerly been accustomed to obtain them; and the Welsh prince was at length compelled by famine to implore the mercy of the English king, with whom he concluded a peace on the most humiliating conditions, one of which was, that all the barons in Wales should hold their territories immediately of the king of England, excepting only the five barons in Snowdonia, who should acknowledge Llewelyn as their lord during his life, but after his death should likewise hold their estates of the king; and another, that the cantrêv of Rhôs, in which stood the castle of Deganwy, with four others, should be given up to the English sovereign.

On the second invasion of Wales by Edward I., during the ineffectual negotiations which were carried on between the king and the prince of North Wales, the latter was remaining at his palace at Aber, between Bangor and Aberconway, while the Welsh army was most probably stationed on the heights above Penmaen-Mawr, where was the strongest fortification possessed by the Welsh in the Snowdonian mountains. Edward, about the first of November, advanced to Aberconway, near which town he stationed his army in advantageous situations, his horse being encamped on the plains at the foot of the mountains, while the infantry were posted on the sides of the hills, under cover of the woods. Being unable to bring the enemy to action, Edward despatched a fleet and a strong body of forces, which secured for him the Isle of Anglesey; and, with a view of gaining possession of the mountains in the rear of the Welsh army, or of opening a communication with the other part of the English army, he constructed a bridge of boats over the narrowest part of the Menai strait, from a point called Moel y don, between Bangor and Carnarvon: the boats were fastened to each other by a chain, and a platform of boards was formed over them, broad enough for sixty men to march abreast. To counteract this design, the Welsh threw up intrenchments at some distance on the Carnarvonshire side of the Menai, to check the advance of the enemy from this quarter, and to secure the passes into their mountains. Before the bridge was entirely finished, a party of English, attended by the Gascon lords, who, with a body of Spanish troops, were then in the service of Edward, despising the Welsh for the easy conquest which they had allowed them to make of Anglesey, imprudently passed over the Menai at low water in considerable force, to reconnoitre the enemy's works, or to display their own valour. Richard ab Walwyn, who commanded the Welsh forces on this side, knowing that the tide would soon flow, and cut off the retreat of the English to their unfinished bridge, remained quiet within his intrenchments, and offered no hindrance to their passage over, or to their advance into the country: but as soon as the water had risen so high as to prevent any communication with the island of Anglesey, the Welsh rushed down from the mountains in great multitudes, attacked their enemies with loud cries, and pursued them with great slaughter into the waves, in which many were drowned, encumbered with the weight of their armour. In this action fifteen knights, thirty-two esquires, and one thousand common soldiers, were either slain or perished in the waters of the Menai: Lord Latimer, who commanded the English, had the good fortune to recover the bridge by the swiftness of his horse. The situation of Edward became daily more critical: besides the loss he had sustained, the winter was approaching, his two armies were unable to communicate with each other by land, and the design of a diversion was become impracticable; while the Welsh were strongly intrenched on the mountains, and possessed abundance of provisions: so that the English monarch at length deemed it prudent to retreat to Rhuddlan, in the county of Flint. But the unfortunate and premature death of Llewelyn, immediately after, in South Wales, completely obscured the brightening prospects of the Welsh, whose forces in the mountains of Snowdon the English monarch proceeded to press more closely, himself on the side of Aberconway, while his troops in Anglesey made good their passage across the Menai, and penetrated into the country on the side of Carnarvon. Davydd, Llewelyn's brother, who now regarded himself as the rightful prince of North Wales, not choosing to risk a general engagement, at first contented himself with maintaining possession of all the strong holds of the mountains, but soon afterwards renewed active hostilities, though unsuccessfully. A fortress near the village of Llanberis, in this county, the ruins of which now bear the name of Castell Dôlbadarn, strong both by nature and art, standing near a morass, the only approach through which was by a single causeway, and to attain the vicinity of which it was necessary to pass through narrow and rugged defiles, had been provided by Davydd with a strong garrison; but so sunk in spirit were the Welsh, that this castle was surrendered to the English king, after being closely invested for some time, and every other fortress in the district was immediately given up. The Welsh fled in dismay on every side; and the passes of the mountains being left wholly unguarded, Edward, stationing his mounted forces at the foot of the hills, and leaving in each defile a body of troops to intercept all who should attempt to escape, penetrated in person, with the remainder of his army, into the inmost recesses of the Snowdonian mountains, setting fire to the houses and slaying great numbers of the Welsh, who were discovered in the most retired solitudes, or intercepted in fleeing thither. Having subdued the whole of the mountainous districts, Edward collected his scattered forces, and proceeded to the easy subjugation of the more level tracts, slaughtering more than three thousand of their inhabitants.

The country being thus finally subdued, as a check to any future risings among the natives, Edward erected the two vast and magnificent castles of Aberconway and Carnarvon, supplying each with suitable garrisons; and in the latter was soon after born the first prince of Wales of English blood, afterwards Edward II. Edward I. also erected Carnarvon into a town corporate, with great privileges; and, having settled the affairs of his newly acquired territories, he gave orders that a tournament should be held at Nevin, on the western coast of the promontory of Llyn, which was attended by a great number of English and foreign knights. On the 2nd of January, 1285, Edward issued a writ from Bristol, where he was then staying, by which the inhabitants of Carnarvon and Aberconway, in common with those of some other towns, were declared to be forever free from the payment of the tax called talliage. But having engaged in a war against the French monarch, he, in 1294, made an experiment of taxation on his new subjects, the Welsh, which proved the immediate cause of three insurrections in different parts of the principality, nearly at the same time, which were not apparently directed by any principle of co-operation. Carnarvonshire was the principal scene of one of these revolts, which was headed by Madoc, an illegitimate son of the late gallant Llewelyn, and who himself assumed the title of Prince. The insurgents, seizing on Sir Roger de Pulesdon (a man of great power in this quarter, who stood high in Edward's favour, had been commissioned by him to exact a fourteenth of the people's moveables, and then resided at a mansion in the town of Carnarvon, called after his name Plâs Pulesdon), caused him to be hanged, and afterwards cut off his head, which fate was shared by all his associates in the collection of this odious tax. About the middle of July, Madoc proceeded against Carnarvon, at that time crowded with English, assembled there at a great fair, and, taking possession of that place, slaughtered them all in cold blood, plundered and fired the town, and took the castle: the strongest fortress in Snowdon also fell into the hands of Madoc, who soon after gained full possession of Anglesey. A revolt so daring and so widely spread determined Edward to suspend his intended expedition to the Continent, and to recall the forces that were ready to embark. Advancing to the Conway, he crossed that river with a part of his troops, to Aberconway, and, retiring into the castle, waited for the remainder of his army to follow; having lost, in the passage, many waggons and other carriages laden with provisions, which were intercepted by the Welsh, who descended in great multitudes from the mountains, and invested the castle on the land side. A sudden rise of the waters of the Conway likewise prevented Edward's troops from passing the river, or affording him any assistance, thus rendering his situation very perilous. The Conway, however, as suddenly subsiding as it had risen, his forces were enabled to cross to his assistance, and the Welsh, abandoning the siege, retired to the mountains of Snowdon, leaving the English king to spend his Christmas at Aberconway without molestation. While the English forces were lying here, the Earl of Warwick, receiving intelligence that a large body of the enemy was encamped in a valley enclosed on each side by a wood, at no very great distance, determined to attack them unawares. For this service he selected a squadron of horse, with a detachment of cross-bowmen and archers, and with this force, marching silently in the night, he suddenly surrounded the Welsh, who, although little expecting such an assault, fixed their spears in the ground, and, presenting a formidable front, maintained for some time their position, and kept off the English horse. Unable to make any impression, Warwick placed a cross-bowman, or archer, alternately with the horsemen, in the ranks of the latter; and these, fighting at a distance, slew great numbers with their arrows: then charging the remaining body with his horse, the Welsh phalanx was broken, and soon routed with great slaughter. After this action, Edward, finding no enemy to resist him, advanced to the shore of the Menai, which he crossed into Anglesey. Then, after laying the Carnarvonshire territory more open, by cutting roads through the woods, and severely punishing some of the persons concerned in the murder of Roger de Pulesdon, he returned with his army into England, without having reduced to obedience the insurgent Madoc, who, however, was soon after taken prisoner, while engaged in a predatory incursion on the English border.

In 1402, Carnarvon was besieged by an army of insurgents, under the celebrated Welsh leader, Owain Glyndwr, but was bravely defended for the English king, Henry IV., by Ievan ab Meredydd, to whom, with Meredydd ab Hulkyn Llwyd of Glynllivon, under the command of an English captain, the custody of the castle had been entrusted: and in the same year the cathedral of Bangor was pillaged and laid in ruins by these revolvers. Dôlbadarn castle, near Llanberis, was occasionally in the power of each party during this protracted warfare, and the possession of it was often warmly contested as the master key to the mountains of Snowdon. On the breaking out of the civil war of the seventeenth century, Aberconway castle was garrisoned for the king by Dr. John Williams, Archbishop of York; while on the other hand Carnarvon was seized on behalf of the parliament, in 1644, by Captain Swanley, who took in it four hundred prisoners and a considerable store of arms and ammunition. In May 1645, Prince Rupert superseded the Archbishop of York in the command of North Wales, under circumstances injurious and offensive to that prelate, who, thereupon, having received an offer of protection from General Mytton, joined the party to which he had before been opposed, and assisted Mytton in the reduction of Aberconway, which town was taken by storm on the 15th of August, 1646; and the castle surrendered on the 10th of November following. In this year also the town of Carnarvon was besieged by the parliament's troops under Generals Mytton and Laugharne, to whom it was surrendered on honourable conditions by the governor, Lord Byron. In 1648, General Mytton was in turn besieged here by a small force under that zealous royalist, Sir John Owen, who, however, receiving intelligence that Colonels Carter and Twisselton, with a superior force, were marching to its relief, raised the siege and advanced to meet them. The encounter took place on a piece of ground called Talar hîr, in the vicinity of Aber-Gwynnregyn, near the foot of the mountain of Penmaen-Mawr; and, in the furious battle which ensued, Sir John was defeated and made prisoner, after which the whole of North Wales submitted to the authority of the parliament.

This county is in the diocese of Bangor (excepting only the parishes of Eglwys Rhôs, Llangwstenyn, and Llŷsuaen, which are in that of St. Asaph), and in the province of Canterbury: it is partly included in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, but chiefly in that of Bangor, which contains the deaneries of Arlêchwedd, Arvon, and Lleyn, and is wholly comprised within its limits; while the parishes in the former constitute the deanery of Evionydd: the parishes included in the diocese of St. Asaph are in the archdeaconry of St. Asaph, and deanery of Rhôs: the total number of parishes is sixty-six, of which twenty-four are rectories, twelve vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the ten hundreds of Commitmaen, Creuddyn, Dinllaen, Evionydd, Gaflogion, Isgorvai, Llêchwedd Isâv, Llêchwedd Uchâv, Nantconway, and Uchgorvai. It contains the city and newly created borough of Bangor; the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Carnarvon, Aberconway, or Conway, and Pwllheli; the borough and market towns of Crûgcaeth, commonly called Criccieth, and Nevin; and the market town of Trêmadoc. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for Carnarvon and the rest of the boroughs collectively: both the county member and the member for the boroughs are elected at Carnarvon: the polling-places for county elections are Carnarvon, Aberconway, Capel-Curig, and Pwllheli. This county is in the North Wales circuit: the assizes and quarter sessions are held at Carnarvon, where stands the county gaol and house of correction: there are thirty-one acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £23,440, and the expenditure to £23,005, of which £19,608 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The aspect of the county is for the most part wild and mountainous, and its scenery throughout remarkably various and striking. The principal of the mountains constitute the Snowdonian range (so called from its central and loftiest summit, Snowdon), whose elevated peaks, from their height and shape, form characteristic features in the scenery of the surrounding districts to a great distance. This range, the loftiest and most remarkable in the principality, commences in a tremendous precipice overhanging the sea, a few miles to the west of Aberconway, called Penmaen-Mawr, and thence extends south-westward in the same direction as the other great mountain ridges of Wales; includes the mountain called Carnedd Llewelyn, the Peak of Snowdon, and a long tract of mountains to the south of Llanllyvni; and terminates in the lofty and triple-peaked Reivel (in Welsh called Yr Eivl, in allusion to its furcated outline), whose base is washed by the waves of Carnarvon bay, to the south-west of Clynog. The length of this mountainous range, following the zigzag direction of its summits, is forty-six miles; but the distance between its extreme points, in a straight line, is only twenty-five miles. Upon this chain, Yr Wyddva, commonly called the Peak of Snowdon, is the highest summit, and the most elevated point in South Britain, rising to the height of three thousand five hundred and seventy-one feet above the level of the sea. The second in height is Carnedd Llewelyn, which attains an elevation of three thousand four hundred and sixty-nine feet above the same level. Carnedd Daydd rises to the height of three thousand four hundred and twenty-seven feet; while the two extremities of the range are of far less elevation, Penmaen-Mawr being only one thousand five hundred and forty feet high, but remarkable as forming its abrupt termination; and the Yr Eivl mountain, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six feet high. Other more remarkable mountains, connected with this chain, are Trevaen, Moel Ogwen, Moel Siabod, the two Glyders, the two Llyders, Moel Llyvni, Moel Mynydd y Nant; Gerwyn Gôch, one thousand seven hundred and twenty-three feet high; Bwlch-Mawr, one thousand six hundred and seventy-three feet high; and Rhiw, one thousand and thirteen feet high; over all of which tower the three pre-eminent summits of Snowdon, called Yr Wyddva, or "the conspicuous summit," Crib y distyll, or "the dripping peak," and Crib Gôch, or "the red summit." This mountain, called by the English in modern times Snowdon, on account of its summit being frequently covered with snow for a long period, when the plains beneath were entirely free from it, was anciently called by the Welsh Craigiau'r Eryri, by some translated to signify "the snow-clad rocks," while others consider the latter part of the name to be derived from eryr, an eagle, and the whole to signify "the eagle rocks," from the number of those birds that here fixed their alpine abode. To a spectator looking from the summit of Yr Wyddva it has the appearance of being propped by five immense rocks, as buttresses: these are Crib y distyll and Crib Gôch, between Llanberis and Capel-Curig; Lliwedd, towards Nan Gwynan; Clawdd Côch, towards Bethgelart; and Llêchog, the mountain that forms the southern side of the vale of Llanberis, towards Dôlbadarn. These nearly impassable heights for centuries formed an almost unassailable refuge for the overpowered but unsubdued Britons, when obliged to retreat before the Roman, Saxon, or English forces. Many of the mountains extend in length from north to south, while others take a line from east to west, and nearly all range in one of these directions. The precipitous declivities of the summits of the Snowdonian chain for the most part face towards the Menai strait; but the declivities in every other direction vary with the inclinations of the strata. The vegetation of these elevated regions, in the multifarious variety of plants of which it is composed, presents a rich field for the botanist: it peculiarly abounds with that species of herbaceous plants called by Linnæus etherea, as being found only towards the summits of mountains; and numerous other genera display their beauties in these elevated wilds, of which many are rarely found in any other situation. Amidst these mountains are very deep hollows, and narrow dells and valleys called cwms, through which the numerous streams that issue from the various lakes above rush with impetuous violence to a lower level, forming the most romantic cataracts, and then pursue a calmer and more meandering course to the ocean.

The lakes, though generally small, are upwards of fifty in number, and many of them abound with fish of different species, of which some are peculiar to alpine waters, and others are of extraordinary conformation. Those most distinguished for their extent, or the beauty of their surrounding scenery, are the following: viz., the two that nearly fill the narrow valley of Llanberis, called Llŷnau Llanberis, the upper of which (about a mile long, and half a mile broad), though the smaller in extent, is the finer piece of water, and its depth is in some places no less than one hundred and forty yards; the other is about a mile and a half long, but so narrow as to have the appearance of a river rather than a lake: Llŷn Cawellyn, forming a fine expanse of water at the foot of Mynydd-Mawr, a vast precipice which recedes in a semilunar form from the shores of the lake, which is more than a mile and a half long, and nearly three-quarters of a mile broad; Llŷnau Nanlle, two fine sheets of water adjacent to each other, and situated in the same part of the county as the last-mentioned; and Llŷn Ogwen, Llŷn Idwal, &c. &c. Westward from the mountains, and between them and the Menai, lies an extensive plain, almost a perfect level, but not low: it is thickly strewn with large rounded fragments of rock, of the same kind as the rocks of the mountains. Indeed, over nearly all the lands adjacent to the mountains are scattered immense masses of stone, the removal of which, a process that can only be effected with the aid of gunpowder, is an essential step towards the improvement of the estates which they encumber. The scenery on the rocky shores of the Menai is particularly bold and pleasing. The Vale of the Conway, on the eastern border of the county, and to the east of the Snowdonian chain, abounds with interesting prospects: it is watered by a river whose natural beauties and historic interest have often made it a theme for poetry, and presents all the diversity of prospect afforded by a well-wooded and highly cultivated country, strikingly contrasting with the bare and rugged aspect of the cloud-capped mountains which rise in frowning grandeur to the west of it, down the declivities of which, through innumerable chasms, fissures, and gullies, rush the superfluous waters of the elevated mountain lakes, to swell the more pacific stream of the Conway. The scenery in this part of the county is most varied in the vicinity of Pont Dôlgarrog and Pont Porth Llwyd, which are simply alpine bridges thrown across the streams which respectively issue out of Llŷn Cowlyd and Llŷn Geirionydd. This vale, though stretching parallel with the Vale of Clwyd, from south-east to north-west, is inferior to it in extent and fertility, having the sloping argillaceous hills of Denbighshire only on the east, while on the west it receives deposits of soil only from the hard, steep, primitive rocks of Carnarvonshire. The peninsula on the eastern side of the mouth of the Conway forms the hundred of Creuddyn, and terminates in the promontory of Great Orme's Head, or Llandudno Rocks. The cliffs forming this extremity are of limestone, very lofty, and almost perpendicular: during the summer months they are frequented by countless flocks of various sea-birds of passage, such as peregrine falcons, cormorants, razor-bills, guillemots, oyster-catchers, stormy petrels, divers, terns, curlews, gulls, and puffin-auks, or coultarnebs.

The promontory of Llleyn (so called from the ancient cantrêv which formerly comprised the greater part of it, while that of Evionydd contained the rest), forming the southernmost part of Carnarvonshire, and beyond the south-western extremity of which is situated Bardsey Island, is almost the only continental part of North Wales which bears any remarkable similarity to the Isle of Anglesey, which similarity, in this instance, extends to the various particulars of surface, soil, climate, course of tillage, agricultural implements, live stock, &c. Its surface, though varied, is no where mountainous; nor does it contain any of those deep glens which form so striking a feature in the scenery of most other parts of the county. It consists chiefly of what in England would be denominated upland pasture, here and there intersected by narrow marshy valleys, and interspersed with conical hills, isolated or in small groups. The fences, as in most other enclosed districts of Carnarvonshire, are formed of stone walls or earthen mounds: the small valleys are watered, as Mr. Penant observes, "by a thousand little rills;" and the coast consists of a rocky boundary, the regularity of which is broken by several small creeks, affording safe shelter during storms to boats and inferior vessels employed in fishing. The small and once distinguished island of Bardsey is separated from the termination of this promontory, which is composed of the vast piles of rock forming the bold headland called Braich y Pwll, the Canganorum Promontorium of the Roman geographer, by the "Race of Bardsey," a strait about a mile broad, through which is a rapid current. From this natural circumstance it originally received the British name of Ynys Enlli; but the Saxons afterwards called it Bardsey, probably from its having formed a place of refuge for the British bards. It is about two miles long and one broad, and comprises about three hundred and seventy acres of land, of which nearly one-third is a mountainous ridge, affording food only for a few sheep and rabbits. On the south-east and south-west it is much exposed to violent blasts from the ocean, but on the north and north-east it is sheltered by the above-mentioned elevation, which on its sea front presents high, perpendicular, and rocky cliffs, resorted to by numerous flocks of the various kinds of sea-fowl above mentioned, the eggs of which are taken from their nests on the face of the cliff by some of the adventurous islanders, who descend from the summit by means of ropes carefully secured at the top. The innermost creek of the northern part of Cardigan bay forms extensive sands, called the Traeth-Mawr, which formerly were overflowed by the tides, and through which the small river Glâslyn pours its waters into the ocean. The late W. A. Madocks, Esq., of Tan yr Allt, in the immediate vicinity, having, about the commencement of the present century, succeeded in securing an extent of nearly two thousand acres of rich land, called Penmorva Marsh, on the western side of the Traeth Mawr, was induced to attempt the more arduous task of reclaiming the whole, by extending an embankment from side to side across its mouth. This gentleman, in the year 1808, obtained an act of parliament vesting in him and his heirs, or assigns, the whole of these sands, from Pont Aber Glâslyn, at their head, to the point at Gêst, at their lower extremity; and he shortly afterwards proceeded to execute the bold design which he had formed, in spite of great and unforeseen difficulties. He thus secured from the flow of the tides a tract of about two thousand seven hundred acres, which was before subject to periodical overflow, besides the great extent of land adjoining, which will in consequence be drained or secured from the injuries of floods, to which they were before liable; and of this land, so drained and secured, Mr. Madocks was to have two thousand acres in fee, and one-fifth of the rent of fifteen hundred more, or one-fifth of the land, the remainder to go to the freeholders who claim right of common upon the adjoining marshes. On a part of the tract first secured stands the little modern town of Trêmadoc. The northern shore of the county, from the mouth of the Conway westward, borders on Beaumaris bay, a fine expanse of sea, which is so completely sheltered on one side by the promontory of Creuddyn, terminated by Great Orme's Head, as above described, and on the other by the easternmost extremity of Anglesey and the little island of Priestholme, that it forms a fine roadstead for ships navigating the Irish sea, and one in which they may ride in safety during the most violent tempests. The greater part of the bay is left dry on the reflux of the tide, for several miles adjoining the shore, forming a tract called the Lavan Sands, which are supposed to have once constituted a habitable hundred belonging to the territory of Arvon, and are said to have received their ancient name of Wylovain, or "the place of weeping," from the shrieks and lamentations of the inhabitants on its being suddenly overwhelmed by the sea in the sixth century. Lavan is supposed to be an abbreviation of Traeth Trelaven, or "the fermenting sand," from the advancing tide boiling up through the quicksands; nor is the tradition of the inundation of this tract unsupported by natural circumstances, one of the most remarkable of which is, that trunks of oak trees, nearly entire, have been discovered in it at low water, lying in an extensive tract of hard loam, far within the present high water mark.

The climate, owing to the maritime situation of the county, and the great variety of elevation in its surface, has many peculiarities. In some years the winter's snow remains on the higher summits of the Snowdonian chain until the month of June, though in the more immediate vicinity of the sea, and more especially in the great promontory of Lley, it seldom continues long upon the ground, even in the depth of winter. The rains among the mountains are frequent, generally sudden, and often very heavy, swelling the otherwise insignificant streams which descend from them into powerful torrents. Grain, on the lighter soils and in the lower vales, ripens early in August; and it is remarkable that this county, so great a portion of which is occupied by the loftiest and most rugged mountains of South Britain, should also contain the ground which of all others in North Wales is the earliest in its seasons, viz., Talar hŷr, a piece of sandy soil with some gravel, on a substratum of sea-beach pebbles, at the foot of the mountain of Penmaen-Mawr. But corn sown in elevated situations approaching the mountains, although it may for some time give promise of a good crop, frequently never ripens, or, if at all, only very late in the season; in which latter case the sudden gusts of wind and tornadoes, so frequently bursting from the dells and hollows of the mountains at this season, sometimes beat off the ears, and leave little but the bare straw. The climate of the promontory of Lley is the driest and warmest of any district in the county, and consequently the most favourable to the success of agriculture. All attempts to introduce the profitable culture of fruit trees have hitherto proved unsuccessful; the spring, even in the vales, owing to the contiguity of the mountains, being seldom mild enough to preserve the blossoms from the destructive effects of frost, while the wetness and coldness of the summer, from the same causes, should the trees escape the first danger, vitiate the flavour of the most delicious fruits. The westerly winds prevail three-fourths of the year, and are experienced in their utmost fury about the equinoxes. The inhabitants are remarkable for their longevity, numerous gravestones in the different churchyards being inscribed with ages far exceeding eighty years: this circumstance is ascribed to the frugality of their fare, and the bracing effects of a cold, sharp, oxygenated atmosphere.

The soils are extremely various. The best are the strong loams, excellently adapted for the culture of wheat and for permanent pasture, which are found on the banks of the Conway near Marl, and thence upwards towards Maenan and Trêvriw, as also on the shores of the Menai near Llanvair is Gaer, &c. The soil of Bardsey Island is also chiefly argillaceous, and of considerable fertility, producing excellent wheat and barley, and having a small quantity of good grass land; and the whole of the hundred of Creuddyn, lying on the eastern side of the mouth of the Conway, is occupied by strong cohesive loams, which are among the best wheat soils in North Wales, and perhaps not inferior to any in Britain. Next to these rank the dry, free, and rather stony soils, adapted for the general purposes of tillage, which occupy the middle parts of the larger vales, the lower parts of the smaller valleys, and the interior of the promontory of Lleyn. The greater part of the promontory of Lleyn has also a still lighter soil, consisting of various admixtures of sandy loam, rounded pebbles, shivery gravel, peat, &c., peculiarly adapted for the culture of barley, peas, turnips, &c.; as have also the valleys of the other parts of the county in their upper levels, and the slopes of vales having a southerly aspect. The substratum of the soils in the vicinity of the Menai consists of limestone, and hence the soil towards and amidst the mountains is of two kinds; first, where the ground is dry, it consists of a reddish loam, much intermixed with pebbles and stony fragments, which, when well manured, is very productive in corn, or almost any other agricultural crop; but, ascending higher, this surface soil becomes gradually shallower, and less promising for culture: the soil of the great levels lying between the Snowdonian chain and the Menai is alluvial, consisting of gravel and sand, or shingle. The other soils are peaty, and are widely spread over many of the meadows and heathy wastes and commons, which, being generally wet and boggy, produce in wet summers nothing of value either as pasturage or for hay: this peat is found even on the summit of Carnedd Llewelyn, but is of the greatest depth in the flats and hollows favourable to its production, and of less depth upon moderate slopes, where the substrata will not readily admit the filtration of water. In this latter situation it is generally covered with a coarse matted herbage, characterizing what is provincially called Rhōsydd, the surface of which, when the elevation is not too great, is sometimes pared and burned for a crop of rye, and then laid down again with grass seeds. Most of the *cwm*s, or narrow valleys among the hills and mountains, have also a peaty soil, producing an abundance of the kind of hay here called gwair y rhōsydd, which is composed of a few kinds of alpine grasses, thickly intermingled with various species of rushes, and frequently besprinkled with a few varieties of sedges: the hay produced in the bottoms and lower meadows is particularly fine and soft, consisting chiefly of bent and fescue grasses. Till, a hungry light mould tinged by the orange oxyde of iron, is occasionally found on the uplands having a slaty substratum; and a ferny soil, or hazel loam, occurs in various upland situations among the soils above described. The most extensive tract of entirely sandy soils is that of the Traeth Mawr, already mentioned, on the south-eastern confines of the county.

Of the whole extent of Carnarvonshire, little more than seven thousand acres are actually under tillage, and these are almost wholly in the hundred of Creuddyn, the Vale of the Conway, the promontory of Lleyn, and the vicinity of the Menai. Wheat is grown on the stronger soils above described, upon which oats are seldom sown, and a dry spring makes them quite unfit for barley. On the lighter soils oats and barley are chiefly cultivated, frequently in very impoverishing rotations, in which the same grain is sometimes sown for two or three years successively, and with the last crop are always sown grass seeds: oats are the principal crop on the poorer lands. The average return of wheat in the hundred of Creuddyn, near Aberconway, is nine or ten times the quantity of the seed sown; that of barley, on warm soils, somewhat more; but of oats in the uplands, not more than from three to five times the quantity. In Lleyn the naked scythe is the only instrument used to cut all kinds of corn; in other parts of the county the reaping-hook is most commonly used to cut wheat, though the scythe is used to cut the barley and oats. Rye is sometimes grown by some of the small farmers on patches of the wastes, which they pare and burn for the purpose, and afterwards throw open again. Peas and beans are seldom cultivated as agricultural crops; but potatoes are grown to a considerable extent in different parts of the county, and Carnarvonshire ranks next to Anglesey in the neatness of its potatoe culture: the inhabitants of the Vale of the Conway and the vicinity of Carnarvon formerly imported this useful root from Lancashire, but at present they grow more than is required for their own consumption, and the surplus is exported for the partial supply of Liverpool, where the Welsh potatoes obtain a preference in the market, on account of their superior flavour. Turnips are frequently cultivated on the soils best adapted for the purpose: a few small patches of hemp are seen scattered in different places. Artificial grasses are a common agricultural crop: the most ordinary kind is the common red clover, with which other grasses are frequently intermingled, such as white clover, trefoil, and rye-grass. Rather more than one-half of the surface of the whole county, besides the amount of land under tillage, is enclosed, and constitutes meadows and pastures of very various quality: the rest, forming its waste lands, is also for the most part depastured during the summer. Indeed the farmers are chiefly herdsmen, who pay their rents out of the profits of their butter, wool, and lambs, their stock consisting of small cows and numerous herds of diminutive sheep. During the summer months these are taken to pasture on the hills and mountains; and such has been the opinion entertained of the extent of pasturage on the mountains of this county, that, according to an old proverb, "As Mona could supply corn for all the inhabitants of Wales, so could the Eryri mountains afford sufficient pasture for all its herds, if gathered together." The purpose to which the grass lands are more peculiarly applied is the rearing of great numbers of cattle and sheep, which are sold lean to the graziers of districts having richer meadows, to be fattened for places where there is a greater consumption of animal food. The land-owners of this county introduced into it, about the commencement of the present century, professed improvers of land, who advertised an offer of their services in draining, irrigating, &c.; and much land has since been brought under irrigation in some of the valleys. As fattening cattle forms no part of the rural economy of Carnarvonshire, and as the whole stock of the farm, both cattle and sheep, during the spring and summer, feed on the open commons and the cow-lights on the sides of the mountains, the enclosed meadows are regularly hained up and reserved for crops of hay. These, where the land is occasionally manured, are tolerably good; but in numerous instances the crops are scanty, and the hay of a mean quality. Owing to the general coldness of the atmosphere among the mountains and in their vicinity, the hay harvest is usually late, and the frequency of the rains, that fall from the clouds attracted by their elevated summits, renders it highly precarious, the hay being often spoiled before it can be got in. Even should the weather continue dry, liability to damage arises from another quarter: whirlwinds or tornadoes are not unusual, the approach of which is first indicated by a distant rumbling noise, which becoming louder and louder, they are perceived advancing up the narrow valleys and hollow ravines, whirling in a circular direction, and carrying in their vortices the light and loose objects which lie within their influence. It is also necessary to secure the hay with great care in the stacks, which are thatched, first, by spreading thinly over them straw, coarse hay, or rushes, which covering is fastened down, not, as in most parts of England, with hazel rods pegged down by spars or double splinters, but with hay-ropes stretched horizontally at small distances from each other, and the intervals crossed by similar bands, the whole having the appearance of net-work, and exhibiting a peculiar degree of neatness. The extraordinary manures employed in this county are various: the following are the principal, viz., shell-sand, which is found on different parts of the coast, and is carried many miles inland in carts and waggons, and coastwise in sloops; sea-weed, which is collected on the coast in large quantities after storms, more particularly on the shores of Bardsey Island, and is most commonly spread on the fields to be immediately ploughed in, though sometimes made into various composts; and lime, in the vicinity of the limestone rocks, hereafter described: Carnarvonshire has also some marl on the coast of the Menai. The old Welsh plough is still the most common implement of the kind used in the county; but the Lummas and Scotch ploughs, of a lighter construction, have been introduced in a few instances.

Most of the farmers, by the aid of the mountain and other commonable pastures, are enabled to keep a greater quantity of cattle and sheep, during the summer half of the year, than the produce of the farm will maintain through the winter; consequently, on the approach of the latter season, they sell off a considerable portion of stock, in order that they may have sufficient winter food for the remainder. The promontory of Llyn and Evionydd, having the same kind of undulating surface, though not altogether so good a soil, as Anglesey, has likewise a breed of cattle similar in most respects to those of that island, and annually supplies, for the consumption of England, about one thousand five hundred yearlings, and four thousand five hundred cattle of two years old and upwards. The cattle of the rest of Carnarvonshire, with the exception of a few select stocks, seem to be diminutives of the above breeds of Anglesey, Llyn, and Evionydd, and have little to recommend them except that they are extremely hardy and may be reared with little expense. These, though not in high esteem with the graziers or carcass butchers, exhibit a pleasing symmetry of form, being compact, short-legged, and deep-bodied: their colour is chiefly black, and the cows are in considerable esteem for the dairy. For the improvement of this breed, various importations of the best kinds of cattle from England have been made at different times. The sheep are of the ancient diminutive alpine breed, which also occupies the mountainous tracts of the other counties of North Wales, but is here found in its purest state, unchanged by any foreign mixture. In proportion to their size, they have long legs and slender bodies, with handsome necks and faces, some of them in symmetry resembling the Spanish Merino breed. Like these also they are migratory, though not to so boundless a degree; ranging the mountains during the summer months, and at the approach of winter descending to the lowland pastures. Their faces and legs are generally white, and some of them are horned: the smaller sort weigh from seven to nine lb. per quarter, and bear a fleece weighing from three-quarters of a pound to a pound and a half; the larger weigh from nine to twelve lb. per quarter, and yield from a pound and a half to two pounds and a half of wool. This wool is generally coarse and of a short staple, though in many instances that of the neck and shoulders possesses a considerable degree of fineness, and is chiefly used in the flannel manufacture of North Wales, for which it is peculiarly adapted. From their mode of existence, these sheep are of a very different character from those of an enclosed country. Roaming wherever inclination leads them, confined by no fences, and frequently unattended by a shepherd, they are in the first instance obliged to use their own exertions against the attacks of their formidable enemies, the foxes, so numerous among the mountains of this county, as also for their defence from the ravens and large birds of prey. Instead of assembling in large flocks, they form parties, generally consisting of ten or twelve, of which number, if one perceives any thing advancing towards the little flock, he turns and faces the object, which he permits to approach within about a hundred yards, when, if its appearance be hostile and it continues to advance, he warns the party by a shrill whistling noise, which he continues until they have all taken the alarm, when the whole scamper off to the more inaccessible parts of the mountains: the instinctive powers of the shepherds' dogs employed in collecting these flocks are no less remarkable. Some few minor crosses have been introduced among the sheep in the more enclosed districts. Formerly numerous goats were bred amongst the mountains of this county, many of which were so far domesticated as to be regularly milked; but their numbers have long been rapidly diminishing, and they are now no longer considered as forming part of the farmers' stock, their value having been greatly lessened, on account of their destructiveness to young plantations, and on the general disuse of the bushy wigs which were usually made from the hair of these shaggy animals, which was distinguished for its length and fineness: the few now remaining in Carnarvonshire are principally confined to the mountain of Moel Siabod, where they run entirely wild. The native breed of hogs much resembles that of several districts in Ireland: they are thin-bodied, tall, and ill-shaped, with long heads and large ears: but more valuable kinds have been introduced from England, chiefly the Berkshire breed, which is now become very common. Three thousand hogs are annually sent to the English markets from the promontory of Llein and Evionydd; and great numbers are sold in the autumn from other parts of the county. The horses are of mixed breeds: the best bred in the county are those of the promontory of Llein. Tender furze, bruised with mallets armed with iron, or ground in mills erected for the purpose, was formerly a common article of fodder for the horses, but is now seldom given. Little corn being raised, few domestic fowls are kept, the county being supplied with poultry from Anglesey, as it is also for the most part with rabbits from the extensive warrens between Llanveirian and Llanvaelog, in that island, although there are considerable numbers in some places near the sea-coast, where the sandiness of the soil favours their burrowing, more especially on Morva Dinlle, near Carnarvon. Of such animals, being fera naturæ, as formerly inhabited the grand Snowdonian chain of mountains, the principal were the wolves, deer, goats, and foxes: the wolves were exterminated several ages ago, and the deer, which, in Leland's time, appear to have prevented the growth of corn, were extirpated about the year 1626. Numerous foxes still find shelter in the holes and clefts of the rocks and crags so abundant in this district, and, by their nocturnal depredations on the poultry, lambs, and sheep, are a great annoyance to the farmers. Among the rare and curious birds, the golden eagle is known to have bred, though seldom, among the Snowdonian mountains, those which are seen there being generally occasional visitors in quest of prey. The ring, or rock, ouzel, though in most places a migratory bird, here takes up its constant abode. Seals are native on the coast of Carnarvonshire, and are seen most frequently between Llein and the shores of Anglesey: many are found about Carreg y Moelrhon, to the west of Bardsey Island, moelrhon being the Welsh name for a seal.

This county, owing to the general unfavourableness of its climate and aspect, is not distinguished for its horticultural productions, and great numbers of the cottages are entirely without gardens. One circumstance, however, is worthy of notice, viz., that sea-kale grows wild on its coasts, being found in the greatest abundance from the mountain of Penmaen-Mawr westward to Bangor, and thence along the whole western coast to Nevyn and Aberdaron: it has, in various instances, been transplanted into gardens, where it is found to be an excellent substitute for asparagus, which it also precedes in the spring. In Leland's time the sides of the Snowdonian mountains were covered with timber, but at present they are almost entirely bare, excepting the woods above Gwydir, on the eastern side of them, which add greatly to the picturesque beauty of the Vale of Llanrwst; and those of Mr. Thomas Assheton Smith, in a very high situation at Talmignedd, near Bethgelart; to which may be added those belonging to the latter gentleman at Vaenol, near Bangor, occupying about two hundred acres, and the plantations on the Pant Glâs estate, on the south-eastern side of the county. Very extensive plantations were also made in this county, towards the close of the last century, by the late Lord Penrhyn; but, with the exception of a few comparatively recent plantations, near gentlemen's seats, the whole promontory of Llein and Evionydd is destitute of wood: the principal of these plantations are in the vicinities of Llanystyndwy, Gwynvryn, and Plâs Hên. The hundred of Creuddyn, forming the north-easternmost division of the county, from the rest of which it is separated by the river Conway, is well wooded in the vicinities of Marl, Bôdyscallen, and Gloddæth. The trees are of various kinds, consisting of oak, ash, beech, &c., with several species of fir. The whole of the extensive region formed by the Snowdonian mountains was, on the conquest of Wales by Edward I., studiously depopulated by the policy of that monarch, who well knew the asylum it might afford to any of the native malcontents, and who, therefore, converted the chief part of it into a royal forest. In consequence of this, much of the mountainous part of the county still belongs to the crown; and numerous warrants, issued at different periods, for killing and appropriating the deer are yet extant. One of these, signed by Henry Sidney, in 1561, arbitrarily extended the boundaries of the forest of Snowdon into Anglesey and Merionethshire, with the view of gratifying Queen Elizabeth's favourite, the Earl of Leicester, who had been appointed chief ranger; although, in the reign of Henry VIII., it had been ascertained to be wholly included within the county of Carnarvon. Presuming on this authority, the Earl of Leicester, as ranger, proceeded to tyrannise over the three counties, which he pretended were included in his commission, with the most rapacious injustice and insufferable insolence. It having been suggested to him that by constructive evidence nearly the whole of the surrounding freehold property might be brought within the boundaries of the forest, commissioners were appointed, and juries impanelled, to enquire into the numerous encroachments made on the royal property, but the integrity of both caused them to come to a decision contrary to the ranger's wishes. After this disappointment, a special commission was appointed, in 1578, composed of persons immediately dependent on the earl; and a jury, equally subservient to his views, was subpoenaed to attend at Beaumaris, and directed to survey the Malltraeth marsh, in Anglesey, after which they delivered their verdict, declaring that they found that tract to lie within the verge of Snowdon forest, notwithstanding its being in the county of Anglesey, and separated from the county in which that forest was situated by an arm of the sea. This decision was chiefly obtained from the jury by the instruction of the commissioners, who told them that in the Exchequer of Carnarvon they had found a document, stating that a stag had been roused in the forest of Snowdon, in Carnarvonshire, which, being pursued to the banks of the Menai, swam over that strait, and was killed at Malltraeth, "infra forestam nostram de Snowdon." Sir Richard Bulkeley, who had been one of the former commissioners, conscious of the rectitude of their resistance, and relying on the justice of the cause he had espoused, personally laid before the queen, on behalf of the landholders of the three counties, a representation of the unparalleled oppressions inflicted upon the Welsh by the power exercised under the commission; and at length prevailed upon Her Majesty to recall the commission grant, which was done by public proclamation at Westminster, in the year 1579. This remonstrance, however, caused Leicester to pursue Sir Richard with an inveterate animosity.

sity, which ceased only with the life of the former. Although numerous large and small freeholds escaped the grasp of despotism on the subjugation of the principality by Edward I.; and the transfer of property has, in few instances, received any disturbance from the crown for many years, yet several of the estates in Carnarvonshire are at the present day held by regal grant, and most of its vast extent of waste lands are still the property of the king, are enumerated among the sources of his ordinary revenue, and are subject to inquisition from the Exchequer. This county, as before described, the promontory of Llyn excepted, seems for the most part to be one vast assemblage of huge rocky mountains, some of which, including Snowdon itself, are common, while others, by grants from the Welsh princes, are claimed as private property up to their very summits. No less than one hundred thousand acres of land are not only unfit for cultivation, but are wholly incapable of receiving it, consisting of rugged mountains and moors, deep rocky dells, and horrid chasms. There are few farms that do not possess a common right on some of these wastes, and that attached to those in the vicinity of the mountains is almost unlimited; but the rocks, of which the mountains are composed, not being decomposable by the action of the atmosphere, their sterility is very great, the hollows and slopes upon peat, or clay, being the chief spots which produce any herbage for the support of the hardy race of sheep and cattle which are depastured in these alpine tracts during the summer. Several of the more improveable wastes, such as Rhôs Hîrwaen, in Llyn, consisting of about three thousand acres; Penmorva marsh, on the south-eastern border of the county, comprising about two thousand seven hundred acres; Morva Dinlle, a sandy marsh with some clay, extending from Dinas Dinlle, an ancient British encampment, to the entrance of the Menai, near Carnarvon, and containing two thousand five hundred and sixty acres; and the wastes in the parishes of Llandeiniolen and Llanrûg, have been enclosed in pursuance of acts of parliament obtained since the commencement of the present century. The common fuel is peat, an abundance of which is obtained in the morassy parts of the wastes and commons, and stored up for winter use: much of this valuable material contains a large portion of bituminous matter, which renders it a tolerable substitute for coal, an article of very limited consumption in this county, being only procured at a great price from the collieries of Lancashire and Flintshire: almost every farm has its appropriated turbary, and such as have no right of common buy peat by the load. The Carnarvonshire Agricultural Society, instituted in the year 1807, and consisting of the principal landed proprietors, has exercised considerable influence in the improvement of its husbandry, &c.

The geological features of Carnarvonshire are peculiarly varied and interesting, though they have received but little illustration; and its mineral productions are of great importance, consisting for the most part of copper and lead ores, slates, limestone, and other kinds of stone used for building. The mountains are in general of the primitive siliceous kind, steep, and rugged. The highest peaks of the Snowdonian chain are composed of porphyritic rocks, belonging to the trap formation, passing into nearly compact, or schistose, horn-blende: these, on the western side, form numerous basaltic columns on a bed of hornstone, or chert; and large coarse crystals, cubic pyrites, and various mineral bodies are frequently found in the fissures: these columns are perpendicular, and more or less regularly pentagonal: their length is various; their diameter about four feet, with transverse joints from six to eight feet asunder, and considerable depositions of thin laminated quartz in the joints. Near the summit of Snowdon, however, there is reason to believe that schistose rocks belonging to the grey wacké formation are also to be found, enclosing impressions of shells. The rocks composing the higher parts of the chain are also said to include granite and the granitel of Kirwan, schistose hornblende, and schistose mica; and contiguous to these, on each side, are vast beds of clay-slate, forming secondary mountains, which constitute the first parapet of the Snowdonian chain, and accompanying which are also found beds of chert, quartz, burr-stone, serpentine, and an endless variety of combinations of other mineral substances of less bulk: the promontory of Llyn is formed almost entirely of clay-slate, but the hills on the north-eastern coast, to the west of the river Conway, are composed in a great measure of chert; and several of the mountains, the bases of which consist of argillaceous schistus, have their middle parts covered with blocks of chert, and their summits surmounted by masses of a granitic character. The argillaceous schistus supports a range of mountain limestone strata on the shores of the Menai: and the substrata of the hundred of Creuddyn consist for the most part of the same kind of limestone, and are part of the formation which also occupies portions of the counties of Denbigh and Flint, and terminates westward in the cliffs overhanging the sea near Llandudno, commonly called Great Orme's Head, which forms the eastern boundary of the bay of Beaumaris. Of ores, the mountains appear to contain more copper than lead. The primitive rocks in mass contain no metals, but copper is found in several of the hornstone stratified mountains, of which those at Llanberis and Pont Aberglâslyn are examples: in these mines the ore is for the most part sulphate of copper, and yields from eight to ten per cent. of pure metal. Oxydated carbonate of copper, with some specimens covered with lancet-pointed crystals of an amethystine colour, is obtained at Derwen dëg, to the south-west of Aberconway; and sulphate both of copper and lead is found at Havôd y Llan, near Dinas Emrys. A copper mine is also worked with spirit in the limestone strata of the hundred of Creuddyn, near Great Orme's Head, in the parish of Llandudno, and produces some beautiful specimens of malachite, or mammelated green carbonate of copper, of which all the ore there raised consists. But the copper mine at present most extensively worked in this county is one near Lliniau Dinlle, in the parish of Bethgelart, where upwards of two hundred men are employed, and the ore obtained in it is sent down the rail-road to Carnarvon, to be there shipped for Bristol, Swansea, &c. At Bwlch-haiarn, near Gwydir, on the road from Llanrwst to Capel-Curig, are very extensive lead mines, the veins of ore crossing each other, from north to south and from east to west: the matrix is of quartz and calcareous spar, though the surrounding rocks consist of slate, bituminous shale, and trap, or whinstone: the ores chiefly lie about twelve feet beneath the surface: calamine is found in conjunction with the lead, and the whole is intermingled with ferruginous ochre and a small quantity of copper pyrites. Ores of copper and calamine are also raised at Capel Curig; and the latter metal from both these places is shipped off at Trêvriw, on the Conway, for the foundries at Bristol. Other veins of lead-ore are worked at Penrhyn dû, adjoining St. Tudwal's islands, near the southern extremity of the county, and at Gêst, near Penmorva, on its south-eastern frontier.

Great quantities of the argillaceous schistus, so abundant in this county, are converted into slates for roofing houses and other purposes, and form its most important article of commerce. These slates are raised between Aberconway and Bwlch y Dderwen, at Trêvriw, in the Llanberis and Llanllyvni hills, on both sides of the promontory of Lleyn, and in the parish of Llandeiniolen; but the principal works of this kind are the following, viz., those of Braich y Cavn, near Dôlawen, on the road between Capel-Curig and Llandegai, which, about the year 1780, produced only one thousand tons annually, and gave employment to sixty men; but, coming into the possession of the late Lord Penrhyn, that nobleman, in 1782, opened a vast quarry, which has ever since been worked, and now annually produces upwards of forty thousand tons of slates, which are conveyed by means of an iron railway to Port Penrhyn, which was formed by his lordship for the convenience of the vessels engaged in this trade, and at which they are shipped in large quantities to Ireland, America, the West Indies, &c., and also to London, Bristol, and Liverpool: and the Cîlgwyn quarries, in the parish of Llanllyvni, and those of Llanberis, from which conjointly are obtained about double the quantity produced at Dôlawen: the produce of these is for the most part shipped at Carnarvon, for Ireland and different parts of Britain, though many from the Llanberis quarries are taken on board in a small creek of the Menai, opposite to Moel y don ferry. The Carnarvonshire slates are exceedingly smooth and of a fine grain, generally of a beautiful blue colour, and may be separated into laminae as thin as wafers; which properties render them the best for roofing, and for manufacturing into writing slates: they consist of forty-eight parts of silex, twenty-six of argil, eight of magnesia, four of calx, and fourteen of iron. Of the three great quarries above mentioned, that of Cîlgwyn produces slates of the coarsest quality, which are also of a deep red colour; those of Dôlawen are exceedingly smooth and of a brilliant blue, or slate grey; while those of Llanberis are of an intermediate quality, and generally of a reddish purple hue. The slates of a deep blue colour are the best adapted of any in Europe for writing slates; and those obtained from the Dôlawen quarries are planed and framed of various sizes, in a manufactory established by the late Lord Penrhyn, near Bangor, to the number of about ten thousand dozen annually: these are not only distributed over all parts of the United Kingdom, but considerable quantities are also exported, without frames, to different parts of the continent: ink-stands and other fancy articles are also manufactured here of the same material. The slates raised in the quarries are divided by the manufacturers into the following classes: viz., duchesses, measuring twenty-four inches by twelve; coun-

tesses, twenty by ten; ladies, sixteen by eight; doubles, twelve by six; ton slates, large and of various sizes; and patents, with square heads; which are sold by the thousand, except the last two, which are sold by the ton: in some of the quarries are also other classes, called respectively singles, rags, and kiln-ribs. Besides the above-named articles, the slate is also converted into tombstones, dados and plinths for stables and passages, chimney-pieces, hearth-stones, sink-stones, dairy tables, sideboards, panels for doors, shutters, &c., fences, and washball stands, and is used to form cases for the outside of buildings, as a defence against the weather; and in such situations, by being painted and sanded, is made to bear the appearance of stone. A quarry of burr, for millstones, has been opened since the commencement of the present century, near Aberconway, in a vein running from east to west along the hill called Mynydd y Drêw. Near Cwm Idwal is a large quarry of the novaculite of Kirwan (of the second and third varieties of that species), where great quantities of scythe-hones are cut, and sent to London, Dublin, &c.: hones are also obtained from a rock on the eastern side of the valley of Nant Francon. Steatite, or soap-rock, is found in different places, especially at Craig y Sebon, and on the hill to the north of Penmorva. Serpentine abounds in the vicinity of Capel-Curig. Ochre is dug out of a mine near the Dôlawen slate quarries, and is then separated from the sand with which it is intermixed by grinding and successive filtrations, being finally collected in a sediment, which is dried by the sun and air in summer, and upon kilns during the winter: the general colour of this earth is yellow, but in the same manufactory, and also for the use of painters, others of various hues are ground, with which, in their raw state, the Snowdonian shepherds mark their sheep. Large siliceous crystals, commonly called rock diamonds, are frequently found in the fissures of the rocks among the mountains, whence they are washed down by the violent torrents caused by the heavy rains frequently experienced in these alpine tracts, and, being collected by the poor inhabitants, are presented by them for sale to travellers and tourists, as extraordinary and valuable productions. Some curious specimens of cubic pyrites and crystallized tin have been discovered at different times.

The manufactures and commerce of Carnarvonshire are various, but of minor importance. Besides supplying themselves with wearing apparel, the inhabitants annually send a few pieces of blue cloth into Merionethshire, and some of a peculiar drab-coloured cloth, called brethyn sir Von, into Anglesey, to be sold at the Llanerchymedd fairs: these cloths are generally seven-eighths of a yard wide. The flannels manufactured here are coarse. The employment of the mountaineers, both in summer and winter, besides tending their herds, and the labours of the dairy, consists in carding and spinning the wool produced by their flocks, of which they make cloth for their own wear, and for sale at the neighbouring fairs and markets, more particularly at those of Carnarvon and Llanrwst. They also make great quantities of striped linsey-woolsey, of different patterns, which they call stuff, and which is used for the women's gowns. But those who have more wool than the family can manufacture sell it at the neighbouring fairs, of which that of Llanrwst is the principal mart for this article, and is attended by the English buyers:

the price obtained for the wool at this fair is usually the standard for the year. A considerable quantity of coarse linen yarn is spun and woven by the inhabitants of the mountainous districts, both for their own use and for sale, but chiefly for the latter. The spinners and weavers have a measure peculiar to themselves, commonly called the Welsh yard, which is forty inches long, and by which all their milled cloth, flannels, linseys, and linen are measured when sold. The knitting of woollen stockings and socks is carried on most extensively in the south-eastern extremity of the county, in the neighbourhood of Llanrwst and Penmachno, which is included in the great manufacturing district for those articles, of which the town of Bala in Merionethshire is the centre. Formerly all the wool that was not home-spun and custom-wove, after being sold, was exported to be manufactured in different parts of the kingdom; but since the commencement of the present century, various establishments have been formed on some of the numerous small streams for carrying on different branches of the woollen manufacture. Thus, in the parishes of Llanrûg, Llanwnda, &c., are slubbing and carding engines, with jennies and billies for luffing and spinning, which prepare the worsted yarn, and in some instances manufacture it into cloth. At Trêmadoc, on the south-eastern confines of the county, is a large manufactory for weaving druggets and coarse army cloth, of like modern establishment. In the parish of Llanrûg is a paper-mill, and another at Porth llwyd, on the Conway, below Llanrwst; and to this list of manufactures may likewise be added the important one of slates, above described. The commerce of the county, until of late years, was almost wholly confined to the port of Carnarvon, which, like all the others within its limits, is under the control of the custom-house at Beaumaris in Anglesey; but a great trade in the article of slates, which was formerly engrossed by Carnarvon, is now carried on from Porth Penrhÿn, as above stated, and has greatly increased, since the removal of the coast duties, in all the ports near the quarries. Although its commerce is comparatively so unimportant, yet the harbours of this county are numerous. In the promontory of Llleyn are several small creeks, affording safe retreats from storms to boats and small craft engaged on the coast during the fishing season: among these are Porth Towyn, Porth Colman, Porth Gwylan, Porth Ysgadan, and Aberdaron, the last of which is a village chiefly inhabited by fishermen, and the place whence the passage is usually made to Bardsey Island, on the south-eastern side of which is a small well-sheltered harbour for vessels of from twenty to forty tons' burden. The small bay between Porth Towyn and Ceiriad Road is vulgarly called by mariners "Hell's Mouth," from the danger, in rough weather, of being driven into it and wrecked, in attempting to gain St. Tudwal's Road, near Pwllheli, which as a haven is deemed inferior to none in Britain, being not only commodious, but extensive enough to receive the largest fleet, well defended on one side by the promontory of Llleyn, and on the other by two islets, called St. Tudwal's Islands. Pwllheli, having a harbour capable of admitting vessels of sixty tons' burden, forms the grand dépôt for articles imported for the supply of the south-western part of the county. The small harbour of Nevin, or Porth-din-Llleyn, was improved early in the present century by subscription. Carnarvon has a very commodious harbour, though impeded by a bar; but the tide rises so high here, that, with proper attention, ships of almost any size may pass and repass in safety: this port carries on a very considerable coasting trade with London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Ireland, and is by far the most important in North Wales. Porth Penrhÿn, formerly called Abercegin, close to the town of Bangor, being naturally only a small inlet, was converted, by the late Lord Penrhÿn, into a commodious harbour, capable of admitting vessels of three hundred tons' burden, for more conveniently exporting the slates from his quarries, about six miles distant. Aberconway, situated on the left bank, and within a short distance of the mouth of the river Conway, has a dry harbour, frequented by a few coasting vessels. The chief exports through the medium of these ports, more particularly of those of Carnarvon and Porth Penrhÿn, are slates for roofing; writing slates; ores of copper; ground chert, &c., for the English potteries; and ochre. The principal exports by land are cattle, sheep, hogs, and raw wool. The imports, besides those of groceries, and other ordinary articles of retail trading, consist chiefly of grain and coal. The principal fishery is on that part of the coast between Pwllheli and Bardsey Island, where the bays and creeks are frequented in the season by vast shoals of herrings, some of which, when taken, are salted on shore, and the rest chiefly sold to Irish vessels of small burden, which come hither for the purpose of purchasing them: great numbers of dories are caught here, as also are smelts near Pwllheli; and a small kind of lobster is frequently found burrowing in the sands on the shore.

The rivers, owing to the peninsular situation of the county, for the most part run only a short course, from the mountains immediately to the sea; but the waters of some of them are very copious. The Conway, which is the principal, forms an exception, taking a longer course through a spacious and delightful valley, extending parallel with the Vale of Clwyd, in Denbighshire, between which county and that of Carnarvon it forms the line of division during the greater part of its course. Issuing from Llÿn Conway, near the point of junction of the three counties of Carnarvon, Denbigh, and Merioneth, it first takes a southerly, afterwards a north-easterly, and lastly a northerly, course, at first precipitating its waters in successive falls, until, emerging from under the high wooded cliffs of Gwydir, it rushes into the beautiful vale of Nantconway, and, flowing under the elegant bridge of Llanrwst, meanders in beautiful curves to the town of Aberconway, where it swells into a noble tide river, and soon after mingles its waters with those of the Irish sea, in the eastern part of Beaumaris bay, after a course of about twenty miles, in which it is joined by almost as many smaller streams, of which the principal are, the Machno, the Ceirio, and the Llugwy, all from Carnarvonshire. The Conway meets the tide and becomes navigable at Trêvriw, about two miles below the town of Llanrwst, and at its mouth is about a mile broad, and capable of admitting vessels of great burden. Although the boundary between Carnarvonshire and Denbighshire, during the earlier part of its course, yet a small portion of the former county, below Llanrwst, is situated on its eastern banks; and from the vicinity of the village of Llansaintfraid, in the latter, the remainder of its course is wholly in the former, in which it separates the hundred of Creuddyn from the rest of the county. In the lower reaches of this river, the silt brought up and deposited by the tides has raised its bed above the level of the vale on each side, a circumstance which greatly tends to the injury of the adjacent meadows. A ledge of rocks, called the Arrow, crossing the Conway, about a furlong above Tâl y cayn ferry, forming a great obstacle to its navigation, and over which, at low water, there was a fall of no less than three feet, has been partially removed. The Seiont, a small and rapid river, has its source in a lake on the eastern side of Snowdon, whence, suddenly turning towards the north-west, it flows through the two beautiful lakes of Llanberis, from the lower of which it proceeds westward, at first under the name Rythel; but afterwards, assuming that of Seiont, it passes the site of the ancient Segontium to the town of Carnarvon, where it discharges its waters into the Menai, its small æstuary forming a safe and commodious harbour: the lakes and the channel between them are navigated by boats, which convey slates, &c., to the lowest extremity of the lower lake, whence they are forwarded by carts to Carnarvon. The Gwyrvai, a stream much resembling the Seiont in size and character, takes a course nearly parallel with it a few miles further southward, and falls into the Menai, near the south-western entrance of that strait. The Ogwen, a small river from Llŷn Ogwen, is equally rapid in its current, and, running north-westward, falls into the Menai, about two miles north-east of Bangor. The promontory of Llyn is watered only by inconsiderable streams; and the Gwynedd, or Glâs-lyn river, is the only one on the southern side of the county worthy of especial notice: it has its source in one of the wildest parts of the Snowdonian mountains, and, after forming the lake of Llŷn Gwynedd, it pursues a southerly course by the village of Bethgelart, below which it rushes through a vast chasm in the mountains, which here separates the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, the boundary between which it forms in the rest of its course, flowing through the now secured and enclosed sands of the Traeth Mawr, which once formed its great æstuary, and pouring its waters into the northernmost part of Cardigan bay, a few miles north-eastward of the borough of Criccieth. Carnarvonshire has no artificial inland navigation, but possesses three railroads, one for the conveyance of slates from the quarries near Dôlawen to the vessels at Port Penrhŷn, the length of which is six miles; one for the conveyance of slates from Llanberis to Porth Dinorrrweg, a distance of six miles; and the third, for the conveyance of copper-ore and slates to Carnarvon, extending from Lliniau Dinlle to Carnarvon, a distance of nine miles.

The roads, which were formerly among the worst in the principality, have undergone great improvements, notwithstanding the difficulties experienced in the execution of such undertakings in so mountainous a country. Amongst the instances most worthy of notice may be mentioned the construction, in the year 1770, of a good road over the vast precipice of Penmaen-Mawr, lying in the old road to Ireland by way of Chester and Holyhead, and in which the government afforded considerable assistance; and the formation, by the late Lord Penrhyn, of an excellent road from Capel-Curig, through Nant Francon and the romantic interior of the Snowdon mountains, to Dôlawen and Bangor, and which now forms part of the nearer route of the Irish mails; that of a new road from Carnarvon to Clynog, Pwllheli, and Nevin; that of one under the direction of the late Mr. Madocks of Tan yr Allt, from Aberglâslyn bridge through Trêmadoc to Nevin; and that of another from Llanrwst and Capel-Curig, over Bwlch yr Eisteddva, or Gorphwysva, and through Nant Peris, on the western side of the lakes, to Carnarvon: besides these may also be mentioned the construction of the magnificent suspension bridge over the Menai, near Bangor, and that over the broad channel of the river Conway, at Aberconway. The road from Carnarvon to the Aberglâslyn bridge, which forms the entrance into Merionethshire, running a distance of upwards of twelve miles through the romantic wilds of Snowdon, was reconstructed by subscription, about the commencement of the present century; and the communication with Merionethshire is now excellent, by means of a good road across the Traeth Mawr to Tan y Bwlch. Carnarvonshire, as has been already noticed, abounds throughout with excellent materials for the making and repairing of roads. Its numerous streams, when swelled by the frequent and sudden rains that fall in the mountains, require the roads to be carried over them by bridges of a greater length than would be requisite in a champaign country; which increase of size is obtained sometimes by extending the span of a single arch, and at others by continuing the structure in the manner of an arcade. Thus diversified in their shapes, and in most instances erected, not at right angles across the stream, but obliquely, they form very ornamental objects in the picturesque scenery of the district. The mail-coach road from London to Holyhead, by way of Chester, enters the northern part of this county, from Abergel in Denbighshire, and passes through Aberconway, and over the Penmaen-Mawr mountain to Llandegai and Bangor, from which latter place it is carried over the Menai strait by the chain bridge recently erected. That from London to Holyhead, by way of Shrewsbury, which is shorter than the former by fourteen miles, enters from Pentre-Voelas in Denbighshire, and becomes identified with the new line above mentioned, passing by Capel-Curig to the village of Llandegai, near Bangor, where it forms a junction with the road by Chester: the branch from this at Capel-Curig to Carnarvon has been noticed above. Another road from London reaches this county, by way of Welshpool and Harlech, entering it from the latter town, in Merionethshire, at Pont Aberglâslyn, whence the main line is continued to Carnarvon, and over the Abermenai ferry into Anglesey; while a branch extends into the promontory of Llyn, communicating with the towns of Criccieth, Pwllheli, and Nevin.

The remains of antiquity are numerous, various, and interesting. Some are of the class usually considered Druidical; such as the circle of upright stones, eighty feet in diameter, with a kistvaen in the centre, situated in the parish of Dwygyfylchi; the small Druidical circle, of which some of the stones are deranged and others fallen, situated above Penmorva; the larger circle on Bwlch Craigwen, which is almost entire, and is composed of thirty-eight upright stones; the three cromlechs near Ystum Cegid; the uncommonly large cromlech, in a field near the sea-shore, about half a mile from Clynnog, about thirty yards from which stands a single rude pillar of stone; and the large cromlech situated near the old mansion of Cevn Amwlch, called by the common people Coeten Arthur. The remains of the Roman stations Segontium and Conovium (described under the heads of Carnarvon and Caerhên), with those of a few detached outposts, and of the connecting roads between them, are yet visible. Part of a Roman road is seen extending from the ancient Segontium to the strong post of Dinas Dinlle, which latter comprises the summit of a large mount, apparently artificial, on the sea-shore, and on the verge of an extensive level, formerly a marsh: it is of a circular form, four hundred feet in diameter, and surrounded by a vast rampart of earth, within which are included vestiges of buildings of an oblong form, constructed of loose stones, and a tumulus formed of the same materials: here have been found Roman coins; and on a stream, called Y Foriad, that runs at a little distance, are two fords, still called respectively by the mixed British and Roman names of Rhŷd pedestre and Rhŷd equestre, "the passage for the infantry," and "the passage for the cavalry." In connexion with this great centre of observation and action were several other forts, lying diagonally across the country, some towards the north, and others towards the south. The most considerable are, Dinas Dinorweg, in the parish of Llandeiniolen, which is still entire, and consists of an extensive area, including the remains of a circular stone building, supposed to have been a prætorium, surrounded by two ramparts of loose stones, within which are two valla formed of earth, and two very deep fosses; Yr hên Gastell, or "the old Castle," near the brook Carrog, in the parish of Llanwnda, which is a small intrenchment with a single rampart, about fifty paces long; Dinas Gorvan, near Pont Newydd, in the same parish, the only vestige of which is its name; and Craig y Ddinas, on the river Llyvni, a mile and a half distant, and about a mile south-west of the road leading from Carnarvon to Pwllheli, a quarter of a mile from the seat called Lleiar, which is a circular encampment, about a hundred paces in diameter, and the ramparts of which, defended by a treble ditch, are very strong, and composed of uncemented stones: the entrance is towards the north, very narrow, and forty paces in length. Further on, towards the extremity of this southern diagonal line, at the foot of Llanelhaiarn mountain, is a small fort on the summit of a high rock, called Caer, a Roman post of observation: smaller intrenched camps are seen on the western side of the county. Porth-din-Lleyn, near Nevin, is thought, from vestiges of strong intrenchments in the vicinity, to have been a harbour made use of by the Romans; and in the parish of Llaniestyn, a little further southward, various Roman urns have been found. The Via Occidentalis entered this county from Merionethshire, between Pont Aberglâslyn and Bethgelart: some inconsiderable traces of it are yet visible in its progress to the ancient Segontium; and it gives name to a farm over which it passes, called Ystrad, or "the Street." The other Roman road above mentioned, as entering this county from Denbighshire, from the station Conovium, ascended the hill by Bwlch y Ddeuvaen, and thence passed towards the coast, where it ran nearly parallel with the Menai to Segontium. Carnarvonshire contains several intrenched camps, the construction of which proves them to be of British origin.

On the mountainous ridge of the Reivel, forming the southernmost of the more distinguished summits of the Snowdonian chain, is one of the grandest and most artfully constructed British posts in the kingdom, called Tre'r Caeri, or the town of fortresses. The only accessible side seems to have been defended by three walls, the first of which is now imperfect, the second nearly entire, and the third ranges unequally round the highest verge of the hill: these walls appear to have been regularly faced, are very lofty, and exhibit from below a grand and extensive front. The enclosed area is of an irregular shape, and nearly in the centre of it is a quadrangular space, fenced with stones, and surrounded by two rows of cells, while numerous others are scattered over the surface. These remains of habitations are of various forms,—circular, oblong, and square; some fifteen and others thirty feet in diameter, with long entrance passages faced with stone. From many eminences in the vicinity being similarly fortified, namely Carn Madryn, Bôduan, Moel Benwrech, Castell Gwgan, Moel Garn Guwch, and Pen y Gaer, it has been supposed that this part of the county formed one of the principal retreats of the Britons, when hard pressed by their invaders. Near the village of Aberdaron, at the southern extremity of the county, is a small circular encampment, about fifty yards in diameter, which is defended by a double ditch and rampart; and on an isolated hill, at the foot of the lower lake of Llanberis, there is an agger of loose stones, once a British fortification, called Caer Cwm y Glô; besides which, on the left side of the valley of Nant Gwynant, near the village of Bethgelart, on the top of a precipitous rock, called Dinas Emrys, or the "fortified city of Ambrosius," is a considerable area, the approach to which is defended by two large ramparts: this comprises the ruins of an ancient stone edifice, about ten yards in length, the walls of which, built without cement, are very thick and strong. The bwlch, or hollow, which forms the entrance from the mountains into the plain called Nant Gwrtheyrn, or "Vortigern's Valley," near the town of Nevin, is crossed by a vast artificial rampart of loose stones, once forming the defence of this important pass.

The religious houses, at the period of the Reformation, were as follows: at Bangor was a house of Friars preachers; in Bardsey Island, a very ancient abbey, founded before the year 516; at Bethgelart, a priory of Augustine canons; at Clynnog-Vawr, a collegiate church; and at Maenan, near Llanrwst, a Cistercian abbey. Foundations of the walls of the college of Clynnog are yet visible; and there are also some small remains of the abbey of Bardsey Island. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture exist in the cathedral church of Bangor; in the collegiate church of Clynnog, situated on the sea-coast to the south of Carnarvon, which is the most magnificent religious edifice in North Wales, and near which are the remains of a smaller and more ancient structure; and in the parish church of Llandegai. The churches are more numerous in the promontory of Lleyn than in any other part of the county; and, from old inscriptions in them and in their cemeteries, many of them appear to have been founded soon after the introduction of Christianity into Britain. There are extensive and magnificent ruins of the castles of Carnarvon and Aberconway, erected by Edward I., those of the latter being scarcely equalled in grandeur by any in the island. There are also very curious ruins of the castle of Criccieth; some small remains of the celebrated fortress of Deganwy, in the detached hundred of Creuddyn, forming the northernmost division of the county; picturesque ruins of Dôlbadarn castle, near the village of Llanberis; also of an ancient, strong, and extensive castle on the summit of a hill called Braich y Ddinas, rising out of the Penmaen mountain, which overlooks the bay of Beaumaris; and of a small ancient fortress on a lofty rock at the head of Llŷn Cawellyn. The foundations of the castle of Bangor are yet traceable; and at Dôlbenmaen, near Criccieth, is an ancient circular tower, supposed to be of British construction. The town of Carnarvon is yet surrounded by its ancient wall, which is of great height and thickness, and flanked at short intervals by numerous semicircular bastion towers; and the walls and the four principal gateways of Aberconway are still standing, and in tolerable preservation. The ancient mansions most worthy of notice are, Gloddaeth, the seat of E. Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq.; Gwydir, that of Lord Wyloughby de Eresby; and the episcopal palace at Bangor. Llŷs Dinorweg, in the parish of Llandeiniolen, is said to have been a palace of the last native sovereign of Wales, Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, who had also a residence at Aber, in this county. The seats of more modern date most worthy of enumeration are, the elegant mansion of the Rev. H. Colton, and that of R. Heywood, Esq., at Bangor; Bôdegroes, the residence of W. Glynne Griffith, Esq.; Brynodôl, that of John Griffith, Esq.; Coed Helen, that of Rice Thomas, Esq.; Glynllivon Park, that of Lord Newborough; Gwŷnvrŷn, that of O. I. Ellis Nanney, Esq.; Llanbeblig vicarage; Nanhoron, the seat of Richard Lloyd Edwards, Esq.; Penrhŷn Castle, that of I. H. D. Pennant, Esq., lately erected on the site of a very ancient mansion; Tan yr Allt, that of William Alexander Madocks, Esq.; and Vaenol House, near Bangor, that of Thomas Assheton Smith, Esq. The farm-houses and offices are in some instances well arranged; but they are mostly of a very inferior description. The houses of the peasantry are in general extremely mean and rude. In some parts, particularly in the promontory of Llŷn, their walls are built of what in some English counties is called cobb, that is, an argillaceous earth having straw or rushes mixed with it, placed in layers between boards, until the whole is ready for the roof, which is made beforehand, and composed of thatch, either of straw, fern, or heath. Many of these huts, which have hardly ever more than two rooms, are without chimneys, the smoke escaping by a hole at one end of the building. In the more mountainous parts the cottages are constructed of loose stones, such as are found in abundance round the bases of the mountains, which are piled upon each other, and the interstices stuffed close with moss, to keep out the wind and driving rain. The houses of the small farmers, however, have these openings filled with mortar, and in some few instances are plastered and whitewashed. In the more frequented parts of the county, between Aberconway and Carnarvon, and in the vicinities of the slate quarries, the cottages, as well as the houses of a superior class, are chiefly built of unhewn stone. The roofing is generally formed of the fine blue slate of the district, which, when the walls are externally whitewashed or rough-cast, gives them a very cheerful appearance. In situations exposed to the westerly winds, the walls of dwelling-houses in this part of the county are not unusually guarded by a casing of slates, each successive course of which partly overlies the one below; the object being to prevent the sea air from penetrating the walls and rendering them damp inside. When a front of this kind is neatly executed with dark-coloured mortar in the interstices, it has a pretty appearance; but, otherwise, its aspect is very displeasing. The fires in the rural habitations are usually made by piling ignited peat on the stone hearth; for, though grates have long been in use in some houses, yet many families have a notion that a fire raised above the level of the floor is far less calculated for the purposes of warmth than one kindled on the hearth.

The mode of living of the mountaineers is particularly simple: their bread, called in Welsh bara ceirch, is of oats; and their principal beverages are whey or butter-milk, with a few bottles of cwrw, or ale, preserved as a cordial in case of illness. This plain and humble fare, together with their invigorating climate and active employments, renders them a hardy and long-lived race: whenever medicines are deemed necessary, the herbs growing in the neighbourhood furnish the supply, which is commonly administered by the advice of some matron of reputed skill. Oaten cakes are not only eaten in the mountainous districts, but also constitute the household bread of all the other parts of the county, except only in genteel families, in some of the towns, and in the inns on the post roads: they are unleavened, and baked on iron plates suspended over the fire, called bake-stones. One daily meal throughout the year consists of a very wholesome vegetable mucilage, called llymrŷ (in English flummery), which is made by adding as much warm water to finely-ground oatmeal as it can well absorb, to which some sour butter-milk, leaven, or other ferment, is added, and in three or four days' time more warm water is put in, to make it thin enough to be strained through a hair-sieve and boiled, after which it is ready for use: the slight fermentation it undergoes, during its infusion, gives it a pleasant acidity, which contrasts well with the sweetness of the milk with which it is generally eaten. Servants hired by the year generally commence their term of service on the 1st of May. The surface of the county, with regard to its fences, wears a singular aspect to a stranger arriving from a well-cultivated country. Much land not deemed waste has for ages been devoid of fences, and where these are found, they are generally such rude barriers as to admit the trespass, not only of sheep, but of cattle and horses, to the great annoyance and loss of the farmer. Few quickset or coppice hedges are any where to be seen, the enclosures being ordinarily made by walls, three feet, and in some places not more than two feet, high, constructed of loose stones collected from the land so enclosed, or from the neighbouring commons: these are piled loosely and promiscuously, except that frequently smaller pieces are laid upon a huge block, evidently lying in its natural situation and position; and the curvature of many of these fences appears to be owing to the accidental position of the several massy blocks discoverable in them. Parts of these unstable erections frequently fall, and open breaches for all kinds of errant cattle; nor do they ever present any obstacle to the active sheep of the country, which of themselves descend from the mountains in large and numerous flocks on the approach of winter, spread in swarms over the lowland fields, and devour every kind of vegetable produce within their reach. Different gentlemen, however, in clearing their land of the immense blocks of stone which encumbered it, having blasted them with gunpowder, have employed them in the improvement of their fences, many of which are now compact and of a proper height. To the east of the church of Llandeiniolen is a spring, esteemed in the neighbourhood for its sanative properties, and called Fynnon Cegin Arthur, or "Arthur's kitchen water." The cataracts formed by the mountain streams are very numerous, but the most remarkable for their grandeur and beauty are the following:—Rhaiadr Cwm Dyli, which consists of two distinct waterfalls, formed by a rivulet issuing from the alpine pool in the mountains above, called Llŷn Llwydaw, and which, precipitating itself over two rocky ledges, breaks in foam and spray down their broken fronts; Ceuant Mawr, a tremendous fall, half a mile south of Dôlbardarn castle, which is more than sixty feet in height, and is formed by a torrent from Cwm Brwynog; Rhaiadr Mawr, in the romantic glen in which is situated the village of Aber Gwynegregyn, forming two successive falls, the upper of which is again broken into several parts by projecting ledges of rock, while the lower one precipitates itself in one broad sheet from a height of upwards of sixty feet; another Rhaiadr Mawr, formed by the stream issuing from Llŷn Geirionydd, and regarded by Mr. Bingley as the grandest and most picturesque waterfall in North Wales; and the fall on the stream that issues from Llŷn Cowlyd, in the vicinity of the last-mentioned. Down a rocky height called the Benglog, situated on one side of the valley of Nant Francon, rush the united waters of five lakes (giving rise to the river Ogwen) into a deep pool beneath, forming three successive cataracts of striking grandeur and beauty. And to this enumeration of natural curiosities may be added the little floating island on a small lake called Llŷn y Dywarchen, or "the lake of the sod," which lies to the right of the road leading from Carnarvon to Bethgelart.

CARNGIWCH (CARN-GIWG), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Pwllheli, on the road from Carnarvon, containing 117 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the river Erch, takes its name from a lofty conical hill, called Moel Carn Giwch, on the summit of which is a vast heap of loose stones, generally thought to be a carnedd, but said by popular tradition to have been thrown down by a giantess, who carried them thither in her apron. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Edern, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Ciwg, or St. Beuno, and in which divine service is performed only every third Sunday, is a small neat edifice, rebuilt, with the exception of the east end, in 1828. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £48. 8.

CARNO, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Newtown, containing 1010 inhabitants. In 948, a battle was fought here for the sovereignty of North Wales, between Ievav and Iago; the sons of Edwal Voel, and those of Hywel Dda, late king of all Wales, which terminated in favour of the former. And in 1077, or, according to some, in 1082, an eminence called Mynydd Carn, from a large carnedd upon it, commemorative of some distinguished warrior of a still more remote period, was the scene of one of the most sanguinary battles ever fought in the principality, between Gruffydd ab Cynan, rightful sovereign of North Wales, aided by Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, and Trahaern ab Caradoc, who then usurped the throne, in which the latter was defeated and slain, after a sharp and obstinate conflict, with the flower of his army, and Gruffydd succeeded to the throne, which he filled for fifty-seven years, and died in 1137: his biography is preserved in the Welsh Archaeology, from which he appears to have been distinguished by strong and decisive powers of mind. The scene of this battle is by some fixed at Carno in Brecknockshire, but the event may possibly be confounded with an engagement that took place there, in 728, between Rhodri Molwynog, and Ethelbald King of Mercia. The village is situated on the road from Newtown to Machynlleth: there is a turbary in the parish, where peat is obtained for the consumption of the adjoining district. The hills command fine views of the vale of Carno and the surrounding eminences. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is an unadorned stone edifice, rebuilt in 1807: it formerly belonged to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who are said to have had a house near it. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £725. 11.

CARON-UWCH-CLAWDD, or STRATA-FLORIDA, a chapelry in the parish of TRÊGARON, partly in the hundred of ILAR, and partly in the upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. E.) from Trêgaron, containing 732 inhabitants. Near the source of the river Teivy, in the vicinity of this place, a sanguinary battle was fought, in 1042, between Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, and Hywel, Prince of South Wales, who, having been previously discomfited by Gruffydd, was pursued hither, and, in this second action, was slain, together with a great part of his army. This place is distinguished as the site of a celebrated abbey for Cistercian monks, founded here in 1164, by Rhys, son of Gruffydd, the reigning prince of South Wales, under the name of Strata Florida, or, as it is called by the Welsh, Ystrad Flur; and the endowment then given to it was confirmed by the sons of Rhys, in the presence of their army, in the church of Rhaiadr, and subsequently by Henry II. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of Wales, desirous of determining, before his death, the succession to the sovereignty, convened a meeting of all the Welsh chieftains at Strata Florida, where they renewed their oaths of allegiance, and did homage to Davydd, his son, by the English princess, in preference to his elder brother Gruffydd. During the early wars between the English and the Welsh, this monastery frequently sustained considerable damage; and in the 23rd of Edward I.

it was accidentally destroyed by fire, with the exception of an old building, subsequently used as a barn, which is supposed to have formed part of the original structure, and is called Yr hên Vonachlog, or "the old Monastery." King Edward gave the abbot permission to rebuild it, and granted the sum of £78 towards defraying the expense. From this period it continued to flourish in the possession of ample endowments, including a large tract of adjacent country, besides lands at a distance; and was the place of interment of many of the Welsh sovereigns and nobility, of whom Prince Rhys, its founder, was buried here in 1196. It afforded an asylum for learned men during various succeeding ages, amongst whom was Gutyn Owain, an eminent Welsh poet, herald, and historian of the fifteenth century, who made this his principal residence, and here probably compiled some of his most elaborate works. Several of the public records of the principality were deposited in this abbey, in common with that of Aberconway; and amongst the rest was the Chronicle of Caradoc of Llancarvan, which was a collection of the successions and acts of the British princes after Cadwalladr, to the year 1156, by Caradoc, and afterwards continued in these monasteries until the year 1270, forming a complete registry of the most notable occurrences within the island, and particularly in connexion with the principality. There were several cells and hospitals, with chapels annexed to the latter, subordinate to the principal establishment here: the revenue of this monastery, at the time of the dissolution, was estimated at £122. 6. 8. After the dissolution, a mansion was erected here by John Stedman, Esq., which, together with the estate, has become the property of the Powell family, by marriage with an heiress of the Stedmans. In the vicinity of this place, near the summit of a chain of hills which separates the counties of Cardigan and Brecknock, and surrounded by a wild and dreary tract of moorland, there is a cluster of lakes, six in number, the principal of which is Llyn Teivy, where the river Teivy has its source.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of E. W. Powell, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice of mean appearance. The buildings of the ancient monastery, which were of considerable extent and magnificence, occupied a somewhat romantic situation, being environed on three sides by a lofty chain of barren hills, and overlooking the vale of the Teivy. The only part remaining is an arched gateway, of curious Norman architecture, differing greatly from other specimens of that style, and of great beauty: various sculptured fragments of freestone, glazed tiles, painted glass, and other relics, indicating the past grandeur of these buildings, have been occasionally dug up; and two seals, one circular, about the size of a crown piece, and bearing the arms of the abbey, and the other elliptical, having a representation of the Madonna and child, were found several years ago in the adjacent grounds. The old cemetery was enclosed by a rude stone wall, and is reported to have comprised one hundred and twenty acres of ground, being the exact quantity of the abbey land now tithe-free, in which leaden coffins have been frequently dug up, and in which there were, according to Leland, thirty-nine yew trees, though others say twenty-four, and under one of them, as tradition reports, Davydd ab Gwylym, the noted bard of this county, was interred. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £198. 12.

CARREGHOVA (CAREG-HWVA), a township in that part of the parish of LLANMYNECH which is in the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Oswestry, containing 362 inhabitants. It is situated between the rivers Tanat and Vyrnwy, which unite here, and forms a detached portion of the county of Denbigh, lying between Shropshire and Montgomeryshire. It is considered rich in mineral strata, which were formerly worked by the Romans, of whom various remains, such as coins, a skeleton of a human figure, &c., have been discovered; but its greatest produce is a species of light-coloured marble, streaked with red and white veins, and easily convertible into lime of superior quality, which, by means of a canal, is distributed over a great part of Wales. A branch connecting the Montgomeryshire and Ellesmere canals commences here, and proceeds through the township, crossing the river Vyrnwy by an aqueduct, and both are likewise intersected by the road from Llanymynech to Welshpool. Of the castle which once stood here, on the banks of the Tanat, little remains, except some vestiges of the fosse on the east side. It was captured in 1162, by Owain Cyveiliog and Owain ab Madoc, two cousins, who retained possession of it about twenty-five years, when it was finally reduced by Cadwallon and Gwenwynwyn, sons of Owain Cyveiliog, after having slain Owain ab Madoc, their father's former colleague. At Gwern y vign, within half a mile of the castle, a battle took place in 1202. The ancient mansion of Carreghova Hall has long since disappeared, and has been succeeded by a modern farmhouse. There is a bequest of £1 per annum for eight poor maids, or widows, frequenting the church of Llanymynech, by an unknown benefactor, which is paid by the rector. Offa's Dyke passes near the eastern boundary of the township, which approaches close to the village of Llanymynech; and at its south-western border, overhanging the river Vyrnwy, below where it is joined by the Tanat, rises a triangular mound, surrounded by a deep fosse, called Clawdd Côch, or "the red dyke," which Sir Richard Colt Hoare supposes to be the ancient Mediolanum, and not Meivod, ten miles higher up the river, as some have imagined; and this site agrees better with the relative distances from Bovium and Rutunium in the Itinerary of Antoninus. This township separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £77. 2.

CASCOB, a parish partly within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, and partly in a detached portion of the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Presteign. The population is partly returned with the hamlet of Litton, and High and St. David's-street wards, in the parish of Presteign, and that part of the parish which is not so returned contains 121 inhabitants. This parish, in Domesday-book called Coscope, contains three thousand two hundred and fifty acres of land, of which about eleven hundred and fifty are enclosed and in a state of cultivation. The soil is of various kinds, part being rich meadow and pasture land, part well adapted for tillage, and a large portion of a very inferior description. A small stream, called Cascob brook, rises in the parish, in two different sources, one in the western part, and the other on the south-west side, the two branches uniting at a distance of about a mile from their respective springs, and forming first the boundary between the parishes of Cascob and Old Radnor, and subsequently that between the townships of Cascob and Litton with Cascob, and finally joining the river Lûg. The surface of the parish is various, part being composed of a narrow plain, bordered by sloping ascents, and part rising gradually to a considerable elevation, and constituting part of the Forest of Radnor. The township of Cascob consists of the manors of Ackwood and Cwm-ygerwyn, which were formerly a part of the Marches, and belonged to the crown, being specifically reserved to it in the charter granted to the borough of New Radnor. On the enclosure of waste lands in this township, pursuant to an act passed in the 53rd of George III., ten acres and three roods were assigned to the crown in Ackwood, and ninety acres and two roods at Cwm-ygerwyn, in lieu of manorial rights: both these allotments have since been alienated, the former to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, for augmenting the benefice of Stow in Shropshire, and the latter to Richard Price, Esq. The manor of Litton and Cascob is parcel of that of Stapleton, and belongs to the Earl of Oxford: the mesne manor is the property of — Bodenham, Esq. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. 7½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small ancient structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and a low tower, the last surmounted by a shed, containing two bells. On an elevated situation in the western part of this parish, bordering on that of New Radnor, there is a low mound of dark peat earth, called the Black Mixen; and near the junction of the two brooks, on the south-west side of the western portion of the parish, is the site of an ancient mansion, surrounded by a moat, enclosing a circular area more than one hundred feet in diameter: the present house called "The Moat" is built within the ancient moat, on the north-west side of the area: there is a slight embankment on the edge of this area, which is highest on the western side, probably constructed for defence. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £23. 10.

CASTEL-DAUYRAN (CASTELL-DWY-RAN, or DYRAM), a chapelry in that part of the parish of KILLYMAENLLWYD which is in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4½ miles (N.E.) from Narberth, containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Crown. This place is supposed to have taken its name from a castle which anciently stood near the chapel, called Castell Dwy Ran, both of which were possessed, in equal portions, by two sisters: of the former there are no vestiges.

CASTELLA (CASTELLAU), a hamlet in the parish of LLANTRISSENT, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Llantrissent, with which the population is returned. This hamlet contains some coal-works, part of the produce of which is shipped for Ireland. Here is a neat mansion, anciently the seat of the Trahearne family, now the property and residence of Major Smith, the grounds of which, being disposed with great taste, impart an air of cheerfulness and beauty to a scene naturally grand.

CASTELLAN, a chapelry in the parish of PENRITH, hundred of KILGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Cardigan, containing 127 inhabitants. It forms an extensive portion of the parish, and is situated at the northern foot of the Vrenni-Vawr mountain, the second in height in the county. The chapel is in ruins, but the incumbent of the parish receives a small annual payment of one guinea from Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart., of Pictou Castle.

CASTLE-BIGH (CASTLE-BEITH), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. On the border of this parish are the remains of a Roman encampment, through which runs the high road separating the parishes of Castle-Bigh and Ambleston, and which is minutely described in the account of the latter parish. There is also another encampment near the church, fortified with double ramparts, and occupying about four acres of ground. A house in the parish, called "Poll Tax Inn," received its name from having been the place where that tax was collected. The parochial rates are levied on the ploughlands. An average annual expenditure amounting to £52. 17. is applied to the support of the poor.

CASTLE-CAER-EINION, a parish partly within the liberties of the borough of WELSHPOOL, partly in the upper division of the hundred of CAWRSE, and partly in the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3½ miles (W. S. W.) from Welshpool, containing 783 inhabitants. This place is stated to derive its name from Einion Yrth, tenth son of Cunedda Wledig, King of Cambria, to whom, in the sixth century, it was given by that sovereign, on dividing the country among his twelve sons. On a conical hill, half a mile to the north-east of the village, was Einion's camp, probably called Castell yn Nghaer Einion, or, according to some, Castell, or Caer, Einion, where Madog ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, built a castle, in the year 1151, which was burnt by Owain Cyveiliog, in 1166: some of the intrenchments are discernible, but there are no remains of the castle. About the year 1109, Madoc ab Ririd, a lawless chieftain of North Wales, being at enmity with his uncle Iorwerth, the petty sovereign of a surrounding territory, concealed himself among the rocks and woods, with a body of outlawed followers; and, having received intelligence that Iorwerth intended on a certain night to sleep at this place, surrounded it at midnight, aided by his ally, Llywarch ab Trahaern; but the prince and his attendants defending it with great valour, the assailants set it on fire. The inmates then endeavoured to escape, and some of them succeeded in fighting their way through the enemy, whilst others were slain in the attempt, and the rest perished in the fire. Iorwerth himself made a vigorous effort to extricate himself from the weapons of his assailants, but was driven back, and fell a sacrifice to the flames: his brother Cadwgan, having succeeded to his territory, was killed in like manner by his ferocious nephew. The village is situated on the road from Berriew to Llanvair, and that from Welshpool to Llanvair runs through the parish. The high grounds, especially the summit of the Berwydd chain of hills, embrace picturesque views of the adjacent vales and hills. The Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., on his march against King Richard III., is said to have lodged one night at the mansion of Dôlarddin, in this parish: the old house has been almost wholly taken down, and its place supplied by a modern residence. That portion of the parish which is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool consists of the townships of Gaer, Sylvaen, Trêv Helyg, and Trêvnant, and part of that of Castle-Caer-Einion. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, is a neat unadorned edifice of stone, rebuilt in 1810. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free school is endowed with property arising from a gift of £400 by Edward Thomas, Esq., for the instruction of children whose parents do not rent property of the value of £30 per annum: there are about forty children now in the school. Some minor bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor, the principal of which consists of a small plot of ground bequeathed by Hannah Lloyd, in 1692, the rental to be distributed in bread and clothing to those of Castle-Caer-Einion, Berriew, and Forden. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £435. 13.

CASTLEMARTIN (CASTLE-MARTIN), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Pembroke, containing 487 inhabitants. This extensive parish forms a kind of promontory on the sea coast, and is bounded on the north by Freshwater West, which runs into St. George's channel, on the east by the adjoining parish of Warren, and on the west and south by the Bristol channel. The rocks on this part of the coast consist of an irregular series of broken stratification, apparently thrown together by some violent convulsion, and presenting an uncommon grandeur of appearance. From March to August these rocks are the resort of that migratory bird called the eligug, which during that period deposits its solitary egg on the shelving projections of the cliffs; and, supporting it with its foot, which possesses a degree of warmth sufficient for the purpose of incubation, after having hatched its young, and enabled it to shift for itself, leaves the vacant place to be occupied by another of the swarm that covers the surface of the water, waiting for an opportunity to perform the same process. This bird cannot take wing from land: as soon, therefore, as the young is able to fly, the parent bird throws it into the water, from which it rises with remarkable strength of wing over that element. This parish is wholly enclosed, and the land is mostly fertile and in a good state of cultivation: the Cors, a tract of land comprising about three hundred acres, was brought into cultivation by the late Mr. Mirehouse, of Brownslade, to whom, in 1810, the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, adjudged their gold medal for clearing waste moors. The same gentleman also surrounded his house at Brownslade with luxuriant plantations, which, from their exposure to the violence of the south-west winds, it was generally apprehended would wither in the shoot; but, under the judicious management of that eminent agriculturist, the trees have flourished in opposition to every impediment, and, though much neglected of late by the unavoidable absence of the present proprietor, who is one of the special pleaders to the city of London, during the greater part of the year, are highly ornamental to the neighbourhood. Besides Brownslade, the seat of John Mirehouse, Esq., Corston, the respectable residence of Abraham Leach, Esq., is in this parish. The whole of the district abounds with numerous military works and fortifications, thrown up during the frequent contests which took place between the Danish pirates who infested this part of the coast, which, from its exposed and defenceless situation, was much subject to their attacks, and the native Welsh, who resolutely repelled their aggressions: one of these may be seen on a farm in this parish, called Bully Bar. The parish abounds with limestone of excellent quality, in the centre of which is found clay, much used in the manufacture of fire bricks. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 6., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor, who is also impropriator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, and has undergone thorough repair within the last ten years. There was anciently a chapel at Flimston, which has long since gone to decay. A plot of ground, on which are some cottages inhabited by the poor of the parish, was given by an unknown benefactor; but there are no particulars of the donation on record. The castle of the family of Martin, descendants of Martin de Tours, and from which the parish and the hundred are supposed to derive their name, was in a state of ruin prior to the time of Leland, who says, "Towards this extrem part of Pembroke be the vestigia of Martin Castle." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £350. 15.

CASTLEWRIGHT, a township in that part of the parish of MAINSTONE which is in the lower division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{4}$  miles (S. E.) from Montgomery, containing 182 inhabitants. This township anciently formed part of the manor of Teitrêv, or the three townships, which had a chapel attached, the ruins of which were recently visible at Pentre, but the manor having been divided, this township was joined to the parish of Mainstone. The road from Bishop's Castle to Montgomery passes through this place. It is now one of the eighteen parishes and townships incorporated by acts of parliament passed in the 32nd and 36th of George III., for the support of their own poor in the house of industry at Forden, the average annual assessment for which amounts to £62. 9. on this township.

CATHEDINE (TŪR Y CAETH ADYN), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Brecknock, containing 157 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Crickhowel to Talgarth, and is contiguous to Llŷn Savaddan, or Llangorse Mere. The only gentleman's residence is Cathedine Hill House, belonging to the Rev. William Davies, and now occupied by a tenant. The name of this place signifies, according to Mr. Theophilus Jones, the "land of the wretched captive," it having been assigned by Bernard de Newmarch, on completing the conquest of this portion of the principality, towards the support of Gwrgan, son of Bleddyn, the deposed sovereign, whom at the same time he kept in confinement in Brecknock castle. In a low situation, commanded on almost every side by more elevated ground, anciently stood the splendid castle of Blaenllyvni, the head of the lordship of Welsh Talgarth, and the borough of that name. Its founder is unknown, and its history is involved in considerable obscurity. From its contiguity to the lake, it is thought by some writers to have been the castle called by ancient historians Breccanmere, which was the residence of Hwgan, sovereign prince of Brycheiniog, and was stormed, in 910, by the heroic Ethelfleda, Countess of Mercia, after she had defeated Hwgan himself on the confines of his dominions, and who carried away his wife and attendants captives into England; but there are many forcible objections against the correctness of this opinion. The castle was probably built by one of the lords marcher: it formed part of the possessions of William de Breos, and was forfeited to the crown, on the attainder of that nobleman, in the reign of John, who bestowed it upon his favourite, Peter Fitz-Herbert, from whom it was wrested by Giles de Breos, and on his death descended to his brother, Reginald de Breos, on whose reconciliation with his father-in-law, it was restored to Fitz-Herbert. On the death of the last-named nobleman, the king conferred it on Walronde de Teys, from whom it was taken by Peter de Montford, and afterwards passed into the noble families of de Spencer and Mortimer: on the death of Mortimer, the last Earl of March, it devolved on his brother-in-law, Richard Earl of Cambridge, who being implicated in the insurrection of Jack Cade, it again escheated to the crown, and was granted, in the reign of James I., to Sir David Williams, of Gwernyvot. Of this baronial mansion and its lordship Leland thus writes:—"The Honor of Blaen Lleueni standing in a Valley ys in the Walsche Talegarth, wher is yet the Shape of a veri fair Castel now dekeiying, and by was a Borow Town now also in Decay. Both longgid to the Earl of March. Though Blaine Lleueni be in the Walsch Talegarth, yet the Tenauntes kepe the English Tenor." The only remains of this once extensive structure consist of the fragments of an old wall; and of the ancient borough of Blaenllyvni, which was a borough by prescription, enjoying considerable privileges, there is not even a single vestige. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5.2.11., and in the patronage of the Rev. Richard Davies. The advowson, together with that of Llanelieu, belonged to the prior of Brecknock until the middle of the thirteenth century, when they were given in exchange to Peter Fitz-Herbert, lord of Blaenllyvni, for those of Talgarth and Llangorse. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, consists of a nave and chancel with an ill-proportioned western tower, containing three bells; on the north side stands a building called the Old Chapel, now filled with rubbish. The average annual expenditure to support the poor amounts to £103.4.

CAYO, otherwise CYNWYL-GAIO, a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N.W. by N.) from Llandovery, intersected by the road from that town to Lampeter, and containing 1971 inhabitants. This place presents the appearance of having been formerly of much greater importance than it is at present: in some ancient writings it is called Caer Gaiio, a name evidently implying that it was defended either by a castle or some other military work. From the discovery of numerous relics of Roman antiquity, it was undoubtedly known to the Romans, and was probably occupied by them. According to tradition, a large town was erected here by the Romans, the houses of which, being chiefly of brick, obtained for it the name of Y drŷn Gŵch yn Neheubarth, or the "Red Town in South Wales." Roman bricks are still frequently dug up in the adjacent fields; and near the summit of an eminence are vestiges of a mill, called Melin Milwyr, or the "Soldier's Mill." The rivers Cothy and Twrch unite in this parish. The principal seats are, Dôlcothy, the property and residence of John Johnes, Esq., an elegant mansion finely situated on the banks of the river Cothy, from which it takes its name; and Briu Nant, the seat of George Lloyd, Esq., a neat mansion occupying a pleasant situation a little higher up in the vale. Fairs are held here on May 30th, August 21st, and October 6th. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llan-sawel annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Cynwyl, is a spacious structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower; and, from its capacious dimensions, it has been conjectured that some monastic institution anciently existed here in connexion with it. There were anciently chapels of ease at Court y Cadno, in the north-eastern part of the parish, and at Pump Saint, of which there are no vestiges. There are two places of worship each for Baptists and Methodists, and one for Independents. A parochial school, in which from forty to fifty children are instructed gratuitously, and to the use of which a neat cottage in the churchyard is appropriated, is liberally supported by subscription. Morgan Price, in 1686, bequeathed a small rent-charge for the relief of the poor of this parish.

At a place called Pant y Polion stood two monumental stones, on one of which was the following inscription, communicated by Mr. Saunders, of Jesus' College, Oxford, to Bishop Gibson, and printed in the additions to Camden's Britannia:—Servator fidei, patriæque semper amator, Hic Paulinus jacet, cultor pientissimus æqui. This memorial is supposed to have been in honour of a warrior, who fell in a great battle which took place at Maes Llan Wrthwl, in this parish, between the Romans and the Britons, and was interred at this place. At Cwm Cothi there are some remains of ancient mines, now called Gogovau mines, supposed to have been worked by the Romans; and near them are vestiges of a stupendous Roman aqueduct, conducting the water of the river Cothy to the excavations in the mountain, in order to wash away the dross, according to the Roman method of separating the ore. Among the antiquities found in this parish are also two beautiful torques of gold, ploughed up on the estate of John Johnes, Esq., of Dôlcothy, in whose cabinet they are preserved: to one was attached the figure of a serpent, curiously wrought, and to the other that of a dolphin. In the same cabinet there is a beautiful amethyst, with a fine intaglio of the goddess Diana, found among some loose gravel, which had been raised for repairing the road. In 1762, no less than three thousand medals of copper, intrinsically of small value, were discovered here, among which were some of Gallienus, Salonina, and of several of the thirty tyrants; and in the neighbourhood of the mines various relics of antiquity are frequently found. On the road to Llandewy Brevi are the remains of a Roman causeway, called Sarn Helen, according to some writers, in honour of Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, who is represented as a native of Wales; but others are of opinion that it is a contraction of Sarn y Llent, or Lleon, the road of the Legion by which it was constructed. There are several tumuli in the vicinity, especially near Pont Rhôd Remus, or the bridge of Remus' ford. Near the mines is a spring of remarkably cold water, issuing from a rock, and formerly held in great estimation for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatic complaints; and near Briu Nant and Dôlcothy are two mineral springs, which, according to Mr. Rasp, the mineralogist, contain a far greater proportion of sulphur than those either of Brecknockshire or Radnorshire. At Pump Saint there is a chalybeate spring, held in considerable repute in the neighbourhood. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £578. 12.

CEIDIO (RHÔD-GEIDIO), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, comprising part of the market and post town of Llanerchymedd, and containing 316 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Ceidio, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the sixth century, and was the founder of several churches in the principality. It is intersected by the small river Alaw, and is of inconsiderable extent, containing only a small portion of enclosed and cultivated land: the surface is undulating, rising in some parts into considerable eminences; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the higher grounds afford some good prospects over the adjacent country. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llantrisant, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small edifice, supposed to have been built about the year 630, and is situated in a dreary spot on the high grounds above the Alaw. There are some trifling charitable donations and bequests, the produce of which is distributed among the poor; and five poor men from this parish are entitled to participate in the benefits of the almshouses at Beaumaris, founded by David Hughes, in 1609. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £82. 19.

CEIDIO, a parish in the hundred of DINLLAEN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W.

N.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 135 inhabitants. The soil on the higher grounds is sandy, and the lower grounds are composed chiefly of turbaries. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of T. P. Jones Parry, Esq. Previously to the above endowments, the minister's stipend was only £5 per annum, which small sum was the bequest of Owen Hughes, of Madryn, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Ceidio, and situated on an eminence, is a small neat building, kept in excellent repair. A singular custom of dispensing altogether with the appointment of churchwardens prevails in this parish. An average annual expenditure amounting to £82 is applied for the support of the poor.

CEIRCHIOG, a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S.E.) from Bôdedern, containing 168 inhabitants. The name of this parish is descriptive of the produce of the soil, which is well adapted to the culture of oats, of which great quantities are grown in the parish and in the adjacent district. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbeulan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to the Holy Rood, is a small neat edifice, situated on an eminence in a large field on the south side of the road from London to Holyhead. A rent-charge of £2. 10. was bequeathed by Sergeant Wynn, for the benefit of the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £74. 6.

CELLAN, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E.N.E.) from Lampeter, containing 465 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a mountainous district, on the banks of the river Teivy. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. 8½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel: it contains two piscinæ, and the font is supported on a square pillar, on which is carved the face of a male saint. There are places of worship for Independents and Presbyterians. This parish is remarkable for the number of intrenchments, kistvaens, carneddau, and monumental stones comprised within its limits. The Roman road leading from Loventium, now Llanio, to the station at Llanvair ar y brÿn, in Carmarthenshire, has been traced through it, from the banks of the Teivy to the mountains which form the line of boundary between that county and Cardiganshire. On a circular tumulus, surrounded by a moat, there is a stone, thirty-three feet in diameter, called Llêch Cynon, the burial-place of a person of that name, from whom a stream in the vicinity was called Frud Cynon. On the mountain to the north of this river are two kistvaens, called Beddau, signifying graves, and two others on the mountain to the south, one of which is called Bedd y Vorwyn, or the "Virgin's Grave:" they are all oblong, and consist each of four stones, placed in the centre of a small barrow, or sepulchre of earth and stones. Of the carneddau, the most conspicuous are two very large ones on a lofty mountain near the road leading from Llanvair to Llanycrwys: there is church or chapel attached to Llanbeulan.

Bettws-y-gr

also another, called Tair Carnau, all of them consisting of heaps of large stones, and supposed to be the graves of warriors. On the confines of the parish there is another stone, called Carreg tair croes, not sepulchral, but a boundary mark. There are also two very large stones on the mountain to the south of the river Frwd, which are supposed to have been placed there in commemoration of some great victory: one, called Byrvaen, fifteen feet in length, and four in width and thickness, now lies prostrate on the ground; but the other, called Hîr vaen Gwyddog, sixteen feet in height, is still standing. On another tumulus, surrounded by a moat, lies a very large stone, sixteen feet in length, called Maen y Prenvol, or Maen Prenvol Gwallt Gwyn; and near it, on the same tumulus, stands another, about eight feet high. There are also three intrenchments in this parish; one on the top of a hill, beneath which flows the river Frwd, called Gaer Morrice; another on the farm called Glanfrwd, which is exactly oval; and the third, which is circular and of a large size, between that farm and the parish of Pencarreg. The Rev. Moses Williams, F.R.S., who distinguished himself, as a Welsh scholar and antiquary, by the share which he took in the publication of Dr. Wotton's edition of the laws of Hywel Dda, was a native of this place: he also compiled a catalogue of books in the Bodleian library at Oxford, and wrote his own biography, which is now deposited in manuscript in that library, and at his death bequeathed his books and manuscripts, which were of considerable value, to the Earl of Macclesfield. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £124.19.

CELLYWYON (CELLIWION), a hamlet in the parish of LLANTRISSENT, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the town hamlet of Llantrissant. The population is returned with the parish. Coal is procured here, a part of which is exported to Ireland.

CEMMES (CEMMAES), a township in the parish of LLANBADRIG, hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Amlwch, containing 937 inhabitants. The parish church, which stands on a cliff near the sea, is situated in this township. Cemmaes creek forms a natural harbour, which at a small expense might be rendered much more convenient and useful: it affords a shipping-place for the exportation of the serpentine, or Mona marble, called by statuary "verd antique," which is quarried in the adjacent parish of Llanvechell, and for landing coal and other commodities of general consumption. This township formerly maintained its own poor; but it is now united for that purpose with the township of Clygyrog, these two constituting the parish, and being distinct for every other object.

CEMMES (CEMMAES), a parish in the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Machynlleth, containing 917 inhabitants. The name of this place signifies a circle, or amphitheatre for games. The village is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Dovey, and on the road from Welshpool to Machynlleth and Aberystwith, which, from a short distance north of it, runs parallel with the river for the remainder of its course. From Moel Eiddan there is a fine view of the vale of Cemmaes and Mallwyd, through which winds the Dovey, bounded by the extended bases and lofty summits of Cader Idris, Aran Mowddu, Plinlimmon, and other hills. About one-third of the parish consists of sheep-walks belonging to the adjoining landowners: peat for fuel is obtained within its limits. Fairs are held on May 1st, September 9th, and November 24th. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Tydecho, is in the early style of English architecture: the gallery is adorned with fine carvings of flowers, &c., in wood; in the churchyard there are four large yew trees. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A Welsh circulating school is at present (1831) situated at this place, for an account of which See DAROWEN; and it is in contemplation to establish a National school. There is a Sunday school in connexion with the church, in which about sixty children are instructed. A small plot of ground was bequeathed to the poor by Derwas Griffith, in 1669; the sum of £40 by Bridget Mostyn, in 1730; and £20 by Grace Pryse, in 1784. Upon the summit of Moel Eiddan are the remains of a Roman encampment; and in a turbary near it, a brazen celt, and a circular ornamented brooch of brass, about three inches in diameter, were found, in 1824, which are now in the possession of the Rev. Isaac Bonsall, rector of Llanwrin. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £474. 14.

CENOL (CANOL), a parcel in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL CWM-DŴ, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Crickhowel, containing 235 inhabitants. It forms the middle portion of the parish, as the name signifies, and is intersected by the small river Rhiangol, which is here crossed by a bridge: an ancient Roman road also formerly passed through it. There are a few agreeable residences scattered in different parts of this pleasing little vale. A certain portion of the tithes belongs to the Vicar of St. John's the Evangelist, in Brecknock, having been anciently granted to the prior and monks by Pycard, a Norman knight.

CERREGCEINWEN (CERYG-CEINWEN), a parish in the hundred of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Llangevni, on the road to Holyhead, containing 374 inhabitants. The land in this parish is almost wholly enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation; and the soil, though in some parts a rocky moorland, is tolerably productive. Here is a mansion called Hênblâs, pleasantly situated in the centre of some flourishing plantations. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llangrystiolys, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Ceinwen, is a small but neat edifice, appropriately fitted up. The Rev. Dr. Lewis, a native of this parish, bequeathed £12 per annum for the education of two poor boys, natives of this parish, and also several sums of money, as exhibitions for a limited term, for such young men of this county as should go to either of the universities: he was a great benefactor to the poor of the parish, and a principal contributor to the fund for the support of widows of deceased clergymen. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £161. 9.

CERRIG Y DRUIDION (CERYG Y DRUDION), a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Corwen, on the old Holyhead road, containing 1006 inhabitants. The name of this place signifies "the stones of the daring ones," and not "of the Druids," as some have interpreted it; and is in allusion to a vast heap of stones, which several persons now alive remember to have seen on the west side of the church, and minutely described in Bishop Gibson's additions to Camden's Britannia, in a communication by Mr. Llwyd, but now entirely dispersed: several of them have been used in constructing the stone fences of the adjacent fields; the largest has been removed to a considerable distance, and now serves as a gate-post, and the site has been broken up by the plough. Local tradition represents this collection of stones to have been the rude prison in which Cynvrig Rwth, a lawless chieftain, confined his captives: among them were some of a superior size, forming a kistvaen, or stone chest, but every vestige has been removed. The parish contains about twenty thousand acres, including a large tract of dreary mountain and moorland. The village, which is small, is situated on a gentle eminence, and was formerly a thoroughfare on the great Irish road, which, by a recent improvement in the route, has been diverted to a short distance from it, but still passes for several miles through the parish. The breeding of cattle and sheep, the digging of peat for fuel, the spinning of woollen yarn, and the knitting of stockings, form the principal occupations of the inhabitants. The neighbourhood abounds with good grazing land, a great portion of which is let by the proprietors to the Anglesey dealers, for the pasturage of cattle, on their way from that isle to the midland counties of England. A market was formerly held here on Friday, but it has fallen into disuse: fairs are held on March 14th, April 27th, August 24th, October 20th, and December 7th. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is a spacious structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a lofty chantry chapel adjoining the south side. There are three places of worship for Calvinistic and two for Wesleyan Methodists, two for Independents, and one for Baptists. An almshouse for six aged men was founded in 1716, by Robert Price, Esq., Chief Baron of the Exchequer in the reign of William III., who endowed it with property now producing an income of about £55 per annum. There are several charitable bequests, amounting in the whole to £64. 17., the interest of which is distributed among the poor, principally in white bread, which is here considered as a luxury, the inhabitants generally subsisting on oat cake or barley bread. The above-named Mr. Price, whose memorable speech in the House of Commons, against the grant of the lordship of Denbigh and other places in Wales to the Duke of Portland, drew upon him the especial notice of his sovereign, was born at Giler, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £385. 3.

CEULAN, a joint township with Maesmawr, in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL GENEU'R GLYN, upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E.) from Aberyst- with, containing, with Maesmawr, 607 inhabitants. It appears to derive its name from the rivers Ceulan and Maesmor, the former of which runs through the township, and joins the river Lery within a short distance, and the latter runs along the northern extremity of it: the road from Aberystwith to Machynlleth crosses at the point of junction of the Ceulan and the Lery, where the small but neat village of Tâl y bont is situated. At this place the partial views of the ocean, on one side, and on the other the stream tumbling over the rocky precipices, in picturesque cascades, overhung with a great variety of trees and shrubs, are peculiarly enlivening. An ancient seat, belonging to the family of Price, stands here between the right bank of the Ceulan and the high road, within the grounds of which are some fine full-grown fir trees. On a mountain in this neighbourhood, called Pen Sarn Ddû, is situated that ancient monument termed Gwely Taliesin, or Taliesin's Bed, a more particular description of which is given under the head of the parish. This township is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £154. 3.

CEVN, a township in the parish of KILKEN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Mold, containing 298 inhabitants. It occupies a lofty mountain, as the name implies, on the left bank of the river Alyn: the road from Hawarden to Denbigh passes along the northern side of it.

CEVN, a hamlet in the parish of GELLYGAER, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 526 inhabitants. It is partly situated on the declivity of the lofty mountain from which the parish takes its name, and the Bargoed Taf passes through it. There are several neat residences in different parts of the township, some of which are ornamented with plantations, though other portions are bleak and barren.

CEVN-LLÛS, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES.—See KEVENLLEECE.

CEVNPAWL, a joint township with Gollon, forming that part of the parish of ABBEY CWM Hîr which is in the hundred of KEVENLLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E. by N.) from Rhaiadr, containing, exclusively of Gollon, 117 inhabitants. It is situated on the left bank of the Clywedog brook, which falls into the river Ithon, in a fertile, pleasant, and well-wooded valley, near the ruins of the abbey of Cwm Hîr. One of the most perfect carneddau in the county, consisting of about thirty or forty cart-loads of stones, thrown loosely together, with a hollow in the centre, is observable on a hill, a short distance south-west of this place. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £233. 18.

CEVNPENNAR (CEVN-PENNAR), a hamlet in the parish of ABERDARE, within the limits of the borough of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (E. S. E.) from Aberdare. The population is returned with the parish. This hamlet, which is well wooded, is situated on the western declivity of the Twyn-Mawr mountain. The Aberdare canal passes close to, and parallel with, the river Cynon, in the lower part of it.

CHAPEL-ILTERNE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See LLANILTERNE.

CHERITON, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (W.) from Swansea, containing 242 inhabitants. This place, according to some, derived its name from the quantity of cherries abounding in the neighbourhood, and which formerly grew wild in the hedges. The village is agreeably situated near the confluence of the small river Burry with the Loughor, and is neat and of pleasing appearance. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 7. 3½, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Catwg, is a small but venerable edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, between which rises a square embattled tower: the churchyard is bounded on one side by the Burry, which, falling into the Loughor, gives its name to that river from its influx to Loughor Ferry. There are some trifling remains of Boville, or Bove-hill castle, a small building, of which little more than the name is known. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £31. 16.

CHERITON, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES.—See STACKPOLE-ELIDOR.

CHIRK, a parish in the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Oswestry, on the road from London to Holyhead and Dublin, containing 1598 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north by the river Dee, and on the south by the Ceiriog, which unite on its eastern side. It lies at the foot of the Berwyn range of mountains, which skirt it on the west, and its surface is somewhat uneven, rising from the village to an eminence on which the castle is situated, on the western side, with the Berwyns beyond, and on the eastern to another elevation, from the brow of which there is a delightful prospect of the plain of Salop, on the one side, and on the other a nearer view of part of the Vale of Llangollen, including the celebrated Pont y Cyssyltau aqueduct, which conveys the Ellesmere canal over the valley of the Dee, with the meanderings of that river between its wood-fringed banks towards the grounds of Wynnstay: this hill also embraces a complete view of Chirk castle, towering on its elevated site, and the princely grounds that surround it, which, adorned with noble plantations, and interspersed with clumps of trees tastefully arranged along the side of the mountain, combine to present, with the picturesque village of the Cevn and the woody scenery of Newbridge and Nant y Bele, on the right, and the beautiful grounds of Brynkinalt and the village of Chirk on the left, and various intermediate objects of picturesque beauty, a home view highly diversified, cheerful, and rich. The village is pleasantly situated on the northern bank of the river Ceiriog, which, flowing through a small vale of great beauty, here separates the counties of Denbigh and Salop, and consequently Wales and England: it is exceedingly clean and neat, and contains some highly respectable houses and several substantial and well-built cottages, having been greatly improved within the last few years by Mrs. Myddelton Biddulph, who, on coming into possession of the Chirk castle estate, pulled down several dilapidated buildings, and erected others of modest and uniform appearance for her tenants, on more eligible sites. The Holyhead road, on both sides of the village, has been widened and altered within the last few years, so as to avoid the inequalities and windings in its course. Chirk hill, which was previously very abrupt, has been partially levelled, and the road conducted more circuitously across the vale by means of an embankment. On the north side of the village also its course has been diverted, and embankments raised and excavations made along its line; but these improvements, though greatly conducive to the convenience of passengers, have probably lessened the picturesque character of the route. There is a valuable mine of coal in the parish, which is worked on an extensive scale at Black Park, by Mr. T. E. Ward, who holds it on lease from the owner of the Chirk castle estate, and employs here about three hundred workmen: the pits are two hundred and fourteen yards deep, and the annual sale exceeds fifty thousand tons: a rail-road has been formed from them to the Ellesmere canal, where there is a wharf for loading barges. At the Vron, in this parish, and on the banks of the canal, are extensive lime-works, belonging to this estate, affording employment to about one hundred persons. Pont y Blew forge, in the township of Halton, and on the river Ceiriog, was erected in 1710, for making charcoal iron, and was enlarged in 1795, when the manufacture of puddled iron was introduced: about twenty tons are now made weekly, and about twenty persons employed. The Ellesmere canal enters this parish from Shropshire, and is conveyed across the vale of Chirk and the river Ceiriog by means of an aqueduct two hundred and thirty-two yards long, consisting of ten arches, the piers of which are sixty-five feet high, and then immediately enters a tunnel, two hundred and twenty yards long. On emerging from this, it proceeds in its course through the parish, and then enters another tunnel, soon after which it is carried over the vale of the Dee by the stupendous aqueduct of Pont y Cyssyltau. Fairs are held at the village on February 10th, June 10th, August 12th, and November 12th, for the sale of live stock and pedlery; and a court leet for the manor takes place annually.

About one mile and a half to the west of the village is Chirk Castle, proudly situated on an eminence backed by the Berwyn mountains: it is a venerable quadrangular embattled structure, defended by a low massive tower at each corner, and another in the centre of the north front, where is the principal entrance, under an arched gateway guarded by a portcullis, into a square area of considerable dimensions, round which the various apartments are ranged: on the east side of this area extends a low embattled corridor, leading into the principal apartments, which have been greatly altered, modernized, and embellished by Mrs. Biddulph, within the last few years, but the old entrance to the hall is by a flight of steps on the north side of the area: the picture gallery, at the south end of which is the chapel, is one hundred feet in length, by twenty-two in width, and contains several good portraits and other paintings. The park is extensive, and is disposed with picturesque effect, the inequalities of its surface, and the declivity of the hill extending behind it and toward the north, having afforded a favourable scope for the arrangement of the trees and plantations; and a new road leading to the castle, in a winding direction through it, so as to embrace a view of much interesting scenery in the valley of the Ceiriog, and avoid a steep hill, has been formed of late, in lieu of that which formerly led from the village. Near New Hall, which is described as an old seat of the Myddeltons, rebuilt many years ago as a farm-house, and surrounded by a moat, at the entrance into the park from Llangollen and Wrexham, stands a pair of iron gates of the richest and most delicate and exquisite workmanship, designed and executed by a common blacksmith, which anciently stood immediately in front of the castle. The summit of the castle embraces a very wide prospect of great beauty and magnificence, offering to the naked eye, on a clear day, as it is said, an uninterrupted view into seventeen different counties. The river Ceiriog runs on the west and south sides of the castle, through a deep and picturesque valley, remarkable in history as the scene of a sanguinary conflict, in 1165, between part of the forces of Henry II. and the Welsh, under their brave prince, Owain Gwynedd. Henry, with a view to the conquest of Wales, collected an army at Oswestry, whilst the Welsh prince mustered his forces at Corwen, and, being eager to decide the struggle, the English monarch hastened to meet the enemy, but was interrupted in this valley by almost impenetrable woods, which he commanded his men to cut down, in order to secure himself from ambush, posting the pikemen and flower of his army to protect those at work. Whilst thus engaged, the Welsh fell upon the English with the most indignant fury, and a violent and bloody battle ensued, which ended in the former retiring again to Corwen, and so reduced the strength of Henry, that, harassed by the activity of Owain, who cut off his supplies, he was compelled to fall back into the English territory, and relinquish his design. This decisive encounter, in which numbers of brave men were slain on both sides, is called the battle of Crogen, and the place where it was fought Adwy'r Beddau, "the pass of the graves." The exact period of the erection of Chirk Castle is uncertain. John Myddelton, Esq., in a communication to the Society of Antiquaries, in 1729, says,—"That it was begun 1011, and finished 1013: the repair of one of the wings, in Cromwell's time, cost £28,000. The front is two hundred and fifty feet long, the court one hundred and sixty-five by one hundred, and five round towers fifty feet in diameter. Adam's tower, eighty feet high, the wall near the dungeon nine feet deep, and the dungeon as deep as the walls of the castle are high." But, though the description applies to the present structure, the period is more probably that of the erection of a prior edifice, called Castell Crogen; since both Bishop Gibson, in his additions to Camden, and Mr. Pennant, ascribe it to Roger Mortimer, in the reign of Edward I. Mortimer, on the death of Gruffydd ab Madoc, lord of Dinas Brân, on which lordship the territory around Castell Crogen, called Trêv y Waun, was dependent, was appointed by Edward I. guardian of Llewelyn, one of Gruffydd's sons, the other, named Madoc, having been entrusted to John Earl Warren; these noblemen are stated, after having given orders for putting the youths to death, to have seized upon their possessions, Mortimer taking the lordships of Chirk and Nanheudwy, and Earl Warren those of Bromfield and Yale. John, the grandson of Roger, sold the lordship of Chirk to Richard Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel, whose descendants possessed it for three generations, when it was conveyed by marriage to Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, on whose disgrace and exile, in 1397, it was forfeited to the crown, and soon after granted to William Beauchamp, lord of Abergavenny, who had married the other heiress of the Fitz-Alans; his granddaughter, sole heiress of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester, having been married to Edward Neville, afterwards Lord Abergavenny, in the reign of Henry VI., it became the property of that family. It came afterwards to the Stanleys, and at length to the crown, and was conferred by Queen Elizabeth on her favourite, Dudley, Earl of Leicester, at whose death it passed to Lord St. John of Bletso, and was sold by his son, in 1595, to Sir Thomas Myddelton, Knt., who served the office of lord mayor of London, in 1614, and to whose descendants it has ever since belonged, having, on the decease of the late Richard Myddelton, Esq., who died unmarried in 1796, been divided among his three sisters and coheiresses, of whom the present Mrs. Myddelton Biddulph, after a protracted suit in Chancery, succeeded to that portion on which the castle and village are situated, which are now in the possession of her son, Robert M. Biddulph, Esq. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, Sir Thomas Myddelton, son of the purchaser of the estate, having espoused the cause of the parliament, orders were issued by Charles I. to Col. Robert Ellyce, to take possession of the castle, and apply the money and plate found in it to the payment of his regiment, and then deliver it up to Sir Thomas Hanmer, who was appointed governor. Its owner for some time exerted himself with great zeal for the parliament, but being disgusted at the events of the war, he revolted, and, in 1659, joined Sir George Booth, in attempting to restore the ancient constitution. Sir George, however, having been defeated by Gen. Lambert, Sir Thomas was obliged to seek refuge in his castle, which was besieged by Lambert, to whom, after a defence of two or three days, in which the western side and three of its towers were demolished, it was surrendered, the conqueror having, as it is said, plundered the estate to the amount of £80,000: the injury sustained by the castle in this siege was soon after repaired by Sir Thomas Myddelton, in the course of one year. The lordship of Chirk, otherwise "Chirkland," includes the parishes of Chirk, Llangollen, and Llan-santfraed-Glynn-Ceriog. On the eastern side of the parish is the mansion of Brÿnkinalt, the property and residence of Arthur Viscount Dungannon, to whom it has descended, in the female line, from the Trevors, whose great ancestor, Ednyved Gam, was a descendant of Tudor Trevor. It was built in 1619, from a design by Inigo Jones, but has been enlarged and embellished, in the later style of English architecture, by the present noble owner. It occupies a low retired situation on the western bank of the Ceiriog, and the grounds, though not very extensive, are well adorned with full-grown trees and thriving plantations, enriched with the meanderings of the river, and disposed with great taste and beauty, so as to form a charming sequestered retreat. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 5½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome edifice, with a square tower containing a ring of bells: it has recently been renovated and embellished, in the later style of English architecture, by subscription among the parishioners, and has received an addition of one hundred and seventy-three sittings, of which one hundred and thirty-three are free, the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels having granted £100 for that purpose: it contains divers marble effigies of the Myddeltons of Chirk castle, mostly ill executed, with the exception of a bust of Sir Thomas Myddelton, the active parliamentary commander, represented with a peaked beard, long hair, and armed, near which is another of his lady, of the family of Napier of Luton. Here was interred Dr. Walter Balcanqual, a Scottish divine of some note, who represented his country at the famous synod of Dort, in 1618, and was successively raised to the deaneries of Rochester and Durham. Having, in consequence of his loyalty, rendered himself obnoxious to his countrymen, he was, in 1645, obliged to seek an asylum at Chirk castle, where he died on Christmas-day ensuing, and a small mural tablet was erected to his memory by Sir Thomas Myddelton, at whose request an elegant epitaph was composed for him by Dr. Pearson, then Bishop of Chester. A school for instructing poor children on the National plan was founded in the village by Mrs. Myddelton Biddulph, in 1824; the master, in addition to small weekly payments from the scholars, receives the interest of £20 left by Mrs. Mary Bennett, of £20 by an unknown benefactor, and of £5 by Major Chas. Myddelton. In 1698, Mrs. Catherine Trevor bequeathed an estate in the parish of Llantysillio, and another in the parish of Llanrhaiadr, to the churchwardens and overseers of "Cherque," the rental of which, amounting to £84 per annum, is annually on St. Thomas' day distributed among the poor, according to the will of the testatrix. Offa's Dyke, after crossing the river Ceriog, enters this parish and passes through Chirk Castle park, where it is plainly visible, and soon afterwards crosses the Dee. In a garden immediately on the right of the entrance into the village from Oswestry, on the verge of the vale, is an artificial mound of earth, opposite to which, on the other side of the road, there was another, which Mr. Pennant supposes to have been constructed by the Saxons, at the period of the formation of Offa's Dyke, as exploratory camps, and also to command the pass through the valley. Black Park is said to have been anciently an enclosed park, noted for its deer, but it has for ages been disparked, and there are now no vestiges of its appropriation to this purpose, except in the name. This is one of eleven parishes incorporated by act of parliament, passed in 1791, for the joint maintenance of their poor in the House of Industry at Oswestry: the average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £260. 16.

CHRISTYONYDD (CRISTIONYDD), a township in the parish of RUABON, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Ruabon, containing, with the township of Dynhylla Uchâv, 3566 inhabitants. It is situated in the western and more elevated portion of the parish, where there are some extensive and valuable mines of coal, in which the principal portion of the population is employed.

CHURCHSTOKE, a parish partly in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, and partly in that of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, and comprising the township of Brompton with Riston (which supports its poor separately from the rest of the parish), in the hundred of CHIRBURY, county of SALOP, ENGLAND, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Montgomery, on the road from Welshpool, through Chirbury, to Bishop's Castle, and containing 1453 inhabitants. The village is situated near the confluence of the rivers Camlet and Ceibutrach, the former of which, after passing through the romantic dingle of Marrington, falls into the Severn near Forden. From the flatness of the ground above it, and the contracted channel of the Camlet, the adjacent meadows are subject to inundation, and during the winter have been frequently entirely covered with water. From some of the high grounds are fine views, extending over the vales of Churchstoke and Montgomery, with the surrounding hills, and comprehending a rich variety of pleasingly diversified scenery. Considerable quantities of lead-ore have been found in the parish, and on the Churchstoke hills are evident traces of mines, which are supposed to have been worked by the Romans. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with a rent-charge of £20 per annum and £600 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Warden of Clun Hospital. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and formerly dependent on the priory of Chirbury, is a plain neat edifice, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a spire: the body was taken down and rebuilt, at an expense of £2500, in 1815, previously to which the porch and other parts of the ancient structure exhibited indications of the damage it sustained from an attack during the parliamentary war, by the men of Montgomery castle, in order to seize a party of royalists, commanded by Sir John Watts, which had taken refuge in the church, and which, after an obstinate resistance, was obliged to surrender. A parochial and Sunday school, in which about eighty children are instructed, is supported partly by subscription, and partly by endowment arising from some small bequests. On the summit of a prominent rock, in the vale of Churchstoke, are the remains of Symond's Castle, an ancient fortification; and on Llanvawr hill, a craggy and precipitous eminence, are the remains of an ancient encampment, the origin of which has not been ascertained. On Churchstoke hill are vestiges of a Roman camp, and on the declivity called Todleth are the remains of old walls, and a piece of water called the Church pool, probably belonging to some religious house, near the site of which, according to an absurd popular tradition, the church was originally to have been erected. There are remains of British encampments on the Aldres farm, and at Galet y din, or Calton, in this parish, in which also is included a part of Corndon hill. Near Offa's Dyke, which passes through the parish, are several tumuli, one of which was opened within the last few years: the bottom, which was sunk about a foot below the level of the surrounding land, was paved, and the sides were formed with flag-stones, on one of which was an inscription, very much obliterated; within was only some black dust, among which was discovered a small coin, with a legend quite unintelligible. At a place on Offa's Dyke, called the Three Jacks, a coin of Agricola was found, about twelve years since. Churchstoke is one of those parishes incorporated for the support of their poor in the house of industry at Forden: the average annual expenditure amounts to £481. 14., exclusively of Brompton with Riston, for which the average assessment is £82 annually.

CILIAU-AËRON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (N. W.) from Lampeter, containing 344 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Aëron, by which it is bounded on the north-east, and from which it derives the adjunct to its name. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. A Sunday school, which is gratuitously superintended, affords the means of instruction to the poor children of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £62. 19.

CILMACHALLT, a township in the parish and upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish. The manufacture of flannel is carried on in this township, and affords employment to the greater portion of the inhabitants. It surrounds the town of Llanidloes on the north, east, and south, and a large portion is included within the limits of the new borough.

CILMARGH (CÎL Y MARCH), a joint hamlet with Iscoed, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (S. by W.) from Carmarthen, containing, with Iscoed, 162 inhabitants. It is situated close to the left bank of the river Towy, near its mouth, and contains a few respectable residences, standing on the gentle elevations within view of that river.

CILVAWR (CÎL-FAWR), a chapelry in the parish of MANER-DIVY, hundred of KÎLGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Cardigan. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated near the right bank of a small stream, which falls into the river Teivy at Castle Maelgwn. The tithes are the property of W. O. Brigstocke, Esq., of Blaenpant. The chapel has fallen into ruins.

CLARACH, a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Aberystwith, on the road from that town to Machynlleth, containing 290 inhabitants. The river Clarach, which gives name to the township, flows through a pleasing vale here, and falls into the bay of Cardigan, where the shore expands into a fine sandy beach, and the water is extremely shallow at ebb tide. From the northern part an extensive bank of sand, called Sarn Gynvelyn, stretches in a south-western direction for several miles into the bay of Cardigan, terminated by sunken rocks, and with only two fathoms of water on its surface at ebb tide. This township separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £68. 5.

CLARBESTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDDEY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6½ miles (N. W.) from Narberth, containing 218 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. H. Scourfield, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. The rates in this parish are levied on the ploughlands, each of which contains one hundred statute acres. An average annual expenditure of £54. 14. is applied to the support of the poor.

CLÂS (HIGHER), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Swansea, containing 531 inhabitants. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor: the average annual expenditure is £215. 18.

CLÂS (LOWER), a hamlet in the parish of LLANGYVELACH, partly within the new limits of the borough of SWANSEA, and partly in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Swansea, containing 4251 inhabitants, the population having increased more than seventy-five per cent. since the census of 1821. Morriston, a considerable and thriving village, with a large population employed in the copper-works, is situated in this hamlet, but is described under its appropriate head. The Swansea canal, part of which, called Morris' canal, was constructed at the expense of the Duke of Beaufort, who receives the tolls, passes close to the village, between it and the Tawy, and hence pursues its course through the rest of the hamlet, both that river and the canal being crossed by bridges on the road leading to the town of Neath. The bridge over the Tawy, called Wych Tree Bridge, from a tree of that description which grew near its eastern end, is admired for its lightness and elegance: it consists of one arch, ninety feet in the span, with cylindrical holes in the abutments, and was executed by Mr. Edwards, the celebrated architect of Pont y Pridd. Clasemont, late the seat of Sir John Morris, situated within a short distance north-west of the village, has been recently taken down. There are, however, numerous other respectable residences scattered over the hamlet, which is in general well wooded, and presents many agreeable rides and walks, especially along the banks of the canal and the vale of the Tawy. Coal is found here in abundance. This hamlet is assessed separately for the maintenance of its poor: the average annual expenditure is £344. 4.

CLÂS-GARMON, a township in the parish of St. HARMON, hundred of RHAIDR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Rhaiadr, containing, with the township of Bwnneiaid, 428 inhabitants. It forms the north-western portion of the parish, which borders on Montgomeryshire. Two roads from Rhaiadr to Llanidloes pass through it, one along the left bank of the Wye, and the other, the more direct, after crossing the Mertyd brook, through the mountainous part of it. Clâs hill is an extensive and bleak elevation in this township, chiefly appropriated in depasturing sheep.

CLAWDDMADOC (CLAWDD-MA-DOG), a hamlet in the parish of LLANWRTYD, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (W. by N.) from Builth, containing 299 inhabitants. It occupies a romantic and highly picturesque situation in the upper division of the parish, and is environed on two sides by lofty mountains: the small stream of the Cammarch, which falls into the Irvon, has its source in the vicinity. Here is a free school, endowed with about £12 per annum, in 1783, by Margaret Jones, who also devised about £15 per annum for clothing the poor. This hamlet is separately assessed for the support of its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £72. 5.

CLEAR'S, ST. (ST. CLARE'S), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, on the road from Carmarthen to Haverfordwest, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Carmarthen, containing 1083 inhabitants. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, is supposed to have derived its name from a pious lady, named Clara, who founded a church here in the fifth or sixth century, and, after being canonized, became its tutelary saint. Some, however, are of opinion that it owes its name to the assembly of the Welsh bards, which used to be held here, called in the Welsh language Clair, pointing out, in support of this hypothesis, a lofty tumulus as the place of meeting. Soon after the Norman invasion of this portion of the principality, a castle was erected here by some of the conquerors, the ruins of which are noticed by Leland, who wrote in the time of Henry VIII., but have since entirely disappeared. It is frequently mentioned in the Welsh annals, and was taken and partially demolished by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, in the year 1215: it afterwards shared the fate of nearly all the Welsh fortresses, until the struggle between the natives and the Norman settlers was decided by the conquest of Wales by Edward I. A small Cluniac priory, for a prior and two monks, was founded here before 1291, as a cell to the monastery of St. Martin de Campis at Paris, which was dissolved with the other Alien priories, in the reign of Henry V., and its possessions were given by Henry VI. to the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford, to whom, together with two-thirds of the tithes of the parish, they still belong.

The town is situated at the confluence of the Guinnyng with the Tâf, which discharge their united waters into the bay of Carmarthen, at the small town of Laugharne, a few miles to the south, and consists of one straggling street, nearly a mile in length, neither lighted nor paved, but well supplied with water, and containing many good dwelling-houses: several respectable shops are at present in progress of erection; the old houses are undergoing renovation, and other improvements are being made. The surrounding district is highly productive of corn and butter, which are here shipped for Bristol, Cardiff, Bridg-water, Southampton, and other ports; this trade at present affording constant employment to two vessels of fifty-five tons' burden each: there are also eight small craft, each of about twenty-five tons' burden, engaged in the coal, culm, and limestone trades between this place and Milford Haven; and there is a limited export trade in cheese and bark. During the year 1830, four thousand five hundred quarters of grain, and about one hundred tons of butter, were shipped from this small port, which is a creek within the limits of the port of Llanelly. A new quay, one hundred and fifty yards in extent, has recently been completed, which will afford increased facility for loading and unloading. St. Clear's is commonly reputed a market town; but it has no market for the sale of provisions, &c.; Tuesdays and Fridays being here called the market-days, in consequence of the opening of the merchants' stores on those days, for the reception of the staple commodities of the vicinity. It was formerly a borough of some note, and had its courts of session, and its gaol, the latter of which was standing about fifty years ago. A portreeve, recorder, two common attorneys, and a cryer of the court, are regularly appointed, but no court is held, except that of petty session by the county magistrates, once a month. The freedom is acquired by birth for all the children of burgesses, and is also obtained by election.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 1., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of J. Lewes Philipps, Esq. The church, which is situated on the bank of the Guinnyng, is an edifice of considerable antiquity. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one each for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. A school, in which about sixty children of both sexes are instructed, is supported by subscription; and there is a donation of £8 per annum to a schoolmaster, for educating a limited number of children, by Lady Mary Osburne, of Pencoed, in this parish, who also gave, by deed in 1719, lands now producing £15 per annum, for distribution among the poor. The tumulus mentioned as being considered the place of meeting of the bards is now called Banc y Bailey, and is stated also to have been the site of the castle; but it appears to be too small to have been occupied by the whole of that edifice, and is probably only the mount on which the keep stood. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £268. 16.

CLICIEDIG, a joint township with Prion, in the parish of LLANRHAIDR IN KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is divided into Clievedig Isâv and Clievedig Uchâv.

CLITTERWOOD, a township in the parish of BUTTINGTON, within the jurisdiction of the borough of WELSHPOOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Welshpool, containing 260 inhabitants. This is one of eighteen parishes and townships incorporated for the maintenance of their poor in the house of industry at Forden: the average annual expenditure for this township is £70. 11.

CLOCAENOG, a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Ruthin, comprising the Lower and Upper divisions, and containing 461 inhabitants, of which number, 128 are in the Lower, and 333 in the Upper, division. This parish is situated in a mountainous district, and the village is almost surrounded by unproductive and widely extended heaths: in the vicinity are some excellent quarries of stone, among which is that peculiar kind used for hones. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the consistory court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Trillo, is a small neat edifice, with a fine east window. A parochial school has been erected by Lord Bagot, and is principally supported by his lordship and the rector of the parish: about sixty children receive gratuitous instruction in it. There are several benefactions in land for charitable purposes, the rental of which, amounting to £52. 12. per annum, is distributed among the poor. In the township of Maesttyddin is a large tumulus, on the summit of which was an upright stone, upon which was inscribed, in Saxon characters, Aemilini Tavisac: the stone has been removed from its original situation, and is now in Pool Park. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure of £435. 13.

CLOIGIN, a lordship, or extra-parochial district, locally in the parish of Llandeveylog, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with Llandeveylog. The road from Carmarthen to Pont ar Dulas, and that to Llanelly, pass through this place. An ancient chapel stood here about forty years since, in which only marriages were solemnized; but it has been entirely pulled down, and the materials removed for private use, the foundations alone remaining. A spring of clear water, called Pistyll Gwynn, was formerly much resorted to for healing sore eyes, but it has fallen into neglect.

CLUYACH, a hamlet in the parish of YSTRADDYVODOG, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.) from Llantrissant. The population is returned with Ystraddyvodog-Horne. The name signifies a sheltered glade, which is descriptive of the situation of this township among the mountains by which it is surrounded.

CLYDEY (CLYDAI), a parish in the hundred of KILGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1385 inhabitants. This parish constitutes the endowment of a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, which is rated in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the Bishop. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Clydai, is a plain substantial structure, with a massive square tower. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Fairs are held at Hênveddau, in this parish, on May 13th, September 17th, and October 30th. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £290. 8.

CLYGYROG (CLEGYROG), a township in the parish of LLANBADRIG, hundred of TÂL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Amlwch, containing 427 inhabitants. This township, the name of which signifies rocky, or stony, as descriptive of the general character of the district, and that of Cemmes constitute the whole of the parish, and were formerly assessed separately for the support of their poor, but are now united for that object, though distinct for every other purpose.

CLYNE (GLYN), a hamlet in the parish of LAN-TWIT juxta NEATH, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. E. by E.) from Neath, containing 129 inhabitants. It is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £76. 10.

CLYNNOG (CELYNNOG), a parish in the hundred of UCHGORVAI, Arvon division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (S. S. W.) from Carnarvon, on the road from that town to Pwllheli, containing 1731 inhabitants. This extensive parish is situated on the shore of St. George's channel: the village stands on a plain, at the base of Gyrn Gôch mountain, and is distinguished as having been the residence of St. Beuno, who built a church here, near his cell, which was afterwards made collegiate, and, at the time of the Lincoln Taxation, in the year 1291, had an establishment consisting of five portionists, or prebendaries, which continued until the general dissolution, and was endowed with extensive possessions, assigned by divers native princes and wealthy individuals, among which was the township of Clynnog, which is held freely under it at the present time. St. Beuno is also said to have founded a monastery here, which, however, more probably owed its origin, in 616, to Gwethaint, or Gwyddaint, one of his disciples: it was situated at a place called Monachdŷ Gwyn, about two miles south-eastward from the church, and, having fallen into decay, after its first inmates were dispersed, was restored for the reception of Carmelites, or White friars, and called Monachdŷ Clynnog Bâch, to distinguish it from Clynnog-Vawr, the township given as part of the endowment of the church. This society was probably of no long duration, but it is not known at what period it was suppressed, nor has any thing further been ascertained regarding the history of the establishment. According to tradition, the original church, founded by Beuno, was destroyed by fire in 976; and a book concerning it, called Tiboeth, written by St. Twrog, and mentioned so late as the reign of Henry VIII., is said to have been preserved. The mountains Gyrn Gôch and Gyrn ddû here form the extremity of a long ridge, stretching obliquely from Snowdon, and terminating at a short distance from the sea. Copper-ore and manganese exist among the mountains in various parts of the parish, but no spirited efforts have yet been made for working the mines. Fairs are held on May 6th and November 6th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor: the rectory, which is rated at £24, is a sinecure, annexed to the headship of Jesus' College, Oxford, the principal of which receives two-thirds of the great tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is a large cruciform edifice, built in the time of Henry VII., in the later style of English architecture, and consisting of a nave, chancel, and north and south transepts, with a lofty square tower at the west end. On the south side, and communicating with the church by a narrow passage, is a large building, called Eglwys Beuno, in which the remains of the founder were interred: it is now used as a school-room, in which about fifty children are gratuitously instructed by subscription. St. Beuno, who was uncle to St. Winifred, whom he took under his protection, and is fabled to have re-united her head to her body, on its being struck off by Cradocus, son of King Alen, on which, through his intercession, the virgin was restored to life, had his shrine at this place, which was held in great veneration, even until within the last seventy years, for the miracles reputed to have been performed at it: a plain altar-tomb, the monument of the saint, stood in the middle of the building, called Eglwys Beuno, or St. Beuno's chapel, which it was customary for the superstitious to cover with rushes, and place thereon sick children, or other diseased persons, after subjecting them to ablution in a neighbouring holy well, convinced that, after passing a whole night on his tomb, the patient would be restored to health by the miraculous interposition of the saint. In the east window of the church are some fragments of stained glass, and the date MDLXXXIV; and there are some interesting monuments of the families of Glynne and Twisselton, among which is a neat monument to the memory of Colonel Twisselton, an active officer during the parliamentary war, who defeated and made prisoner Sir John Owen, near Llandegai, in 1648. Both the church and chapel of St. Beuno are in a state of considerable dilapidation, from the loss of the funds with which they were formerly kept in repair. Until towards the close of the last century a custom prevailed of offering, in aid of the repairs of the church, or for the relief of the poor, calves and lambs born with the Nód Beuno, or mark of St. Beuno, a certain natural mark in the ear, which were brought to the church on Trinity Sunday, the festival of the saint, and delivered to the churchwardens, who, having sold them, put the money into a large chest, called Cyf St. Beuno, made of one piece of oak, and secured by three locks, still preserved in the church, which, in allusion to its strength, gave rise to a local phrase applicable to any difficult undertaking that was intended. There are four places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists and one for Baptists within the limits of the parish. Several small charitable donations have been made by different benefactors, the interest of which is divided among the poor annually at Christmas. In a field at Bâchwen is a very large cromlech, and near it an upright stone, about nine feet high. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £499. 15.

CLYRO (CLAERWY), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N.W.) from Hay, containing 933 inhabitants. This parish, which is nearly four miles in breadth, extends for about seven miles along the banks of the river Wye, which separates it from the county of Brecknock, and borders also upon the county of Hereford, from which it is separated only by a narrow brook: the road from Brecknock, by way of Glâsbury bridge, to Kington in Herefordshire passes through the village. Some vestiges of an ancient castle are discernible, the history of which is altogether unknown; and a monastery was founded here, at a very early period, of which there are at present no remains, the only memorial of it being retained in the name of some lands, which probably belonged to it, and which, from that circumstance, were called "Tir y Myneich." There are several neat villas within the parish, two of which are the property of Thomas Baskerville Mynors Baskerville, Esq., and one, called Cabalva, the seat of William Davies, Esq. This parish constitutes the endowment of a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Bettws-Clyro annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a tower, which, having been partly demolished, is covered with a shelving roof: the font is of considerable size, and there is a large piscina at the entrance, which formerly contained the holy water. The chancel was rebuilt in 1823, as appears by an inscription on a tablet over the door, by the Venerable Archdeacon Beynon, prebendary of Brecknock: it contains two neat marble tablets, one to the memory of the Rev. Edward Edwards, prebendary of Llanvaes, and vicar of Clyro, and the other to that of Sophia, only daughter of William Davies, Esq., of Cabalva: in the church also there is an elegant mural monument of white marble, ornamented with a female figure in relief, bending over an urn, to the memory of Elizabeth Williams, of Bronith Cottage. The chapel of Bettws-Clyro is about two miles distant from the parish church. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists near the village. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is held in a room built by the voluntary contributions of the inhabitants, and is partly supported by an annual donation of £15, paid out of the poor's rate. Mrs. Gwynne, about the year 1773, bequeathed £600, the interest of which was to be applied in paying a schoolmaster to teach poor children of this parish, and also for clothing and apprenticing them; but this charity is not now available to the purposes intended by the benevolent donor. Here is a mineral spring, the water of which is regarded as efficacious in the cure of diseases of the eye. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £378. 6.

CNWCLAS, a borough partly in the parish of BEGUILDY, but chiefly in that of HEYOR, of which latter it constitutes a division, in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.W. by W.) from Knighton. The population is returned with the respective parishes. This place is pleasantly situated near the right bank of the Teme, which here separates Radnorshire from Shropshire, and had formerly a castle, originally built by Ralph Mortimer, about the year 1242, on the summit of a conical artificial mound. The village consists of about a dozen cottages, situated not very close to each other: the manor belongs to the crown. There is a considerable extent of pasture land in the vicinity, especially near the river Teme, the cattle fed on which are principally taken to the market at Knighton, and to Bishop's Castle in Shropshire. The borough is under the superintendence of a bailiff and burgesses, the latter of whom are made by a presentation of a jury of burgesses, selected by the steward of the manor. Jointly with Kevenleece, Knighton, Rhaiadr, and (by the late act for amending the representation of the people) Presteign, it contributes, with Radnor, to return a representative to parliament: the right of voting was formerly vested in the burgesses at large, many of whom are resident within seven miles of the borough, but is now, by the late act, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs; the number of tenements valued at ten pounds a year and upwards, within the limits of the borough, which were not altered by the late boundary act, is seventeen. The court-house, where the burgesses are created, is situated in that part of the borough which is in the parish of Beguildy. The Rev. Vavasour Powell, who distinguished himself in the civil and religious disputes of the seventeenth century, more particularly in connexion with the Welsh non-conformists, was a native of this borough.

COED-ANNA (COEDANAU), a parish partly in the hundred of TWRCELYN, and partly in that of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S.E.) from Llanerchymedd, on the road from Beaumaris, containing 262 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanelian, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Blenwydd, is a small ancient structure, erected about the year 630; divine service is performed in it every alternate Sunday. William Thomas, in 1772, bequeathed £10, and Margaret Owen, in 1784, gave by deed £20, towards the endowment of a school for teaching poor children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £102. 1.

COEDCANLAIS (COEDCANLASS), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S.E. by S.) from Haverfordwest, containing 169 inhabitants. This small parish is situated on the eastern bank of Milford Haven, from which there is a ferry to Llangwm, on the opposite shore, and is five miles distant from Pembroke, across the ferry at Lawrenny. The substratum of the soil is a fine limestone rock, which is quarried to a considerable extent. The living is a donative, annexed to the vicarage of Martletwy: the stipend of the minister is not more than £2. 2. per annum, which is paid by Sir John Owen, Bart. The church is a small picturesque building of great antiquity, repaired a few years ago, at the expense of Sir John Owen. Divine service is only occasionally performed in it, but burials generally, the remaining ecclesiastical rites being celebrated at Martletwy. Here are the ruins of an ancient mansion, which bore the same name as the parish, and belonged to the family of Percival. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £9. 15.

COED-EULO, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1¼ mile (W. by N.) from Hawarden, containing, with Eulo, 1328 inhabitants. This place is remarkable in history as the scene of a signal defeat sustained by a chosen body of English troops, despatched by Henry II., in 1157, whilst advancing with a formidable army to the conquest of Wales, from his encampment on Saltney marsh, with a view to effect a general engagement with Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, who had posted his forces at Basingwerk. This detachment, having been unexpectedly attacked, whilst passing through a deep and narrow defile here, by a strong body of Welsh troops, lying in ambush, and headed by Davydd and Cynan, sons of Owain, was seized with a panic, which, added to the difficulties of the situation, rendered them unable to resist the impetuosity of their assailants, who mercilessly slaughtered the majority of them, and the few that escaped retreated in discomfiture to the main body of the army. Potteries for the manufacture of coarse earthenware, and kilns for making fire-bricks and tiles of superior quality, a considerable quantity of which is shipped to various ports on the Welsh coast and to Ireland, have for some years been carried on here to a great extent, and afford employment to a great proportion of the inhabitants: the clay is found on Buckley mountain, and, when manufactured into bricks, is calculated in a superior manner to resist intense heat. At Buckley, in this township, a handsome chapel, with a tower at the west end, in the later English style, was erected in 1822, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the erection and enlargement of churches and chapels granted £4000: it is a chapel of ease to the rectory of Hawarden. Here are also two large schools for the education of children of both sexes, with a house for a resident clergyman, as master, which were built in 1819, at an expense of £1200, being part of a sum of £2000 raised by subscription for that purpose; they are conducted on the National plan. Situated in a woody glen, at the distance of about a quarter of a mile to the north of the road leading from Chester to Holyhead, are the picturesque remains of Eulo castle, which was an appendage to that of Mold, but of unknown origin, and of which a more detailed account is given in the article on HAWARDEN.

COED-FRANK, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (S.W. by W.) from Neath, containing 825 inhabitants. The name signifies a forest, which in former ages was much infested by wolves; and tradition reports that, after a desperate battle fought in this neighbourhood, great numbers of those animals came down and devoured many of the slain. This hamlet commences at the mouth of the river Neath, and extends in a north-eastern direction until it meets that of Dyfryn-Clydach. A branch of the Neath canal passes through it, nearly parallel with the river, and joins the Briton-Ferry canal, which connects the rivers Neath and Tawy below Swansea; and by means of a ferry across the former, near the termination of the canal, a distance of seven or eight miles from Swansea to the eastern part of the county is avoided. The Crown Copper-works, belonging to a company at Birmingham, and affording employment to about one hundred persons, are situated here. This hamlet separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £199. 11.

COEDGLASEN (COED-GLEISION), a township in the parish of NANTMEL, hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Rhaiadr, containing 216 inhabitants. It is situated on the western bank of the Clywedog brook, and on the south-eastern declivity of Camlo hill. The name signifies the green wood, and was formerly characteristic of the township, which was well covered with timber.

COEDYCUMMER (COED Y CYMMER), a hamlet in the parish of VAINOR, hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 1¼ mile (N. by W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 1540 inhabitants. This large village, which is situated on the borders of Brecknockshire and Glamorganshire, is of recent origin, having risen in consequence of the establishment of the iron-works in the vicinity, in which many of the inhabitants are employed. The houses are built along the sides of the road leading to Brecknock, and are

COGAN, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Cardiff, containing 22 inhabitants. This parish contains only about seven hundred acres of land, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The living, with those of Llandough and Leckwith, forms a consolidated rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8.8.4., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is at present disused: in the chancel are some ancient monuments, among which are several of the family of Herbert, of Cogan Pill, an ancient mansion now converted into a farm-house. The poor children of this parish have the privilege of attending the school at Llandough. An average annual expenditure of £39. 15. is applied for the support of the poor.

COLLVRYN, a township in that part of the parish of LLANSANTFRAID YN MECHAN which is in the upper division of the hundred of DEXTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, containing 164 inhabitants. It is situated on the south side of the river Vyrnwy.

COLVA, a parochial chapelry in the hundred and county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (E. by N.) from Builth, containing 233 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the river Edwy, and on the road leading from Kington to Builth, appears to have been formerly only a hamlet, or chapelry, within the parish of Glâscomb, in the church of which the inhabitants had pews appropriated to their use: it is still, together with Rulen, partially dependent upon that parish, as the inhabitants of both contribute to the repairs of the church of Glâscomb; but in all civil matters they are independent parishes. Colva, in the king's books, is described as a chapel to Glâscomb, of the certified value of £10: the great tithes of the whole are an impropriation belonging to the Bishop of St. David's, and the vicar of Glâscomb receives the small tithes of each, holding both Colva and Rulen by the same presentation, institution, and induction, as Glâscomb. The chapel of Colva, like the church of Glâscomb, is dedicated to St. David. The chapelry contains nine hundred acres of enclosed, and one thousand acres of unenclosed, land: it is chiefly of a hilly character, and the soil is not very productive. The greater part is the property of the crown, but there is a small manor belonging to the owner of Harpton Court. A farm called Ty'n y Waun, in the parish of Llandeglay, in this county, was purchased with the amount of benefactions made by Evan and Ann Griffiths, in 1721, and is now let for £18 per annum, which is equally divided among the poor of Colva, Llandeglay, and Llanvihangel Nant Melan. The late Mr. James Chambers, of this place, also bequeathed £60, since laid out in mortgage on a tenement in the parish of Kington, in Herefordshire, producing £3 per annum, which is distributed in bread among the poor of Colva, at Easter and Christmas. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £213. 4.

COLWINSTONE, or TRÊ GOLWEN, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Cowbridge, containing 338 inhabitants. This parish contains some lead-ore, but the mines are not worked. A large tract of waste ground within its limits, called "Golden Mile," extending about a mile along the turnpike road from Cowbridge to Swansea, is noted for its fine pasturage, and numerous flocks of sheep are fed on it and the surrounding lands. Pwll y Wrach, the property of the Rev. Mr. Thomas, and now the residence of T. Coulthard, Esq., is a respectable well-built mansion, pleasantly situated within the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Robert Thomas. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Presbyterians. On the Golden Mile common is a tumulus; and in a field near it, on the road side, are vestiges of a small Roman camp; on the other side of the common are also traces of another small encampment; from which circumstances the Roman Julia strata Maritima is supposed to have passed near the course of the present turnpike road. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £143. 13.

CONVIL, or CYNWYL, a parish in the higher division of the hundred of ELVER, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. N. W.) from Carmarthen, on the road to Newcastle, containing 1566 inhabitants. This is a place of great antiquity, having been originally a British settlement, afterwards visited by the Romans: it has subsequently been the scene of many interesting transactions connected with the history of the principality. Henry Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., is supposed to have marched through it, on his way to meet Richard III., who is said to have encamped his forces at Llanvihangel-Yeroth, in the vicinity of which a battle took place between the vanguard of the earl and the rearguard of the usurping monarch, which terminated in the troops of the latter being obliged to retire, in consequence of the unfavourable position which they occupied. A remarkable embankment here, called "The Line," extending a mile and a half in length, and in many places eighteen feet high, is ascribed by tradition to the earl; and on the opposite bank, in a marshy soil, is a corresponding work, on the line of which is an artificial eminence, called "The King's Barrow," still bearing on its summit the marks of fire, having probably been used as a beacon, kindled to prevent a surprise by night from the hostile party on the other side. This tradition, however, is generally rejected, on the ground of the apparent inutility of such a work in a country friendly to Henry's designs, and of which many of the inhabitants were actually engaged with great energy in carrying into effect the object of his enterprise; yet, by a striking coincidence, there is, within a mile and a half of these lines, a place called Llwyn Davydd, and it is on record that the earl halted at a place of that name, usually considered that near Llandysilio-Gogo, on the sea-coast in Cardiganshire, which, however, is out of the direct route between Milford Haven, where he landed, and Shrewsbury, the road sometimes lying through deep valleys, at that time rendered impassable by the boggy nature of the soil, and Llwyn Davydd, in the adjoining parish of Llangeler, being in the direct road over a chain of hills. The small rivers Bala and Gwili run through this parish: the neighbouring district is composed of deep dingles and dorsal hills, which converge in a point at this place. A fair is held on November 21st. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Abernant, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed, exclusively of Abernant, with only £3 per annum, and a legacy of £8 by Mrs. Anna Warner. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one each for Baptists and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The sum of £5 is annually distributed among decayed housekeepers, arising from legacies by Mrs. Warner, of Southampton, in 1721, and Thomas Howell, Esq., of Pencaerau. Within the limits of the parish there was a remarkable cromlech, noticed by most preceding writers as being in a perfect state, but now scarcely distinguishable from an ordinary heap of stones, some of which, after being broken into fragments with gunpowder, were used, within the last few years, in the erection of a farm-house near the spot. This ancient monument of the Druids consisted of one principal stone of prodigious weight, supported by four upright stones, and surrounded by others in an erect position, supposed to have originally formed an entire circle. In addition to its appropriation to religious purposes, it is supposed to have been also used as an observatory, as it occupied the summit of a lofty hill, from which there is at most times a distinct view of the Bristol channel, and is found to have been originally constructed with a due regard to the meridian of the place, which now declines a little to the eastward; and this deviation, on a calculation of the precession of the equinoxes, has been considered a proof of its having been erected something more than two thousand years ago, or two hundred years before the Christian era. There are various tumuli in the parish, within which also there is a mineral spring, strongly impregnated with iron, and formerly held in considerable repute for its efficacy in the cure of certain diseases: it is called Fossana, or Ffos Sana, and from this appellation is supposed to have been known to the Roman conquerors of Britain, and to have been called by them Fons Sana. On a farm called Troed y Rhiw, in the northern part of the parish, formerly stood a chapel, which is supposed to have been suffered to fall to ruin in or prior to the reign of Henry VIII., few vestiges of it being now discernible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £498. 15.

CONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES.
—See ABERCONWAY.

CORWEN, a market town and parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (S. by W.) from Ruthin, and 194 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 1980 inhabitants. The name of this place signifies "the white choir." On the invasion of North Wales by Henry II., in 1165, that monarch advanced at the head of his army to the Berwyn mountains, near this town, where he was met by the combined forces of the Welsh, consisting of the entire power of North Wales, under the command of Owain Gwynedd and his brother Cadwaladr; the forces of South Wales, led by the gallant Rhys ab Gruffydd; those of Powys, by Owain Cyveilioc and the sons of Madoc ab Meredydd; and the men of the country between the Wye and the Severn, by their two chieftains, the sons of Madoc ab Ednerth. These exerted themselves with so much vigilance and activity in cutting off the supplies of the English troops, and in harassing them by skirmishes, that Henry, unable to compete with the resolute spirit of the Welsh and the unfavourableness of the season, deemed it prudent to retire with his forces, and for a time at least to abandon the project of subjugating the principality. The English monarch took up his position on the ridge of the Berwyn chain of mountains, and the Welsh occupied a strong intrenchment on the steep declivity of a hill on the opposite side of the vale. This camp, called Caer Drewyn, was of a circular form, and was defended by a single wall: there were two entrances, near the north-eastern of which was an oblong square, strengthened by a ditch and a wall: within the area were several strong buildings, together with cells in the walls themselves. Remains of these works are yet visible, consisting of a circle of loose stones, about half a mile in circumference, and the foundations of the buildings. This strong post is also said to have been occasionally resorted to by Owain Glyndwr, whose magnificent house on the Dee was situated about four miles from Corwen, on the eastern side of the road to Llangollen, where part of the moat by which it was encompassed is still visible, being almost the sole relic of that noble and extensive pile, which was surrounded by every convenience for the exercise of unbounded hospitality: at a short distance from its site there is a mound of considerable size, supposed to have been the station where a watch was kept.

The town is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Dee, on the great road from London to Holyhead and Dublin, under a rock at the foot of the Berwyn mountains, and in the rich and beautifully diversified vale of Edeyrnion. About half a mile to the south-west, on the line of the Holyhead road, the Dee is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of seven arches, the view from which, both up and down the vale, is exceedingly pleasing, especially upward, where the river assumes the appearance of a glittering lake, skirted on each side by luxuriant meadows and thick enclosures. Upon the Berwyn mountain, behind the church, is a place called Glyndwr's Seat, which commands a charming prospect; and from this spot it is superstitiously reported that Owain threw a dagger, which, falling upon a stone, formed in it an impression of its whole length, half an inch deep; this stone is now in the south wall of the church. The parish is very extensive, being eleven miles in length, and from three to four in breadth. There are two weekly markets, on Tuesday and Friday; the former being principally for corn, which is pitched in the open street. Fairs are held on March 12th, May 24th, July 14th, October 7th, and December 20th, for the sale of horses, horned cattle, &c. One of the bridewells for the county is situated at this place, under the care of the constable; but as it is a very small inconvenient structure, prisoners are only confined in it until they can be conveyed to Dolgelley.

The living consists of a sinecure rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, the former rated in the king's books at £15. 5. 10., and the latter at £7. 1. 3., and both in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the tithes of the parish are divided into two equal portions, which are respectively assigned to the rector and the vicar. The church, dedicated to

St. Sulien, is a cruciform structure, in the Norman style of architecture, with a square tower at the western end. Under an arch on the northern side of the chancel is the tomb of one of the early vicars, named Iorwerth Sulien, representing, in relief, a human figure habited in priestly robes, and bearing the following inscription in old characters:—"HIC JACET JORWERTH SULIEN, VICARIUS DE CORWAEN, ORA PRO EO." In the south wall of the church, on the outside, is the stone before mentioned as bearing the cross supposed to be the impression of Owain Glyndwr's dagger. In the churchyard stands a curious stone cross, consisting of a square upright pillar of one entire stone, ornamented at the top, and inserted in a flat circular stone, which rests upon four or five rude smaller ones. Built in the porch is a rude pointed stone, called Carreg y Big yn y vâch Rewlyd, "the pointed stone in the icy recess," of which it is fabulously related, that every attempt to erect the church on a different site having failed, the founders were directed by a supernatural power to the spot where this stone stood. At Rûg there is a private unendowed chapel, supported by G. H. Vaughan, Esq., in which the English service only is performed. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, with a Sunday school attached. A parochial school is supported by subscription, aided by a bequest of £4 per ann. by a member of the family of Salusbury, formerly owners of the adjacent domain of Rûg, who have been great benefactors to this place, and one of whom also bequeathed funds for clothing four boys annually. Situated behind the church is a college or hospital, for the support of six widows of clergymen of the Church of England, who died possessed of cure of souls in the county, which was built and endowed in 1750, by William Eyton, Esq., of Plâs Warren, in the county of Salop. Only two of the houses are now occupied: the inmates, who have each a good house and garden, receive in addition £20 per annum each. Almshouses for eight poor women were founded by a member of the family of Salusbury. There are also various pecuniary bequests for the relief of the poor, including one of £400, by Lumley Salusbury, for clothing eight poor women of this parish, two of Gwyddelwern, and two of Llangar; one of £200, by Roger Salusbury, for clothing six poor old men and twelve children; one of £150, by Mrs. Jones, for the benefit of thirty decayed families; and £75 by Hugh Jones, £50 by William Jones, £20 each by Roger Jones, the Rev. Mr. Humphreys, and Mrs. Wynne, and £10 by David Jones, for distribution among the poor. Within the limits of the parish is situated the elegant mansion of Rûg, now the property and residence of G. H. Vaughan, Esq., which is memorable in history as the spot to which Gruffydd ab Cynan, King of North Wales, was inveigled by one Muriawyn Gôch, soon after the decisive victory obtained by him at Carno, in 1077, which placed him upon the throne; and there betrayed to Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Hugh Belesme, Earl of Shrewsbury, by whom he was conveyed to the castle of Chester, from which he escaped by stratagem, after an imprisonment for twelve years. Near it is a well, called St. Sulien's, the water of which is efficacious in the cure of rheumatic complaints. On one of the Berwyn mountains, called Moel Verma, in this parish, an urn of earthenware, containing human bones, and now in the possession of Col. Vaughan, was discovered some years ago. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £766.

COSHESTON, a parish in the hundred of CASTLE-MARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Pembroke, containing 678 inhabitants. The village is beautifully situated on the southern declivity of a hill, the base of which is washed by an estuary of Milford Haven, navigable for barges. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £11. 12. 11., and in the patronage of Sir John Owen, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a low tower surmounted by a spire. The poor children of this parish are admissible into the National school at Pembroke. John Jones, Esq., M. D., in 1698, bequeathed certain property for apprenticing poor children, and the relief of the aged and infirm, of the four parishes of Lawrenny, Cosheston, St. David's, and Lampeter-Velvrey, with a discretionary power to his brother, the Rev. Mr. Jones, as executor, to add other parishes: of the produce of this charity, Cosheston receives a sum amounting to about £30 per annum, which is appropriated agreeably to the directions of the testator. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £137. 15.

COWBRIDGE, a borough and market town, having exclusive jurisdiction, in the parish of LLANBLETHIAN, locally in the hundred of Cowbridge, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W.) from Cardiff, and 170 (W.) from London, on the main western road through the county, containing 1097 inhabitants. The Welsh name of this place is Pont vaen, a corruption of Pont y vôn, of which last the English name is a literal translation. The town is supposed to have been originally an appendage to the castle and lordship of St. Quentin; and was surrounded, in 1090, by Robert St. Quentin, one of Fitz-Hamon's knights, with a stone wall, having three gates, which, in Leland's time, were all entire, but of which only the south gate now remains. Its situation, though low, is salubrious, and its appearance prepossessing: the town consists principally of one spacious street, extending for nearly half a mile along the turnpike road; the houses are in general well built, and several of them are handsome: it is neither paved nor lighted, but well supplied with water from springs, and from the small river Ddaw, which passes through the centre of it. The old town-hall, shambles, and market-house, which stood in the centre of the principal street, obstructing the thoroughfare, have been removed, and the old county bridewell, situated at this place, has been recently converted, chiefly by subscription, into a neat town-hall, with jury-rooms and other apartments. The market days are Tuesday and Saturday; the market on the latter is chiefly for butchers' meat and other provisions: the fairs, principally for cattle, are on the first Tuesday in February, the Tuesday before March 25th, May 4th, June 24th, and September

Seal and Arms.

29th: there are also two great markets on the first Tuesdays in August and December. The government of the town, by charter of incorporation confirmed in the 33rd of Charles II., is vested in a mayor, who is deputy constable of the castle of St. Quentin, two bailiffs, twelve aldermen, and twelve capital burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, six constables, an ale-taster, and other officers. The deputy constable is appointed by the Marquis of Bute: the bailiffs are annually chosen, on Michaelmas eve, from among the aldermen, of whom four are nominated for that purpose by the burgesses, out of which number the mayor selects two: the aldermen are elected from the capital burgesses, by a majority of their own body, as vacancies occur; and the capital burgesses are elected in the same manner, by the aldermen and a majority of their own body, from the burgesses: the town-clerk is also appointed by the Marquis of Bute, and the other officers by the corporation. Cowbridge was formerly one of the eight contributory boroughs within the county, which returned one member to parliament, the right of election having been in the burgesses at large, in number between seventy and eighty, of whom about one-half are resident: it is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, contributory with Cardiff and Llantrissant in the return of a member: the right of election is vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of houses of this value, situated within the limits of the borough, which comprise an area of little more than thirty-three acres, and were not altered by the late boundary act, is seventy-nine: the bailiffs of Cardiff, at which place the elections are held, are the returning officers. The freedom is acquired by an apprenticeship of seven years to a resident freeman, inherited by birth by all the children of freemen, or obtained by marriage with a freeman's daughter, or by gift of the corporation. The mayor and bailiffs are justices of the peace, exercising exclusive jurisdiction within the borough: they have power to hold a court of record, every three weeks, for the recovery of debts under £5, but for many years have not exercised that privilege. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here every Tuesday, and the Easter quarter sessions for the county. Cowbridge is commonly reputed a parish, but it has no distinct incumbency: the chapel, which was originally a chapel of ease to the church of Llanblethian, is still served by the vicar of that parish, who performs morning service at one, and evening service at the other, alternately every Sunday. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient and venerable structure, and contains several handsome monuments of modern erection, and two of more ancient date, one to the memory of the Carnes, of Nash, and the other to that of the family of Jenkins, of Hensol, near Cowbridge. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school is of uncertain foundation: it is of considerable repute, and is supposed by some to have grown out of the ruins of an ancient establishment at Lantwit Major, and to have been removed to this place in the reign of Elizabeth. It is under the superintendence of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, who appoint the master, with a salary of £20 per annum, a large dwelling-house in Church-street, and two gardens. The endowment was augmented by Sir Leoline Jenkins, Knt., Judge of the Admiralty in the reign of Charles II., who was educated in this school, and who founded two fellowships, two scholarships, and one exhibition, in Jesus' College, which are limited exclusively to natives of the principality educated at this school. Sir Leoline also assigned a fund for clothing poor persons every fourth year, which is regularly appropriated in that manner by the master of the school. There are divers other charitable bequests for the benefit of the poor, among which are, one of £225, since laid out in land, by Rebecca Wyndham, for apprenticing poor children; one of £100 by Catherine Williams, in 1682, for apprenticing children and for clothing poor aged men and women; and various minor sums to be expended in bread for the poor, the principal of which is a rent-charge of £4. 10., by Mary Wilcox, subject to the payment of land-tax, chief-rent, and repairs. Some Roman coins have been discovered at this place: one, which was of brass, bore the inscription CÆSAR TRAIANUS; the reverse, PONT MAX . . . . . SII; the exergue, BRITANNI. At the distance of about two miles, in a field adjoining the road from London to Haverfordwest, on the southern side, and close to the common called the Golden Mile, is a square intrenched camp of small dimensions, supposed to be Roman; and on the south side of that common are vestiges of a similar work, both probably indicating the course of the Via Julia Maritima. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £361. 6.

COYCHURCH, otherwise LLANGRALLO, a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Bridgend, comprising the townships of Higher Coychurch, Lower Coychurch, Pencoed, and Peterston super Montem, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and containing 1079 inhabitants, of which number, 284 are in Lower Coychurch. It derives its Welsh name from St. Grallo, by whom the church is said to have been founded, and to whom it is dedicated: this saint was nephew to Illutus, the founder of Lantwit Major, in this county, with which place a connexion appears to be indicated by a circular cross in the churchyard, corresponding in every respect with that at Lantwit, and, from what is said to have been legible of the inscription, which is now totally obliterated, most probably erected by the same persons, viz., Samson, the successor of Illutus, and Samuel the sculptor. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £21. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven. The church, situated in the hamlet of Lower Coychurch, is a spacious and venerable structure, though much dilapidated. There is a chapel of ease at the hamlet of Peterston, with a Welsh Sunday school annexed. Within the limits of the parish are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, to which, as well as to the church, are attached Sunday schools, supported by subscription. Various charitable benefactions of small amount have been left for distribution among the poor. There are mines of coal in the hamlet of Higher Coychurch, of a bituminous quality, called the Hirwain collieries, in which several of the labouring poor are employed; and lead-ore has been found in the parish. Out of a rock of magnesian limestone issues a spring, the water of which forms beautiful incrustations; and there is a cavern in the parish, in which are fine specimens of bright calcareous spar. Near the church is a farm-house, supposed to have been anciently a religious establishment, subordinate to the abbey of Ewenny. The Rev. Thomas Richards, author of a Welsh and English Dictionary, was forty years curate of this parish. The average annual expenditure of the whole parish, for the support of the poor, amounts to £339.17., of which the average proportion of Lower Coychurch is £64.17.

COYCHURCH (HIGHER), a hamlet in the parish of COYCHURCH, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bridgend, containing 259 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Ewenny, and contains some collieries of bituminous coal, called the Hirwaun collieries, which are situated at the foot of the Cevn Hirgoed mountain. There is a place of worship for Independents, with a Sunday school in connexion with it. Some small benefactions, amounting to about £24, have been given for the benefit of the poor of this hamlet, of which £14 were applied towards the erection of a house for their reception; and the sum of fifty shillings per annum, arising out of a tenement, is regularly distributed among such as do not receive parochial relief. This hamlet is assessed separately for the support of its poor: the average annual expenditure is £109.11.

COYTY, otherwise COITY, a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the eastern bank of the river Ogmores, comprising the Higher Hamlet, or manor of Coyty Anglia, and the Lower Hamlet, or manor of Coyty Wallia, the latter forming part of the market-town of Bridgend, and known also by the name of Oldcastle, from a fortress anciently situated there (and each hamlet separately maintaining its own poor), and containing 1642 inhabitants, of which number, 477 are in the Higher Hamlet, and 1165 in the Lower Hamlet. The lordship of Coyty was conferred by Fitz-Hamon on Sir Payne Turberville, one of the knights who accompanied him in his expedition into Wales, by whom the castle, which is extensive and magnificent, even in its ruins, is supposed to have been originally erected. From the family of Turberville it passed into the possession of Sir Richard Berkrolles, and subsequently to the families of Gamage, Sydney, and Wyndham. It is at present the property of the Earl of Dunraven and Mountearl, by marriage with the daughter and sole heiress of the late Thomas Wyndham, Esq., member for the county of Glamorgan in several successive parliaments. The living is a rectory, with the chapel of Nolton annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £21.12.3½, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, possesses no extraordinary architectural interest. On opening a grave in the chancel, for the interment of the late rector, Dr. Richards, a vault was discovered, containing the remains of Sir Payne Turberville and his lady. There is a place of worship for dissenters in the village of Coyty. Davydd Hopkins, a poet, or Welsh bard, who in 1700 was admitted to the Gorsedd of Glamorgan, at which he presided in 1730, was a native of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £560, of which sum the average proportion of the Higher Hamlet is £174.18., and that of the Lower £385.2.

CRAIGIOGUWLAN (CREIGIOG UWCH-LAN), a township in the parish of LLANARMON, hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Ruthin. The population is returned with the parish. The small river Alyn runs in a northerly direction through this township, which forms the upper portion of the parish, and is partly bounded on the east by the elevated hills on the border of Flintshire.

CRAIGISGLÂN (CREIGIOG ÎS-GLÂN), a township in the parish of LLANARMON, hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Ruthin. The population is included in the return for the parish. This township is situated in a narrow valley, bounded on one side by the Clwydian hills, and on the other by those on the confines of Flintshire, the river Alyn flowing near the centre. There are several respectable residences in different parts of it.

CRAY (CRAI), a chapelry in the parish and hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9½ miles (W.) from Brecknock, containing 576 inhabitants. It is situated at the junction of the small river Crai with the Usk, which latter is here crossed by a bridge. The common of Little Forest, in this chapelry, was anciently attached to the Great Forest of Brecknock, but on the attainder of the Duke of Buckingham, as lord of Brecknock, it was separated from the latter, and granted, by Henry VIII., first to Lord Seymour of Sudley, Lord High Admiral, and again, on his attainder, to another favourite, whose descendants afterwards disposed of it to various purchasers. The proprietors of this portion of Crai are exempt from a feudal practice which anciently prevailed in the parish of Devynock, whereby the other tenants were obliged to resort to the lord's mill, to have their corn ground, but it is not now so strictly observed as it was formerly. There are several respectable residences in this chapelry, more especially in that part adjoining the vale of the Crai. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Devynock. The chapel, dedicated to St. Ild, and sometimes called the chapel of Llan Ild, stands higher up the vale, on the eastern declivity of an eminence, and close to the left bank of the Crai rivulet. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. In 1626, Sir John Davy, the owner of this property, bequeathed a portion of the tithes, amounting to £40 per annum, for erecting five almshouses and a free school; and a sum of £12 per annum was devised by Morgan Watkin, in 1699, for the benefit of the poor. Some vestiges of ancient barrows are still discernible, and of carneddau on the adjacent hills. This chapelry is separately assessed for the support of its poor: the average annual expenditure amounts to £244.2.

CREGRINA, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES.—See CAREGRINA.

CRESWELL-QUAY, a village situated at the point of junction of the three parishes of LAWRENNY, CAREW, and JEFFRESTON, in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E.) from Pembroke. The population is returned with the respective parishes. It is situated on an æstuary of Milford Haven, and in each of the three parishes there is a small quay for the convenience of shipping the coal and culm from the mines with which this district abounds. From twenty to thirty thousand tons have been annually shipped at this place for exportation; but the quantity has recently much diminished, and at present not more than six thousand tons are annually shipped, generally in vessels of about eighty tons' burden.

CRICCIETH (CRÛGCAITH), a borough and parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, Eivionydd division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 18 miles (S.) from Carnarvon, and 240 (W.N.W.) from London, containing 648 inhabitants. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, at an early period belonged to Ednyved Vychan, who was seventy-sixth in descent from Henwyn, Duke of Cornwall, and was baron of Brÿnfenigl, lord of Criccieth, and chief counsellor to Llewelyn the Great. He acquired an honourable name and possessed much influence among his countrymen, and is stated to have built a strong fortress here, which, having fallen into decay, was restored and enlarged by Edward I. This castle formed one of the defences of the passage over the sands called Traeth-Mawr, from the territory included in the present county of Merioneth into the country of Snowdon, during the wars between the Britons and the invading Saxons and Normans. About the year 1140, Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, having been unjustly made prisoner by his brother Davydd, who afterwards succeeded to the sovereignty of North Wales, was imprisoned in it for a considerable time, and then delivered into the power of the English monarch, Henry III. Edward I., having completed the subjugation of Wales, restored and strongly fortified the castle, appointing William de Leybourn governor, with a salary of £100 per annum, out of which he was to maintain thirty stout men (ten of them cross-bowmen), a chaplain, a surgeon, a carpenter, and a mason. Among its later governors was Sir Howel y Fwyall, so called from his bearing the figure of a poleaxe upon his shield, who, having attended Edward the Black Prince on his continental expeditions, and meritoriously distinguished himself at the battle of Poitiers, was knighted by that prince, and appointed to the governorship of the castle, which he afterwards made his principal residence. The same prince also constituted the town of Criccieth a free borough, and made the constable of the castle mayor, granting the burgesses the same privileges as were enjoyed by those of Rhôs Vair, in the county of Anglesey. It is not known at what time the castle first fell into decay; but, in the 24th of Henry VIII., orders were issued to the constable to put it into thorough repair, at the king's cost; and that monarch, in the 35th year of his reign, conferred upon the burgesses the right of participating in the election of a representative for the borough of Carnarvon, to which it consequently became a contributory borough.

Criccieth is now only an inconsiderable village of mean appearance: from its contiguity to the shore of Cardigan bay, the situation is favourable for commerce;

but only a few vessels touch here, bringing limestone in ballast, and taking away slates from Port Madoc, and there is neither harbour nor any facility for unloading vessels: only a few fishing-boats belong to the town. The market, which was on Wednesday, has been disused for several centuries; but three fairs, chiefly for horses and cattle, are held annually on May 23rd, June 29th, and October 22nd. The corporation consists of a mayor, who is always constable of the castle, and is appointed by letters patent for life; two bailiffs, who are annually elected by the burgesses, on the 29th of September; and a recorder, who is appointed by the mayor during pleasure. This is one of the boroughs contributory to Carnarvon, in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses generally, here about fifty-four in number, but is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of houses of this value, situated within the limits of the borough, which comprise an area of four hundred and seventy acres, and were not altered by the late boundary act, is only nine: the bailiffs of Carnarvon are the returning officers. The freedom is obtained only by gift of the corporation. The charter empowers the corporation to hold courts of session for petty offences arising within the borough, but it does not appear that they have ever exercised that privilege: they hold a borough court annually, at which the bailiffs are chosen and the borough officers sworn in; and they have power to hold a court of requests for the recovery of debts, but no court has been held for many years: the county magistrates hold petty sessions here once a month. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Trêvlys and Ynyscynhaiarn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £13. 8. 11½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, is a spacious structure, partly in the later style of English architecture, consisting of a nave, chancel, and south aisle: in the east window are some portions of stained glass, and both internally and externally the building exhibits some good details, but is in a very neglected state. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. David Ellis, rector of this parish, gave £200, directing the interest to be appropriated to the payment of a schoolmaster, to teach all the poor children of the parishes of Criccieth, Trêvlys, and Ynyscynhaiarn: at present twenty-four children derive benefit from this endowment. The castle occupied the summit of a conical hill, projecting into the sea, and overlooking the northern expanse of the bay of Cardigan: the rock upon which it was situated is precipitous on all sides, and connected with the main land only by a narrow isthmus, which, for its greater security, was intersected by a double fosse and vallum. The remains consist of two round towers, which are square within, and are supposed to have assumed their external form during the repairs by Edward I., when they were probably cased with stone; also a gateway; the fragments of walls, enclosing an area of irregular form; and the foundations of two square towers. Though a fortress of great importance, from its commanding situation, it does not appear to have been of very great extent, or to have been more strongly defended by art than by the advantages of its site. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £139. 9.

CRICKADARN, or CERRIG-CADARN (CRÛG CADARN), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $11\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Hay, comprising the North and South divisions, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and containing 397 inhabitants, of which number, 185 are in the North, and 212 in the South, division. The name of this parish signifies a strong mount, and may have been derived from the situation of its church, which occupies the summit of a high bank, overlooking the small river Clettwr, which flows into the Wye, at Errwd, on the road to Builth. The village is situated on the river Wye, by which it is separated from the county of Radnor, and the high road from Hereford through the Hay to Builth traverses the eastern part of the parish. The Clettwr, just above where it is crossed by a small bridge, flows through a deep winding dingle, the sides of which are nearly precipitous, and are well clothed with wood from the summit to the margin of the stream, presenting a strikingly picturesque scene. The living is an endowed discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Llandeulley, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small ancient edifice, with a massive tower, but destitute of architectural interest; the interior contains the ancient rood-loft, which is of oak, ornamented with carvings in cinquefoil, and supported on pillars. There is neither parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to the living. The registers of this parish, as well as those of Llandeulley, were lost in the year 1792, prior to which date there are consequently no entries. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. The Rev. David Williams, in 1712, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2, to be distributed among eight poor people, to whom also, in 1721, Mrs. Lettice Parry bequeathed land producing £1 per annum, and in the same year Mr. William Evans bequeathed a rent-charge of £5, which is annually distributed in bread among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the North division amounts to £126. 13., and that of the South division to £86. 15.

CRICKHOWEL (CRÛG-HYWEL), a market town and parish, in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, on the high road from London to Milford Haven, 13 miles (S. E.) from Brecknock, and 153 (W. by N.) from London, containing 1061 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an ancient British fortress, called Crûg Hywel, situated at the distance of about two miles to the north-north-east of it, and formerly of great strength and importance. In the reign of William II., Bernard de Newmarch, having wrested the province of Brycheiniog (now Brecknock) from Bleddyn, son of Maenyrch, the native sovereign, divided it among the Norman knights who were associated with him in the expedition, of whom Sir Humphrey de Bourghil received a grant of the manor of Crickhowel, to be holden by the service of one knight's fee, as of the paramount lordship of Blaenllyvni and Dinas, which Bernard retained for himself. The manor continued in the possession of this family for some generations, and afterwards passed to the Turbervilles, descended from Sir Payne de Turberville, to whom Robert Fitz-Hamon had granted the lordship of Coyty, in Glamorganshire. In 1172, the castle of Crickhowel was stormed and its garrison made prisoners by Sitsyllt ab Ririd, a chieftain of Monmouthshire. Sir Edmund Turberville is mentioned as lord of Crickhowel in the latter part of the reign of Richard I., and in that of King John, whom he is stated to have served in the wars in France. His grandson, Hugh de Turberville, adhered to Henry III., in opposition to the disaffected barons. In the reign of Edward I., Sir Hugh, assisted by Sir Grimbald de Pauncefote and Sir Roger de Bredwardine, raised troops in Wales for the king's service: to the former of these knights Sir Hugh gave his daughter Sybil, with his Brecknock estates, in marriage, and to the latter he assigned the mesne manor of Gwernvale, and other estates in Crickhowel. Sir Grimbald, in the fourth year of that reign, obtained from the king the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair on the 12th of May, to be held at this town, which was confirmed by Henry VI. to his descendant, Sir John de Pauncefote, with the additional privilege of free warren within the manor. Henry IV., in 1403, during the insurrectionary proceedings of Owain Glyndwr, issued especial orders to Sir John to fortify and defend his castle here against the threatened attack of that daring chieftain, by whom it was ultimately demolished, with many others in this part of the country. In the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the Pauncefotes were staunch supporters of the latter, and suffered greatly for their adherence to the cause. Hugh de Pauncefote, in the 23rd of Henry VI., settled upon that monarch and his heirs, by indenture, the reversion of this manor, in failure of issue of his own family; which ensuing, the name henceforward ceases to occur in connexion with this place. From a document among the patent rolls in the Tower, it appears that the barony of Blaenllyvni and Dinas, of which this manor was held by tenure of knight's service, was in the possession, jure uxoris, of Richard Duke of York, who had espoused Anne, sister of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, in whose family it had for some time been vested. Edward IV., grandson of Duke Richard, and the lawful inheritor of the estate, soon after his accession to the throne, granted the manors of Crickhowel and Trêtower to his friend and favourite, Sir William Herbert, of Raglan Castle, Knt., whom he afterwards created Earl of Pembroke, which title, at the request of the king, was given up, in exchange for the earldom of Huntingdon, by Sir William's son and successor, whose only daughter and heiress, the Lady Elizabeth Herbert, conveyed these estates by marriage to Sir Charles Somerset, Knt., afterwards created Earl of Worcester, from whom, by lineal descent, they have been transmitted to their present noble owner, the Duke of Beaufort.

The town is beautifully situated on the north-eastern bank of the Usk, upon a declivity sloping gently to the river, over which is a bridge of thirteen arches, of various dimensions, built of dark-coloured stone, and partially mantled with ivy, the whole being remarkably picturesque in appearance. It is irregularly built, but is inhabited by numerous respectable families, and is greatly resorted to, during the season, by anglers, for trout-fishing in the river Usk, which also abounds with salmon. The environs, within a narrow compass, are strikingly picturesque, presenting a highly pleasing and luxuriant prospect of a richly cultivated vale, watered by the Usk, and, together with the sloping grounds, adorned with numerous elegant seats, genteel residences, farm-houses, and cottages. The line of the horizon is rendered beautifully irregular by the picturesque forms of the surrounding mountains; the vast Breannog, rising suddenly on the northern side of the vale, shelters it from the cold winds, and on the south the bold escarpment of the Darren, overlooking the little village of Llangattock, forms an agreeable contrast with the cultivated lands beneath. The steep, but well-wooded, declivity of Llanwenarth Graig, descending from the pointed Sugar Loaf, with the apparently opposite connexion of the Blorenge mountain, shuts out towards the east the view of the lower lands of Monmouthshire surrounding Abergavenny; while the verdant Myarth, with a chain of other eminences, terminates the prospect to the west. Crickhowel had formerly two trading companies, the Clothiers' and the Shoemakers', the wardens and officers of which had each a handsome pew in the old church, decorated with their respective emblems of trade, carved in oak. Dr. Smollett, in his excellent novel of "Humphrey Clinker," mentions the Crickhowel flannels; but the manufacture has been entirely discontinued: there is still, however, some business done in the making of shoes. The neighbouring mountains contain mines of iron-ore and coal, and there are several railways connected with the works. On the banks of the river, at a short distance from the town, are some paper-mills. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal passes at the distance of about a mile, affording a direct communication with Bristol: lime and coal, the produce of the neighbourhood, together with timber, iron, and grocery, are the principal articles conveyed along it. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on February 1st, April 13th, May 12th, September 24th, and November 6th, of which that in May is the greatest. The market-house, the upper part of which is used as the town-hall, is an incommodious building, inconveniently situated in the middle of the High-street, adjoining the turnpike road, which it is in contemplation to remove to a more eligible site.

Prior to the union of Wales with England, Crickhowel was one of the marcher territories, subordinate to the paramount lordship of Blaenllyvni, and was comprehended within the district of the Lower Ystradwy, or, more properly, Ystrad Iw. On the abolition of the independent jurisdiction of the lords marcher, in the 27th of Henry VIII., it was consolidated with the county of Brecknock, and constituted the head of a hundred. The ancient name of Ystradwy is now lost, except in that part of the parish of Llanbedr which is called Llanbedr Ystradwy. The Norman conquerors of lands in Wales, on introducing the feudal system of tenure, usually conceded to the natives many of their local customs. Thus, they had two courts, one called Englischeria, and the other Welschria; the former comprehending the freeholders, and the latter the customary tenants of the manor. The freeholders, for the most part, held their lands by military, or knights' service, though a few were permitted to hold in socage; the customary tenants were originally the native peasantry of the country, who, having been despoiled of all real property, were allowed to hold small tenements by certain base services, or personal labour, for the benefit of the lord. These were at first rendered in kind, but afterwards commuted for money payments, still known by the name of Cymmorth rents, or rents in lieu of aid. On divesting the marcher lordships of their exclusive jurisdiction, and bringing them under the authority of the common law of the land, certain privileges were continued to the proprietors. Thus, the Duke of Beaufort, as lord of the manor of Crickhowel, appoints a coroner for the hundred, and holds a court leet twice a year, and a court baron every three weeks, for the manor: he also annually appoints a bailiff for the town, which is a borough by prescription, though the office is now merely nominal, its duties being confined to collecting the manorial chief-rents: two aldermen were also formerly elected for the borough, but this privilege has not for some time been exercised. The lords of the manors of Crickhowel and Trêtower have also claimed and exercised the right of executing, by their bailiffs, within the limits of these liberties respectively, all the king's writs, that of Non omittas alone excepted. The county magistrates hold a petty session every Thursday in the town-hall, for the transaction of business relative to the hundred.

The parish is divided into two hamlets, the borough hamlet and the country hamlet, each having its churchwarden and overseer of the poor, but not possessing separate jurisdiction, the assessments being levied generally upon the whole. It was formerly a chapelry within the parish of Llangattock, the rectors of which received one-third of its tithes, but was made a distinct parish by Lady Sibyl de Pauncfote, relict of Sir Grimbald, by whom the portion of the tithes above-mentioned was settled on the rector of Crickhowel. The living is now a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 17. 8½, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the rector: the rectory is a sinecure, rated at £5. 9. 9½, and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort, as lay impropiator of a certain remaining portion of the tithes of the parish, which is rated at £4. 14. 7. The tithes are thus divided into three unequal portions, the lay impropriation, the sinecure rectory, and the vicarage, and are collected by a common agent, who pays to each party his share: there is also an allotment for the sexton, consisting of the clear yearly tenths of certain lands specified within the parish. The rectorial glebe consists of about twenty-five acres of meadow and arable land; the vicarial, of one acre: there is no parsonage-house for either rector or vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Edmund the King and Martyr, was founded and endowed by the munificence of Lady Sibyl de Pauncfote, and consecrated, in 1303, by David de Sancto Edmundo, Bishop of St. David's: it was originally much larger than at present, but having been found upon examination to be in a very dilapidated condition, a faculty was obtained in the year 1765, enabling the churchwardens to take down two side aisles, and apply the materials in repairing the remainder: it was thus left cruciform, consisting of a nave, chancel, and two transepts, with a tower rising from the intersection of the nave with the transepts, containing five bells, and surmounted by a shingled spire, the only one in the county. To afford accommodation for the increased population of the parish, a new aisle was built on the south side of the nave, in 1830, by voluntary subscription among the inhabitants, as an equivalent for pews, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels: this additional portion contains one hundred and fifty sittings, half of which are free, and this is the first known instance of increased accommodation being added to a church by the equitable mode of allowing those who want seats, to purchase and annex them in perpetuity to their houses. The south transept, called the Rumsey Chapel, was originally a chantry appendant to the estate of a family of that name in the parish, though erected and endowed prior to their connexion with the place: but the exclusive right has long been forfeited by the owners, from neglect in performing the necessary repairs. The north transept, called the Gwernvale Chapel, was also a chantry belonging to the Gwernvale estate, the proprietor of which still repairs it, and supports his claim to the exclusive possession of it. The chancel is long, narrow, and much lower than the remainder of the building: in each of the side walls are two low arched recesses, probably intended by the foundress as burial-places for the family, two of them having been used for that purpose. Within the upper recess on the south, upon a low altar-tomb, is the mutilated effigy of a knight, in a recumbent position, cross-legged, and clad in chain mail, having a sword hanging from a belt, and upon the left arm a shield, bearing the device of three lions rampant, the armorial ensign of the Pauncefotes: the inscription is almost entirely defaced, but the tomb is probably that of Sir Grimbald de Pauncefote, husband of the foundress: the latter is supposed to lie interred beneath the opposite arch, where is a low tomb, supporting a recumbent figure of a lady, habited in ancient costume: the interments were evidently made from the outside, as appears from the worked stone facing of the walls at the back of the arches, the want of which behind the other two is considered a proof of their never having been occupied. Projecting into the chancel, near the communion table, is a large and handsome monument of black and white marble, enclosed by an iron railing, supporting the well-executed effigy, in alabaster, of Sir John Herbert, of Dan y Castell, near this town, who died May 10th, 1666, and his lady Joan, who died some years after: the knight is represented in a reclining posture, with flowing hair, clothed in plate armour, with a truncheon in his right hand, and a helmet at his feet: his lady, richly habited, is recumbent on a quilted mattress, having the head supported upon an embroidered pillow, with tassels at the corners, and a small book in her hand. The inscription states that the monument was erected, in 1690, by Elizabeth, wife of Wm. Le Hunt, serjeant-at-law, son of Sir John Le Hunt, of Middleton, in the county of Warwick, Knt.: upon the east end of the monument are sculptured the figures of a man habited as a serjeant-at-law, the head broken off, and of a female, both kneeling, dated 1703, and 1694. In addition to these, there are some neat mural tablets, but of minor interest. There are places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and for English and Welsh Wesleyan Methodists, attached to each of which is a school for the instruction of children. Two day schools and two Sunday schools have been established in the parish, for children of the church of England: for these, two school-rooms, for the education of children of both sexes, have been erected upon the plot of glebe belonging to the vicarage, at the expense of the present vicar, the Rev. George Jones Bevan, who has distinguished himself as the author of some valuable tracts and essays: they are conducted upon the National plan, and are supported by voluntary subscription.

The castle and its precincts formerly occupied a space of about eight acres, encompassed by roads, and terminating in a point upon the road to Abergavenny, on the south-eastern side of the town: the lower portion of this area is now occupied by houses, erected within the last few years: the structure itself, with its bailey within the walls, included a surface of two acres, one rood, and fourteen perches: the remains are small, and destitute of picturesque attraction. The mount, vulgarly called the "Castle Tump," commands a fine view of the transcendent beauties of the vale, both above and below: it was the site of the keep, or donjon, a lofty square building four stories high, the vaults of which are, no doubt, still entire beneath the present mount. About a mile and a half from the town formerly stood the "baptismal and parochial chapel" of St. Mary, still known by its Welsh name, Llanvair, or "Mary-church." That its erection was of a date long prior to that of the present parochial church of St. Edmund is certain, from the report of Giraldus Cambrensis, in the reign of Henry II., who states that he himself, as archdeacon of Brecknock, was cited to appear in capellâ Sanctæ Mariæ de Crucohel, to answer certain interrogatories to be proposed to him by the priors of Llanthony and Brecknock, respecting a fine imposed upon him, but not paid, at the suit of the Archbishop of Canterbury, with whom he had been at issue. Having long since fallen into lay hands, it was used, until within the last twenty years, as a barn: it was then taken down, and a new farm building erected upon the spot, so that the name is now the only vestige of the ancient structure: a neighbouring field, called Cae Crochenydd, or "the Potters' Field," is said by tradition to have been the place of interment for strangers who died within the parish. The principal relic of more remote antiquity situated in this neighbourhood is the fortification of Crûg Howel, or "Howel's Mount," occupying a conspicuous situation upon a bold knoll of the Breannog mountain, rising to the north of the town. Leland notices it as Cragus Hoelinus, and in an old survey of the manor it is called Cae Crûgiau, or "the Mounded Enclosure;" but the present English inhabitants call it the Table Hill. It is of an irregular triangular form, and slopes gently from the north-western angle, which is very acute: a rampart of loose stones surrounds the area, which comprises a space of one thousand one hundred and sixty feet within the inner circumference. Towards the vale, the descent is precipitous; the only entrance being from the north, whence a steep narrow way, called Cevn fordd, or "the ridge-way," communicates with the mountain, a bold projection of which, overlooking the fortress, is called Disgwylyva, the "look out," or "watching-place;" and upon the summit is the beacon, a high conical heap of stones. The great Roman road, denominated by Sir R. C. Hoare the Via Julia Montana, leading from the celebrated Silurian station of Caerlleon, by the station near Brecknock to Maridunum, now Carmarthen, passed through this parish, by the foot of the Breannog mountain; and in a field adjoining the old chapel of Llanvair is a high artificial mound, supposed by some to have been the site of a Roman arx speculatoria, or watch-tower. By the road side, near Gwernvale, formerly stood a fine British cromlech, which was destroyed several years ago, for the purpose of ascertaining what lay beneath it: within the parish is a maen hir, "or long stone," of which there are many more in the vicinity, and respecting which there is a variety of opinions, some supposing them to have been sepulchral, others simply commemorative, and others again the mere boundary marks of a territory, or district. By the side of the road leading towards Brecknock stands an old gateway, called Porth Mawr, or the "Great Gate," through the opening of which there is a most delightful prospect of the vale and the river Usk, and which has erroneously been regarded as having formed an appendage to the castle, with which it is stated to have had a subterraneous communication. It was, in fact, the entrance to a mansion called Cwrt Carw, or "Stags' Court," erected in the reign of Henry VII., by a member of the Herbert family: the old house, which is said to have been defended by its owner against a body of the parliamentary troops under Cromwell, has long since been demolished: the estate upon which it is situated is now the property of Edward William Seymour, Esq., who resides there.

At the distance of half a mile from the town stands Gwernvale House, the handsome seat of John Gwynne, Esq., built about the commencement of the present century, by Tristram Everest, Esq. The more ancient mansion is situated on the hill behind it, and is now the property of Joseph Bailey, Esq. In old writings this estate is designated "Moelmore, alias Gwernvald," and the mesne manor to which it belongs still bears that name: it is now indiscriminately called Gwernvale, or Wernvale, which the late Archdeacon Payne ingeniously conjectures to be a corruption of Tir Wronon Voel, "the land of Wronon the Bald," since, from an ancient deed in the possession of that gentleman, prior to and at the time of his decease, it appears, in the 11th of Edward II., to have belonged to Wronon, surnamed Voel, or "the Bald," and styled Comportionarius Ecclesie Beati Edmundi de Crúghoel. In the year 1668, this estate was purchased by Sir Henry Proger, Knt., a branch of the Gwernddû family in Monmouthshire, who, being a staunch loyalist, retired, during the usurpation of Cromwell, with his exiled sovereign into France, accompanied by his brothers James, Valentine, and Edward, all of whom served Charles with exemplary fidelity, and even, in some instances, with culpable zeal. Henry and Valentine are reported to have been personally concerned in the assassination of Ascham, the parliamentary envoy at the court of Madrid, who was murdered in the open day at his own house. The former, after the Restoration, received the honour of knighthood from the king, who appointed him one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber: he left one son, Charles, a lieutenant-colonel in the Foot Guards, who sold the Gwernvale estate to his uncle, Mr. Edward Proger, of Hampton Court. This latter gentleman was appointed, early in life, Page of Honour to King Charles I., and, by His Majesty's command, sworn Groom of the Bedchamber to his son, then Prince of Wales, at Paris. Throughout the whole of that eventful period his unbounded fidelity to his royal master sustained no diminution, personally attending him in all the vicissitudes of his fortune; and the affection with which His Majesty regarded him, and the estimation in which he was also held by some of the most distinguished royalists, are evinced by the correspondence that he maintained with them: several letters to him from the king himself, from Prince Rupert, the Duke of Hamilton, the Marquis of Montrose, Lord Cottington, and others, were, in their several autographs, at the time of his death, in the possession of the Venerable Archdeacon Payne, who had also other curious documents relating to Mr. Proger, besides an original portrait of him, by Sir Peter Lely, purchased at a sale of property at Gwernvale, in 1789, and a good painting of his eldest brother, Sir Henry, by Cornelius Jansen. In the year 1650 he was with the king in Scotland, but, with several other noblemen and private gentlemen, was banished thence by a mandate of the estates of parliament, "as an evil Instrument and bad Counsellor of His Majesty's late Father and himself." Still, however, he retained the good opinion of the king, who in the same year rewarded his services by a grant of two thousand acres of land in Virginia; but from this he derived no real benefit, owing to the inability of his royal master to enforce the grant, and his neglecting to confirm it after the Restoration. Lord Orford informs us that Mr. Proger received permission of the king to erect a house in Bushy Park, near Hampton Court, of which he had been appointed keeper, on the condition that at his death it should lapse to the crown. After representing this county in parliament for seventeen years, he at length declined a contest, and withdrew into retirement, in 1679, and, upon the death of his royal master, resigned all public business: he lived for several years after in depressed circumstances, notwithstanding the services he had rendered to two successive monarchs, and died at the advanced age of ninety-two, on the last day of December, 1713. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of—Wells, Esq., of Suffolk, he had a numerous offspring, of whom only three daughters survived: the eldest of these, named Philippa, upon the partition of property which took place after his death, obtained the estate of Gwernvale, which she bequeathed to her husband, Dr. Samuel Croxal, a man of considerable literary attainments, and holding good preferment in the church, who died in 1751, leaving it to a relative, Mrs. Hester Bailiss, with remainder to her niece, married to Mr. John Newby, who soon sold it to Mr. Everest, its late proprietor. As distinguished residents of Crickhowel may be noticed the late Rev. Henry Thomas Payne, archdeacon of Carmarthen, &c., an eminent philologist, antiquary, and topographer; and, at the present time, the Rev. Thomas Price, vicar of Llanvihangel Cwm Dû. The average

CRINOW, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDDEY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Narberth, containing 86 inhabitants. This parish, though in the hundred of Dungleddey, is almost entirely surrounded by that of Narberth, and, with the exception of a very small portion, belongs solely to Roger Eaton, Esq., whose elegant mansion of Park Glâs is situated within its limits. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is a very small and simple edifice, without tower or steeple, and destitute of any architectural ornament.

CROES, a joint township with Berwyn, in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Trêgaron, containing, with Berwyn, 210 inhabitants. This township, the upper part of which is wild, rugged, and mountainous, takes its name from the river Croes, which flows through it, and, after being joined by the river Berwyn, unites with the Teivy a short distance below the town of Trêgaron.

CROESLLWYBIR (CROES-LIBIN), a township in the parish of LLANIDLOES, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (N.) from Llanidloes. The population is included in the return for the parish.

CRONWERE (CRUNWEAR), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Narberth, containing 274 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the confines of the county, and at a short distance to the south of the turnpike road from Laugharne to Narberth. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 16. 10½., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Elidyr, is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, but not distinguished by any architectural features. An average annual expenditure amounting to £58. 6. is applied for the maintenance of the poor.

CRÛGGION (CRÛGION), a chapelry in that part of the parish of ALBERBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. E.) from Welshpool, containing 173 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Alberbury. The chapel is a neat edifice of brick, situated not far from the banks of the Severn. A National school is supported by subscription, in which about forty children are instructed. Methuselah Jones, in 1727, bequeathed a rent-charge of £3. 3. for providing annually ten coats for poor persons of this place. On the loftiest of the Breidden hills, in this chapelry, an obelisk was erected, in 1781, in commemoration of the distinguished naval services of Admiral Lord Rodney, particularly of his defeat of the powerful French fleet in the West Indies, commanded by Count de Grasse. The inhabitants are separately assessed for the maintenance of their own poor: the average annual expenditure is £92. 1.

CUGIAN (GOGOIAN), a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Lampeter, containing 111 inhabitants. This township is situated on the left bank of the river Teivy, which is here crossed by a bridge, and at the western declivity of some elevated ground. It separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £29. 11.

CWM, a parish in the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Rhuddlan, containing 442 inhabitants. The name of this place appears to be derived from the situation of the church and village in a sequestered hollow, enclosed by lofty hills. The parish, which is about three miles in length, and two and a half in breadth, and is partly within the manor of Rhuddlan, belonging to the Bishop of St. Asaph, consists principally of mountainous tracts of common, with only a very small portion of enclosed and cultivated land. The scenery is highly picturesque; and from the hills which surround the village are obtained some fine prospects, extending over the fertile and beautiful Vale of Clwyd, and embracing a view of the Irish sea, and the summits of Snowdon, with the adjacent mountains. The elevated parts of the parish are thought to abound with mineral treasures, and iron-stone has been found, for the working of which a forge and a foundry are now being erected, about a mile and a half from the village. These works will be impelled by a stream from Fynnon Asaph, or "St. Asaph's Well," a spring of great power, the waters of which already turn two corn-mills in the parish, at no great distance from its source, and another stream from which forms the cascade at Dyserth. Slate has also been found in the Cwm mountain, but not of a quality adapted for roofing. The turnpike road from Chester to Holyhead passes within a mile and a quarter of the village. A part of this parish is within the limits of the contributory borough of Rhuddlan. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 5.; and the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £5. 8. 9., and is endowed with £200 royal bounty: they are both in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The tithes of the parish are equally divided between the rector and the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Valacianian, is a plain substantial edifice, without either tower or spire, and, though the exterior walls are kept in good repair by the parish, the interior is in a miserable state of dilapidation: it contains several gravestones, supposed to be sepulchral monuments of Knights Templar; and in the churchyard is an ancient tombstone, on which is a bow sculptured in stone. According to tradition, the renowned Welsh prophet and bard, Davydd Ddû of Hîraddug, so called from a mountain of that name above the church, was buried under one of the walls of the church, in fulfilment of his own prediction, that he should neither be buried in or out of it. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, in connexion with each of which is a Sunday school. The rent of some lands in the parish, producing from £15 to £20 per annum, is appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children: the origin of this benefaction, which is of very ancient date, is not correctly known: it is vested in the Glynne family, and Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart., is the present trustee. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £232. 15.

CWM, a division in the parish of GWYDDELWERN, hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, comprising the united townships of Aelhaiarn, Bonron, Maesgammedd, Maesgwyn, Myarth, Trebâch, and Trefrith, the population of which is returned with the division of Uwchmynydd. This division forms the lower portion of the parish, and the road from Corwen to Ruthin passes through it. The parochial church and village of Gwyddelwern are situated within its limits. It separately supports its own poor.

CWM-COTHY (CWM-COTHI), a hamlet in the parish of CAYO, higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llandovery. The population is returned with the parish. The river Cothi has its source contiguous to it, and in its irregular course in the vicinity passes through a vale, which is distinguished by striking features of great richness and diversity. In this hamlet are the remains of some ancient mines, now called Gogovau mines, supposed to have been worked by the Romans, as the vestiges of an aqueduct for bringing the waters of the Cothi to the excavations are still discernible. Dôlcothy, the seat of John Johnes, Esq., is situated here, and near it is a mineral spring of some repute.

CWMDARE (CWM-DÂR), a hamlet in the parish and newly-created borough of ABERDARE, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. The parochial church, and great part of the village, or town, of Aberdare are situated in this hamlet, which occupies the left bank of the river Cynon, near its source. In the event of Aberdare receiving a charter of incorporation, Cwmdare will be abstracted from the hundred, and necessarily placed within the jurisdiction of the borough. Besides a dreary extent of bare mountain land, it contains very little which is not connected with the town or iron-works in the vicinity: towards the north-west there is a large tract of waste land, at the extremity of which, on the north-western point of the parish, are the Hîrwaun iron-works, and the houses connected with them: the works are situated in another parish, but nearly all the houses are within the limits of this. Here are four almshouses, open to the poor of the whole parish, and endowed with a rent-charge of £5 by Mrs. Elinor Matthews, in 1724.

CWMDŪ (CWM-DŪ), a hamlet in the parish of LLANGONYD, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. by W.) from Bridgend, containing 968 inhabitants. This hamlet, the name of which signifies "the black vale," is situated in a valley, through which flows a tributary of the river Llynvi, and in a wild and mountainous district, remarkable for its fossil and mineral productions. The principal of these are iron-ore and coal; and, owing to the extension of the works, this place has of late years greatly increased in importance and population, the latter of which, in 1821, amounted only to three hundred and seven inhabitants. A tram-road for the conveyance of these articles to the harbour of Porthcawl and the town of Bridgend has been constructed. This hamlet separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £152. 5.

CWM-GARW-LLWYD, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 179 inhabitants, who are almost exclusively employed in agriculture. It forms a small vale, through which a stream flows, and falls into the Towy near Llandilo-Vawr. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £94. 5.

CWMGILLA (CWM-GELLAU), a township in the parish and hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (S. W.) from Knighton, containing, with the lordship of Farrington, 183 inhabitants. The name signifies the hazel valley, which is descriptive of its situation in a small vale, intersected by a stream, which falls into the Teme at Knighton. A part of the township is included within the boundaries of the borough of Knighton. There are two small tumuli of which no satisfactory account can be obtained.

CWM-HÎR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES.—See ABBEY CWM HÎR.

CWM-RHEIDOL (CWM-RHEIDIOL), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 649 inhabitants. The river Rheidol, which gives name to the township, flows through a vale here, remarkable for its varied and picturesque scenery. There are extensive lead mines, which yielded, in 1831, forty-five tons of that metal and sixty tons of ore, and afforded employment to the greater portion of the inhabitants. This township separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £154. 17.

CWM-TOYDDWR (CWM-DAUDDWR), otherwise LLANSANTFRAID CWM-TOYDDWR, a parish in the hundred of RHAIDR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a mile (W. S. W.) from Rhaiadr, containing 867 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the dingle of the two rivers," or "the church of St. Bridget in the dingle of the two rivers," is derived from that of the saint to whom the church is dedicated, and its situation near the confluence of the rivers Wye and Elain, which unite towards the southern extremity of the parish. From this latter circumstance some etymologists have supposed the name to have been originally Cymmer Dau Ddwr, signifying "the junction of two rivers," from which they derive its present appellation. The parish, which is pleasantly situated on the western side of the river Wye, by which it is separated from the town of Rhaiadr, extends nearly ten miles in length, and in the central part is nearly five miles in breadth: of the whole of this extensive tract, a very inconsiderable portion only is under cultivation; the remainder, being chiefly mountainous, affords excellent pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep and herds of cattle, which are reared for the English markets. The scenery in some parts of it is extremely wild, and in others highly picturesque: the higher grounds afford some pleasingly varied and interesting prospects, and some of the loftiest hills command a fine view, extending to the Brecknockshire Beacons, and the mountains of Plinlimmon and Cader Idris. In the vale of the Elain are the Cwm Elain lead mines, discovered in 1796, which have been for some time discontinued; and in other parts of the parish there are some quarries of good slate. The veins of the lead mine run from north-east to south-west; their sides are but imperfectly indurated; and the ore is of the species called galena, contained, with blende, or sulphate of zinc, quartz, &c., in a mixed matrix of quartz and grey mountain rock. The woollen manufacture is carried on upon a very limited scale, affording employment to a small number of persons; and the high road from Rhaiadr to Aberystwith, passing through the parish, gives a facility of intercourse with the neighbouring places. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The vicar receives one-half of the tithes of the parish, with the exception only of the hamlet called the Grange, of which he receives only one-third: the remainder belongs to the impropriator. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, and rebuilt in 1778, is a neat and well-constructed edifice of stone: it is well pewed and ceiled, and has a good gallery. At Nant Wylt, about four miles from the mother church, is a small but well-built chapel of ease, erected in the year 1772. The Rev. Charles Price, Vicar of Llanarth, in the county of Cardigan, in 1719, bequeathed, in trust to the vicar of this parish and the vicar of Nantmel, a house and lands called Llawr y llan, in this parish, directing the produce to be appropriated to the instruction of poor children, and for the preaching of five divinity lecture sermons, in the parish church of this place, on the first Sunday in May, and in the four following months: the school is kept at Rhaiadr, and six boys of this parish are gratuitously instructed in it, in consideration of this bequest. A house called Troed Rhiw, with a few acres of land attached to it, was bequeathed, about a century and a half ago, by John Davies, for the reception of lame, blind, maimed, and infirm poor of this parish: the land now produces £13 per annum, which income, increased by the annual sum of £4, the interest of a sum of money produced by a sale of timber on the estate, is divided among the inmates. Jeremiah Powell charged a farm in this parish with the annual payment of £2 to the poor. There are some remains of a military post within the parish, on the bank of the Wye, nearly opposite to the site of Rhaiadr castle, with which it is said to have had a communication by a subterraneous passage under the bed of the river: part of this intrenchment was demolished in 1830, but an artificial mound is still remaining near the lines, which, at some remote period, was probably the site of the keep of a castle. Vestiges of two ancient chapels are still visible, called respectively Capel Madoc and Aber Hênllau: they are supposed to be of more ancient foundation than the original parish church, and, from their being respectively situated in the two hamlets into which the parish is divided, to have been, previously to the erection of the church, the only places of worship in the parish. The name of a neighbouring farm, called Coed y Mynach, or "the monks' wood," has led to an opinion that there was anciently a monastery at this place; but no satisfactory account of any religious establishment of that kind can now be obtained; and it is more probable that the farm was an appendage to the abbey of Strata Florida, in the adjacent county of Cardigan, to which a road may still be traced over the mountains. A mineral spring, the water of which is strongly impregnated with sulphur, has been recently discovered at Hŷr Nant, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £414.

CWM-TWRCH, a hamlet in the parish of CAYO, higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llandovery. The population is returned with the parish. An old Roman road, called Sarn Helen, leading from Llanio to Llanvair ar y brŷn, can be traced here through the valley of the Twrch. The declivities of the hills are well wooded, especially where the Twrch falls into the Cothi; and the road from Llandovery to Lampeter passes along the left bank of the former stream.

CYFEILIOG (CYFYLLIOG), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W.) from Ruthin, containing 636 inhabitants. It is situated in the southern portion of the county, and is intersected by several small streams, which, rising in the circumjacent hills, unite within the parish, and, flowing in a north-easterly direction, fall into the river Clwyd. It comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land in a good state of cultivation; the surface is varied, and the soil, especially in the lower grounds, is tolerably fertile. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature; and the views, though obstructed in some parts by the intervening heights by which the parish is sheltered, are neither destitute of interest nor void of beauty. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llanynys, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not remarkable for any architectural details. An endowment of £3 per annum has been bequeathed for the instruction of poor children; and the produce of several small charitable donations is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £308.5.

CYLCH-BYCHAN, a hamlet in the parish of ST. DAVID'S, hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (E.) from St. David's, containing 359 inhabitants. It forms one of the four cylchs, or hamlets, into which the parish is divided, the adjunct signifying the smaller hamlet, as compared with Cylch Mawr, or the larger.

CYLCH-GWAELOD-Y-WLAD, a hamlet in the parish of ST. DAVID'S, hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (W.) from St. David's, containing 512 inhabitants. The name denotes that it consists of the lower, or coast, portion of the parish, which is divided into four cylchs, or hamlets, this one forming its western division, and extending along the sea-coast, being the most western part of the principality. The island of Ramsey, on which there is a single farm, is included in this hamlet.

CYLCH-MAWR, a hamlet in the parish of ST. DAVID'S, hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (N. E.) from St. David's, containing 492 inhabitants. The adjunct signifies that it is the larger, in contrast with Cylch Bychan, or the smaller, both forming two of the four cylchs, or hamlets, into which the parish is divided.

CYNNULLMAWR (CYNNULL-MAWR), a township in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL GENEU 'R GLYN, upper division of the hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. E. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 636 inhabitants. This township takes its name from an elevated mountain, at the western base of which the road from Aberystwith to Machynlleth passes: it is bounded on the north by the river Lery. Glánvraed, an old mansion on the left bank of this river, is remarkable as the supposed birthplace of the celebrated antiquary, Edward Llwyd, author of the Archaeologia Britannica, and many other works on the natural history and antiquities of Wales: he also collected a great number of ancient British records, which were afterwards unfortunately destroyed in the fire which consumed Havôd House, in this county. The township is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £219. 14.

CYNNULL-MAWR-LLWYNSWCH, a joint hamlet with Gelludie, in the parish of LLANDAROG, upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. The Gwendraeth Vâch river flows through this hamlet, and is crossed by a bridge on the road from Carmarthen to Llandeby and Pont ar dulais.

CYNON, a joint hamlet with Tâf, in the parish and newly-created borough of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. This hamlet is formed by the long isthmus of elevated ground at the junction of the rivers Cynon and Tâf, being bounded on the west by the former, and on the east by the latter: parallel to these run the Aberdare and Cardiff canals. At the southern extremity of the hamlet the Tâf is crossed by a bridge; and near the same spot an aqueduct conveys the Cardiff canal over that river and the road to Aberdare. The vale of the Cynon is well wooded and picturesque.

CYVOETH Y BRENNIN (CYVOETH Y BRENNIN), a township in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL GENEU 'R GLYN, hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 965 inhabitants. This township, a part of which pays the great tithes to the vicar of Llanvihangel, is the property of the crown, and from that circumstance partially derives its name: there are copper and lead mines within its limits. It separately maintains its own poor: the average annual assessment is £171. 18.

CYVRONNYDD (CYFRONYDD), a township forming a detached part of the parish and liberties of WELSHPOOL, upper division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W.) from Welshpool, containing 56 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Welshpool to Llanvair, on the banks of the river Banw, which empties itself into the Vyrnwy a little beyond Mathraval, nearly four miles to the north. Cyvrannydd Hall, the property and residence of P. Jones, Esq., is delightfully situated amidst thriving plantations, upon the declivity of a hill, the summit of which embraces a pleasing prospect of the beauties of the vale, through which winds the Banw, and the adjacent country, including the hills of Merionethshire. There are remains of fortifications on this and several of the hills in the vicinity. This township is separately assessed for the maintenance of its own poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £30. 3.

D.

DALE, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (S. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 335 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have derived its name from a contraction of De Vale, the name of one of its ancient lords, in whose time it was dignified with the title of a borough, and appears to have enjoyed certain privileges. It still preserves the right of depasturing cattle on a plot of ground, called Dale Meadow, after the lord of the manor has cleared off the hay, which privilege was granted to the holders of burgrave tenements by Henry VII., who, while Earl of Richmond, landed at this place, on his expedition to wrest the crown of England from Richard III. Here he was met by Rhys ab Thomas, who advanced from Carew castle with a well-disciplined and well-appointed band of followers, to join the standard of the earl, with whom he was present at Bosworth Field, and to whose success he materially contributed, not only by his influence in adding to the number of his partisans, but by his valour and discretion in the field. This place is situated on a small bay, forming one side of the entrance into Milford Haven, and affording, in Dale Roads, good anchorage for small vessels, which may ride in safety in two or three fathoms at low water. Block-houses were built here in the reign of Elizabeth, and a chain is said to have been drawn across the mouth of the haven, from St. Anne's to Nangle Point on the opposite side, to obstruct the passage of the Spanish Armada. St. Anne's lighthouses were originally erected here, in 1712, by William Allen, Esq., to whom a lease was granted by the crown for ninety-nine years, which term expired in 1813: they were rebuilt and again opened in 1800. The lantern of one of them contains eleven lights, and has an elevation of one hundred and sixty feet; and that of the other has sixteen lights, at an elevation of one hundred and ninety-five feet. Copper-ore was formerly worked in the parish, but the operations have been discontinued. A small fishery is carried on, employing six boats, which are chiefly engaged in taking lobsters, oysters, and herrings, during their respective seasons; and there is a small trade in the importation of coal and culm from the interior of the county. The parishioners at large have the right of depasturing their cattle on Pickleridge common. The surrounding scenery is of a bold and striking character; and from the higher grounds are obtained some extensive and pleasing views over St. George's channel to the south and east, and of the surrounding country to the north. Dale Castle, formerly the family mansion of the Allens, passed by marriage with the heiress to John Lloyd, Esq., of Mabus, in the county of Cardigan, and is now the property of his grandson, John P. Allen Lloyd Philipps, Esq.: it is an embattled structure, and has been modernized and greatly improved, by the addition of two spacious wings, communicating with the centre by two circular projecting towers; it now forms one of the finest castellated mansions in the county, and, from its situation, is a prominent and interesting object in the scenery of the place. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of J. P. A. Lloyd Phillips, Esq., who is the lay impropriator. The church, dedicated to St. James, and rebuilt in 1761, at the sole expense of John Allen, Esq., is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and contains an elegant font of marble, presented to the parish by the same beneficent individual. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A small portion of land has been bequeathed by an unknown benefactor, the rent of which is annually given to the poor of the parish. Along the cliffs by which this part of the coast is bounded are several remains of ancient encampments, apparently of Danish construction. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £110. 15.

DÂROWEN (DÂR-OWAIN), a parish in the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Machynlleth, containing 961 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies Owain's oak, or forest, is bounded on the north-west by the river Dovey, and on the north-east by the Twymyn, which flows into the Dovey at its northern extremity, and includes about nine thousand acres of land, of which only about four thousand are enclosed and under cultivation, the remainder being in commons, chiefly applied as sheep-walks. A considerable quantity of peat is obtained in it, for consumption in the neighbourhood. There are three lead mines, one in Freeth Cwm Bychan, another at Cwm Dû, and the third at Dylivau, all which were in operation within the last few years, but the quantity of ore produced being inconsiderable, the former two have been discontinued: the manufacture of flannel is carried on here. The turnpike roads from Machynlleth to Newtown, through Carno, and to Welshpool through Mallwyd, run through the western and northern parts of the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, not rated in the king's books, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: it was instituted in the year 1545, by Bishop Robert Warton, at the request of Richard ab Gruffydd, rector. The rectory is a sinecure, rated at £10. 17. 11., also in the gift of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Tudyr, is in the early style of English architecture: it is situated in the township of Noddva, the name of which signifies a place of refuge, its limits being probably described by three stones, one called Careg Noddva, standing about one mile to the east, another large stone, rising nearly three yards above the ground, about a mile to the south, and a smaller one about the same distance north-east. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached to each. One of the Welsh circulating schools is at present (1831) situated at this place. They were established by the Rev. Griffith Jones, rector of Llandowror, in the county of Carmarthen, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, at different places, from which, after they had been held a year or two, or a sufficient time to teach the scholars in them to read, they were to be removed to other places. In this useful design the benevolent founder was assisted by subscriptions from many persons in England and Wales; and, after his death, they were continued by Mrs. Bevan, a benevolent lady of property residing at Laugharne, in the same county, who, at her demise, bequeathed a legacy of £10,000 towards their permanent support: but the validity of the will being disputed by the heir at law, the matter was referred for investigation to the Court of Chancery, and was decided by the Lord Chancellor in favour of the schools, about the year 1810, at which period the principal and interest had accumulated to £30,000 in the three per cents. Trustees, principally residing in the counties of Pembroke and Carmarthen, were appointed, who nominated two visitors, one for North Wales, and the other for South Wales, for the purpose of visiting the schools twice a year, and reporting upon the state of each; according to the tenor of which report they are either continued or removed, being seldom kept more than two years at one place. At the distance of about half a mile westward from the church, on the summit of the hill Vron Gôch, in the township of Noddva, are the remains of an ancient encampment; and on the top of another, called Bwlch Gelli lûs, there is a tumulus, near which, on the sheepwalk of the farm Berllan Deg, a celt and several brazen instruments of warfare were found some years ago. Dr. John Davies, author of the Welsh and Latin Dictionary, and the Welsh Grammar, and one of the translators of the Bible into the Welsh language, was appointed to the sinecure rectory of this parish by Bishop Parry, in 1615; it was also held by Dr. Randolph, Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of London; the present rector is Dr. Luxmoore, Dean of St. Asaph. St. Tudyr, son of Arwystl Gloyf, who flourished in the seventh century, is stated in the Genealogy of the Saints to have been interred here. The wake, or feast, of his dedication is annually observed on the 25th of October, or the Sunday next after it; and the diversion is continued the following day, by what is called Curo Tudyr, "the beating of Tudyr," generally performed by the boys, one of whom carries a long pole, or branch of a tree, upon his shoulder, the rest beating it with clubs, probably to perpetuate the remembrance of the persecution which that saint endured. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £474. 15.

DAVID'S (ST.), or LLANVAES, a parish, composed of the Lower and Upper divisions, each separately maintaining its own poor, the former of which constitutes part of the borough of BRECKNOCK, while the latter is included partly in the hundred of DEVYNOK, the portion in which is designated "the township," and partly in that of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, containing 1321 inhabitants, of which number, 1166 are in the Lower, and 155 in the Upper, division. This parish, which is situated at the confluence of the Tarrell with the Usk, comprises some extensive tracts of arable and pasture land. The scenery is finely varied; and the views from the higher grounds are highly picturesque, comprising a pleasing variety of interesting objects. Frwdgrêch, the elegant seat of Samuel Church, Esq., and Dinas, the residence of John Lloyd, Esq., both of which are in this parish, are described in the article on BRECKNOCK, in which will also be found a more minute account of other objects of importance, locally situated within the limits of the parish of St. David's, but forming conspicuous features in that borough and its environs. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 7½., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Brecknock, to whom the tithes belong. The church, in which a Sunday school is held morning and evening, is situated in the borough of Brecknock. In this parish are almshouses for twelve female decayed housekeepers of the town of Brecknock, founded and endowed by Mrs. Games and Mrs. Walker, which have a walled court in front, and are comfortably fitted up for the inmates, who receive a small stipend. The celebrated Sir David Gam, who accompanied Henry V. to the field of Agincourt, where, by his intrepidity, he saved that monarch's life by the sacrifice of his own, and was knighted on the field of battle, while in the agonies of death, is said to have resided at Newton, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the Lower division of the parish is £179. 17.; and that of the Upper is £180. 1.

DAVID'S (ST.), a city and parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (W. N. W.) from Haverfordwest, 26 (N. W.) from Pembroke, and 265 (W. by N.) from London, containing 2388 inhabitants. This city has been described by several historians as occupying the site of the Roman station

Menapia, both from the evidence of various ancient roads leading in a direction towards it, and the situation of that station as noticed in the Itineraries. But modern writers are of opinion, chiefly from the absence of all military works or other relics of the Romans, that the site of Menapia was nearer the sea, on a sandy tract called "The Burrows," and is now covered by that element, which has encroached considerably upon the shore in the vicinity. That the district now constituting the parish of St. David was inhabited at a very early period is obvious, from the numerous druidical remains with which it abounds. In the fifth century it appears to have been called by the Welsh Mynyw, which is also variously written Menyw and Manyw, and is probably compounded of the words Man and Yw, signifying "small yew trees," which were formerly very plentiful in the vicinity, though divers other etymologies have been proposed. Its Roman name, which was probably a Latinized modification of the British Mynyw, was also altered into Menevia, which is still retained in the style of its bishops, who are called Episcopi Menevensis. The history of the present city commences with that of the saint to whom it owes its name, who is also the patron saint of Wales, and to whom its origin is ascribed. St. David was the son of Xantus, Prince of Caredigion, and Non, daughter of Gynyr, of Caer Gawch in Mynyw, or Menevia, a chieftain who lived about the middle of the fifth century, and who, embracing a religious life, gave all his lands to support the church, which was probably the first endowment of the see of Menevia. The period of David's birth is not with certainty known, but may be assigned to the middle of the fifth century. The author of his life in the Acta Sanctorum considers him to have been born in 445; Cressy in 462; and others at a still later period. In Leland's Collectanea it is related that St. David was baptized by Elveus, Bishop of Menevia; that he was brought up in a place called Hén Mynyw, or "Old Menevia," and that Gistilianus, Bishop of Menevia, was his uncle; from which it appears that this place had been made the seat of an episcopal see at least before David had arrived at years of maturity. Having been advanced to the honour of priesthood, and having long studied in the Isle of Wight, under Paulinus, a disciple of St. Germanus, David proceeded to propagate the truths of Christianity among the Britons, and to assist in uprooting the Pelagian heresy, in which he exhibited such surpassing abilities, whereby he collected around him a body of disciples, many of whom were afterwards canonized for their superior wisdom and piety, that at a great synod held at Llandewy-Brevi, in the county of Cardigan, he was preferred to the archbishoprick of Caerlleon, the capital of Gwent, on account of the increasing infirmities of the holy Dubricius, who then enjoyed that high dignity. David, however, only accepted it at the unanimous request of the bishops, clergy, and laity present at the synod, and on condition that he should be allowed to remove the metropolitan see from Caerlleon to this place, where St. Patrick had already founded a monastery, over which David presided, and which he is said to have held in greater favour than all the other religious houses in the diocese. The archbishop, with the consent of his nephew, the renowned King Arthur, accordingly removed the seat of the primacy to Menevia, called by Giraldus Cambrensis Vallis Rosini, which Capgrave translates "The Rosy valley," and Sir R. Colt Hoare "the Vale of Rhôs," and established it at his college in this vale, near Hén Mynyw, or "Old Menapia;" and the place was afterwards called by his countrymen, from respect to his memory, Tŷ Dewi, "the House of David," or "St. David's," which appellation it has ever since retained. During his primacy he had for his suffragans the bishops of Worcester, Hereford, Bangor, Llandaf, Llanelwy or St. Asaph, Llanbadarn near Aberystwith, called in Latin Paternensis, and Margam; the first two were at an early period accounted English bishopricks, and the two last being dissolved, the succeeding archbishops had only the bishops of the other three Welsh dioceses as suffragans. The period of the death of David, and the age at which he died, are as undetermined as the time of his birth. Pits considers this event to have occurred in the year 544; Giraldus Cambrensis, and John of Tynemouth, in 609; and Bishop Godwin in 647; whilst all concur in ascribing to him the incredible age of one hundred and forty-seven. Usher and his biographer in the Acta Sanctorum are also of opinion that he died in 544; but the former states that he was only eighty-two years old, and the latter ninety-seven. He was interred in the cathedral which he had founded, and many years after his decease was canonized by Pope Calixtus II.; but the distinction which he attained, as patron saint of Wales, is comparatively of modern origin. His immediate successor is stated by Giraldus to have been Ceneauc, or Kenanc, called also Kinothus, who was also interred in the cathedral, and was succeeded by St. Teilo, the celebrated bishop of Llandaf; but in Bishop Godwin's list of successors the name of Eliud appears next to that of David.

The city and cathedral of St. David were repeatedly exposed to the desolating effects of incursive warfare in the early ages, and the events which marked the progress of one had an equal influence on that of the other. In the year 808, during the reign of Cynan Tyndaethwy, they were reduced to ashes by the West Saxons, which disaster was followed by a destructive murrain among the cattle of the surrounding district; and in the reign of Anarawd, in the year 911, St. David's was utterly destroyed by the Danes. On the latter occasion a desperate battle was fought in the vicinity, in which Maylor, one of the Welsh princes, was slain. Bishop Godwin records that, in the time of Samson, the twenty-fifth archbishop, there were seven suffragans to this see, viz., the bishops of Exeter, Bath, Hereford, Llandaf, Bangor, St. Asaph, and Fernes in Ireland: this prelate, in 915, according to Browne Willis, on account of a pestilential disease which then raged here, withdrew to Dol in Brittany, taking his pall with him, where he died; and his successors in the see, either for want of the pall, or for some other reason, were deprived of the title of archbishop, although they still exercised the power of consecrating the Welsh bishops of Llandaf, St. Asaph, and Bangor, until the reign of Henry I., when a Norman ecclesiastic, named Bernard, not chosen by the Welsh clergy, as had been the custom, but forced upon them by the English monarch, yielded an extorted submission to the see of Canterbury, which has continued to the present time; the bishops of St. David's and the other Welsh dioceses being thenceforward suffragans to the primate of all England. The first mention of the archdeaconry of St. David's occurs in this reign, about the year 1128, when it was held by one William, whose successor was the celebrated Giraldus Cambrensis, who was afterwards elected to the bishoprick, but not consecrated. Meanwhile, events of great importance to the city had occurred. In 982, during the reign of Howel ab Ievav, Geofryd, son of the Danish king Harold, laid waste the church of St. David and its possessions; and, towards the close of the same century, the Danes again landed, slew Bishop Ugenau, or Morgenau, and destroyed with fire and sword the inhabitants and their property. The reigning sovereign, whose two sons had been interred here, being unable to restrain the desolating progress of these marauders, was compelled to purchase their departure by paying them a tribute of one penny for every man in his dominions, commonly called "The Tribute of the Black Army," and is said to have died of grief in consequence. In 1077, in the reign of Trahaern ab Caradoc, St. David's was sacked and destroyed by a roving army either of Danes or Norwegians, who landed in great numbers from their ships. But, notwithstanding these disasters, the city rapidly increased in wealth and magnificence, owing principally to the many munificent largesses bestowed at the shrine of its patron saint, two visits to which were anciently deemed as meritorious as one pilgrimage to Rome. The amount of these offerings is reported to have been so great, that it was divided among the clergy of the establishment by measure, to save the trouble of counting it.

In 1077, William the Conqueror invaded Wales with a great army; but not experiencing the slightest opposition from the natives, he, with his accustomed good policy, changed his military expedition into a pilgrimage, and advanced at the head of his troops to this city, where he offered his devotions at the shrine of St. David, and received the homage of the Welsh princes. This shrine was sacrilegiously pillaged and the city plundered in 1087; and, a few years afterwards, the Danes once more landed, plundered and burnt the church, and, taking possession of the surrounding intrenchments, settled here for some time, during which they perpetrated the most cruel outrages in the adjacent district. In 1090, the descent of the Normans on the modern county of Pembroke commenced; and it is probably to the hardy valour of these invaders that the city of St. David's owed the tranquillity which it afterwards enjoyed. During the prelaty of David Fitzgerald, the immediate successor of Bernard, the Norman bishop, who, in the reign of Henry I., had surrendered the archiepiscopal authority of the see into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, King Henry II. came hither, and, having made his offering at St. David's shrine, was entertained by the bishop. Peter de Leia, the successor of Fitzgerald, finding the cathedral church almost in ruins, from the frequent assaults of the Danes and other piratical invaders, pulled it entirely down, in 1180, and built in its stead a new church, dedicated, as the former had been, to St. Andrew and St. David, and which constitutes the greater part of the present edifice. Prior to the preferment of this prelate, the chapter had elected Giraldus Cambrensis, as the successor of his uncle, Bishop Fitzgerald; but the king, unwilling to elevate to that dignity a man of such influence and talents, refused to ratify their choice. The same body, however, on the death of Peter de Leia, again placed Giraldus at the head of a list of four persons, whom they nominated; but his election not being confirmed, the see remained vacant for six years, whilst Giraldus was endeavouring to procure his consecration to it, and it was ultimately filled by Geoffry de Henelawe, prior of Llanthony, whose successor was Iorwerth, or Gervase, by whom the precentorships in the cathedral were founded, about the year 1225, and in whose prelaty the new tower of the cathedral fell down, in November 1220.

During the war between Henry III. and the disaffected barons, Richard Earl of Pembroke, Mareschal of England, and the most powerful of the barons, attacked this city, in 1233, and barbarously put to death all the king's partisans in it. In March 1248, whilst Anselm was bishop, a great part of the cathedral was thrown down by an earthquake. The office of Treasurer of St. David's was founded in 1259, by Bishop Carew, and the dignity of Chancellor in 1287, by Bishop Thomas Becke, who also established other offices in the cathedral, some of which exist at present, though under different names. During the episcopacy of Becke, King Edward I. and Queen Eleanor, in 1284, came on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. David. The next bishop was David Martin, who built a chapel, dedicated to St.

Mary, at the eastern end of the cathedral, still occasionally called Bishop Martin's chapel, in which he was interred. He was succeeded by Henry Gower, Chancellor of England, who erected the magnificent episcopal palace of St. David's, the interesting remains of which are so deservedly admired: he died in 1347, and was interred in a chapel, dedicated to St. John, which he had built for his own sepulture under the rood-loft of the cathedral. His immediate successor was John Thoresby, Chancellor of England, and subsequently Archbishop of York; and Bishop Adam Houghton, who was also Chancellor from 1377 to 1379, was another early successor. The latter drew up certain statutes, which were to be observed in the church of St. David's: he also built St. Mary's College, adjoining the northern front of the cathedral, for a master and seven fellows, and endowed it with £100 per annum, and a separate house for each: to this institution John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was so great a benefactor, as to be reckoned joint founder with the bishop. Bishop Houghton was interred in the chapel of St. Mary; and his second successor was John Gilbert, who was twice appointed Treasurer of England. He was succeeded by Guy Mohun, who was also keeper of the King's Privy Seal, Treasurer of England, and Treasurer of St. Paul's, London. This prelate's immediate successor, Henry Chicheley, afterwards became archbishop of Canterbury, and was accounted the most worthy and benevolent bishop of the age in which he lived. Edward Vaughan, the eighty-second bishop of St. David's, is recorded as the last who contributed materially to the embellishment of the cathedral: he built a most elegant chapel between that of St. Mary and the choir, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity; and adorned various parts of the building with appropriate embellishments: he also erected St. Justinian's chapel, about a mile from the city, and, dying about the year 1521, was interred in his own chapel, where was formerly a brass plate inscribed to his memory. His successor, Richard Rawlins, died in 1535, and was the last bishop buried in the cathedral. Bishop Barlow, the immediate successor of Rawlins, presided over the see thirteen years, during which, in order, as it is said, (by Brown Willis,) successively to provide for his five daughters, who were married to five bishops, he greatly impoverished it, even taking off the roof of the episcopal palace, for the sake of the lead, and thus occasioning so much damage to that magnificent structure, as to require the revenue of the bishoprick for twelve years to repair; but this object was never attempted, so that it now presents a vast pile of picturesque ruins. Bishop Barlow's successor, Robert Farrar, was also a great dilapidator; but after the fall of his patron, the Duke of Somerset, he was imprisoned by the precentor and canons, and, having continued in confinement during the remainder of the reign of Edward VI., was, on the accession of Mary, adjudged an heretick, and burned at the stake at Carmarthen, in 1555. On Farrar's deprivation, Henry Morgan was elected, in 1553, but was ejected on the accession of Elizabeth, and succeeded by Thomas Younge, the precentor who caused the imprisonment of Farrar, and who was driven into exile in Germany, during the persecutions in the reign of Mary, but finally was made Archbishop of York. His successor in this bishoprick was Richard Davies, a man of great learning, and one of the translators of the Bible: he was succeeded by Richard Milbourne, D.D., who was translated to the see of Carlisle in 1621, and was accounted one of the most learned, pious, benevolent, and public-spirited persons of the age. The next bishop was the celebrated William Laud, D.D., who was subsequently elevated to the archbishoprick of Canterbury, and was beheaded on Tower Hill in 1644. His second successor in this see was Roger Mainwaring, who was imprisoned and subjected to great persecution during the parliamentary war, in the midst of which he died, in 1653. About this period, lands of the value of £3547. 4. 8., were alienated by an ordinance of the parliament from the bishoprick, which continued vacant from the death of Bishop Mainwaring to the election of William Lucy, in 1660. Another vacancy, of five years and eight months, occurred in the see, which was terminated in 1704, by the appointment of George Bull, one of the most eminent divines of the last century. Robert Lowth, prebendary of Durham, who was eminently distinguished for his learning and amiable manners, was elevated to this see in 1766, but was translated in that year to Oxford, and thence to London. Samuel Horsley, the one hundred and fifteenth bishop, was appointed in the year 1788: he was a man of great learning, and early distinguished himself by an intimate acquaintance with the mathematical sciences. Amongst his other publications were, a complete edition of Newton's works, and a translation of Hosea: he was translated to Rochester in 1793, and afterwards to St. Asaph. Thus, with the divines who have since succeeded to this bishoprick, has the see of St. David's had the greatest number of prelates of any in the kingdom: of these, twenty-six were archbishops, and twenty-one more, although they did not bear the title, retained archiepiscopal authority over the other Welsh sees; and many others filled the highest civil offices in the state.

The parish comprises the westernmost portion of the great rocky promontory projecting into St. George's channel, and forming the northern boundary of St. Bride's bay, and also the small islands lying off its extremity, which gave to this headland its ancient name of Octopitarum, or Octo-petrarum: these islands, with some sunken rocks, occasion in the intervening channels exceedingly strong currents. They are eight in number, of which seven are mere rocks, called "the Bishop and his Clerks;" and the eighth, which is called Ramsey Island, lies about one mile from the main land, and is about three miles in length and one in breadth. At the southern end of the intervening sound is a dangerous reef of rocks, denominated "The Bitches;" and in the middle of it there is a rock much dreaded, called "The Horse," which is covered at high water. The whole of Ramsey Island is elevated, and at each end rises a lofty hill, imparting to it a grand and romantic appearance, and presenting various picturesque groups of rocks: on the summits of these hills, which command prospects of great extent and magnificence, there are divers remains of antiquity, including intrenchments, carneddau, &c. The island contains much good arable and pasture land, and is amply supplied with water, the principal stream being powerful enough to turn a mill. The "Bishop and his Clerks," three of which afford scanty pasturage for sheep, are appurtenant to Ramsey: they are all included in this parish, and are the property of the bishop. At the eastern end of Ramsey, and scarcely separated from it, are two smaller rocky islands, one termed Ynys y Byry, or "The Kite's Island," and the other Ynys y Cantwr, or "The Precentor's Island," yielding a thick matted herbage, on which a few sheep feed. A little to the north-west of Ramsey there is a bank, which is said to have been formerly noted for its excellent fishery of cod, turbot, soles, &c., long since entirely neglected. The rocky cliffs of this and the other islands are annually the resort of an immense number of migratory birds, including eligugs, razor-bills, puffins, &c., and were anciently likewise distinguished for their breed of falcons. The city of St. David's, exclusively of "the Close," is pleasantly situated on ground sloping gently towards the sea, and at the distance of one mile from it; and consisted formerly of five streets, called respectively High-street, St. Nun's-street, New-street, Ship-street, and Pit-street, but is now reduced in appearance to a mere village, the houses, with very few exceptions besides those of the clergy, being small and meanly built. In the middle of the town stands the High Cross, where the market was formerly held, and funerals were wont to stop, and from which the High-street is continued downward to "the Close," an extensive area at the foot of the hill, which comprises within its precincts the venerable cathedral, the magnificent ruins of the episcopal palace, the habitable houses of some of the dignitaries, and the ruins of several others; the whole exhibiting very interesting remains of the pristine grandeur of the buildings of this ancient city. The Close, which is extra-parochial, is twelve hundred yards in circumference, and was formerly encompassed by an embattled wall, of which there are still some remains: in this wall were four gates, corresponding with the cardinal points; but the only one remaining is the Tower Gate, situated at the bottom of the High-street, and forming the principal entrance into the Close. The small river Allan, which is celebrated for its trout, runs through this area, and is now crossed by a bridge, in lieu of an ancient marble slab, which was polished by the feet of pilgrims, and was superstitiously believed to possess miraculous properties. The only prebendal house now remaining is that of the prebendary of St. Nicholas Penros, besides which there are five other houses for the dignitaries of the cathedral, viz., the precentor, treasurer, chancellor, and the archdeacons of Brecknock and St. David's, which are neat modern buildings, much differing in character from the sacred edifice with which they are connected. This parish is very productive of grain, which in some years is shipped to a considerable extent: a haven is formed by the mouth of the river Allan, at Porth Clais, about one mile from the city, where a pier was constructed, at a very early period, to defend it from the violence of the waves, and was rebuilt in 1722. Of late years the quay has been extended, and the harbour otherwise considerably improved. To this small port, which is a creek to that of Milford, belong seven vessels, averaging about twenty-five tons' burden, which are principally employed during winter in conveying grain (chiefly barley) and butter to Bristol and other ports on the Severn, and during summer in bringing limestone, coal, and culm from the shores of Milford Haven. In the year 1830, three thousand quarters of grain and two hundred and fifty casks of butter were shipped from this place. The market, which was formerly held on Monday and Thursday, has long been discontinued: fairs are held on March 12th and August 5th. St. David's has no municipal corporation, although there is an officer called mayor, whose duty consists only in collecting the chief-rents belonging to the bishop, within the limits of the city, which is co-extensive with one of the four cylchs, or divisions of the parish, called Cylch y Drêw, or "the Town Hamlet," the remaining three being denominated Cylch-Mawr, Cylch-Bychan, and Cylch-Gwaelod, "the Larger, the Smaller, and the Lower Hamlets," and all united for the maintenance of the poor. During the recent debates in parliament on the subject of amending the representation of the people, it was proposed by the first Reform Bill that St. David's should be contributory to Haverfordwest, but that arrangement was altered, and it is now wholly omitted in the Act.

The diocese appears anciently to have comprised the whole of South Wales, and is still of very great extent, containing the four counties of Brecknock, Cardigan, Carmarthen, and Pembroke; the whole of Radnorshire, except six parishes, which belong to the see of Hereford; the deanery of Gower, in the county of Glamorgan, which contains twenty-two parishes; the hundred of Ewyaslacy, in the county of Hereford; and two parishes in each of the counties of Monmouth and Montgomery. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop (who is also dean), a precentor, chancellor, treasurer, four archdeacons, eight prebendaries, and six canons curial; a sub-chanter, four priest-vicars, four lay-vicars, an organist, six choristers, a master of the grammar school, verger, porter, sexton, and a keeper of the church during time of service. Of these, the precentor, chancellor, and treasurer are, by virtue of their dignities, styled Residentiarii Nati; and, in addition to them, three other canons are chosen by the rest of the members, as vacancies occur, from among the archdeacons, prebendaries, and canons curial: these six residentiaries constitute the chapter, and hold an audit annually on the festival of St. James, which has been kept for several ages, and at which they are obliged by the statutes to be present, either in person or by proxy, to receive rents, impose fines, &c. On this occasion they keep by turns a public table, and he at whose expense the entertainment is provided is called "The Master of the Fabrick." The precentor is invested with the privileges of dean, and accordingly takes his seat in convocations, and subscribes in chapter next after the bishop, who is properly dean, and has a stall assigned to him at the entrance into the choir of the cathedral, on the right hand side. Divine service is performed in the cathedral by the eight vicars choral and four choristers, under the direction of the sub-chanter, who has a stall among the prebendaries. The sub-chanter and vicars choral are of themselves a body corporate, having lands of their own, of which they grant leases under a separate seal, without the interposition of the chapter. The bishops formerly exercised almost sovereign authority throughout the diocese, particularly over the province of Dewisland, or honour of Pebidiawg, in which their jurisdiction was more absolute than the minor regality of a lordship marcher. In their instruments they called the inhabitants of Dewisland, including St. David's, their subjects; and such as dared to violate rashly, or infringe upon, their statutes, were punished by them. The mayor of St. David's acted in entire subordination to the bishops, whose statutes and mandates it was his duty to enforce; and he held his court in the building which formed the south-east wing of the Tower Gate. The bishop's seneschal, or steward, was usually some person of distinction in the country; and within his jurisdiction the prelate had several inferior courts, from which an appeal lay to the supreme court at his castle of Lawhaden, which place still confers on the bishops the dignity of a baron of the United Kingdom. In some cases the bishop exercised the power of inflicting capital punishment; but on the other hand he was bound to garrison and protect the city and its suburbs, and, by his military tenure, was compelled to be present in war; on which occasion he made his progress with great state, being accompanied from this city, on the first day of his march, by the burgesses, carrying with them the relics and shrine of St. David, so far as permitted their return that night. The privileges of the sanctuary of St. David's were very extensive and much respected: the sanctity of the place was not confined to the limits of the Close, or of the city, but the whole parish, emphatically called in Welsh Plwyf Tŷ Ddewi, "the parish of the house of St. David," was overspread with chapels, crosses, and holy wells, some of the last being still held in great repute. In addition to the sumptuous episcopal palace of St. David's, the bishops had castles at Trêvdyn, about six miles distant, Llan-Vydd (now Lamphey), and Lawhaden, in Pembrokeshire; at Llandygwidd, in Cardiganshire; Llanddewi, in Brecknockshire; and Aberguilly, in Carmarthenshire; all which are now in ruins, except the last, where an establishment is still kept up. At present the bishop holds his consistorial court at Carmarthen for the whole of the diocese, at Brecknock for the counties of Brecknock and Radnor, at Haverfordwest for Pembrokeshire, and at Cardigan for Cardiganshire: at each of the last three places the principal registrar appoints a deputy.

The cathedral, dedicated to St. Andrew and St. David, is a magnificent cruciform structure, consisting of a nave, with aisles extending nearly the whole length of the building, a choir and chancel, north and south transepts, and a large square tower of elegant proportions rising from the intersection of the nave and transepts, surmounted by pinnacles at the angles. The exterior, with the exception of an early Norman doorway on the north side, is wholly in the various styles of English architecture: the western front was rebuilt, towards the close of the last century, by Mr. Nash, and displays a fantastic intermixture of these various styles. The principal entrance is through a grand doorway at the west end, called the Bishop's Door; but this is seldom used, the common entrance being by a handsomely enriched porch on the south side. The nave is separated from the aisles by a row of five massive pillars on each side, alternately round and octagonal, with corresponding pilasters at each end, supporting six arches richly ornamented in the later Norman style, above which is a double series of Norman arches, reaching to the roof of the nave, and occupied in the upper part of the higher range by the windows of the clerestory, every alternate one of which, on the south side, has been closed: there is also a range of five elegant windows, in the English style of architecture, in each of the aisles, opposite the arches which separate them from the nave. The roof of the nave is of Irish oak, divided into compartments, and ornamented with a carved pendent in the centre of each. The choir is entered from the nave by a flight of steps, leading to an arched narrow passage under the rood-loft, the front of which is adorned with a handsome stone screen, erected by Bishop Gower, and accounted, both for design and execution, one of the finest specimens of decorated English architecture: it is comprised within the four lofty arches that support the tower, three of which are of ancient English architecture, and the fourth, which is occupied by the rood-loft, and is supposed, from the decayed state of its pillars, to be the only one remaining of those on which the tower was anciently built by Bishop Peter de Leia, is in the Norman style, but all of them spring from Norman columns: it contains twenty-eight stalls, which are of oak, and the bishop's throne, which was executed at the expense of Bishop Morgan, and, for elegance of design and carved decorations, is probably only surpassed by that in Exeter cathedral: in the north arch, and not in the rood-loft, as is usual, is placed the organ. The chancel, which is separated from the choir, by a low screen, contains a beautiful Mosaic pavement, composed of small tiles, inscribed with religious mottoes and other ingenious devices: the high altar is placed under an elegant design of three arches, said to have been formerly filled with painted glass, which, combined with the elegant window above, consisting of three lancet-shaped compartments, and adorned with the most elaborate tracery, had a rich and beautiful appearance. Immediately beyond the chancel is the chapel erected by Bishop Vaughan, in the reign of Henry VIII., an exquisite specimen of the later style of English architecture, almost rivalling in richness and elegance the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey: the roof, which is of freestone, is beautifully designed in fan tracery, and the sculpture, from the great care with which it is preserved by the chapter, appears almost as fresh and perfect as when first executed. Beyond a small intervening passage, and forming the eastern extremity of the cathedral, is the decayed chapel of St. Mary the Virgin, built by Bishop Martin, which has been unroofed for some years, and is rapidly falling into ruins. In the same state also are the aisles eastward from the transepts, which were greatly damaged by Cromwell's soldiers, who unroofed them for the sake of the lead, which they sold to one of their partisans, then in possession of the priory estate at Cardigan, who made use of it in covering the church and priory-house there. From the north aisle a considerable flight of steps forms the ascent into what was formerly the chapter-house, but is now used as a grammar school. Under it is a room of the same dimensions, having an elegant groined roof, and probably that in which the entertainments of the chapter took place at their audits, there being at the upper end a dais, as in colleges and ancient baronial mansions. Both these ruined aisles retain vestiges of their groined roofs, with windows of beautiful proportions in the English style of architecture, and other corresponding decorations. The transepts have no distinguishing architectural feature: in the north transept stood formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Andrew, and in the south was one dedicated to St. David, and now called the Chanter's. The north-west door of the cathedral opens into a space much obstructed by some heavy and unsightly buttresses, which it was found necessary to erect, for the support of this part of the building. Between this and the ruins of St. Mary's College stood the cloisters, of which only the pillars of the arches are now remaining. The extreme length of the cathedral, including the chapels of Bishop Vaughan and St. Mary, is two hundred and seventy-four feet and a half; its breadth along the transepts, one hundred and eighty-four feet, and the width of the nave and aisles seventy-six feet. Among the monuments are several of great beauty and antiquity: the celebrated shrine of St. David, now scarcely distinguishable from other ancient tombs, occupies a recess on the north side of the chancel, consisting of three arches in the ancient style of English architecture, resting on pillars of great delicacy and beauty, in the central one of which was placed an image of the saint, and on each side were those of St. Patrick and St. Denis: beneath a horizontal slab were four quatrefoil holes, for the offerings of pilgrims, of which two have been closed; and the whole was formerly enriched with precious stones, and veiled with silken drapery. Under the rood-loft are three recumbent effigies, one of which, formerly enclosed on two sides by a railing of brass, is that of Bishop Gower, and the other two are attributed by Browne Willis to Thomas Wallensis, who died in 1255, and Richard de Carew, who died in 1280, though other writers have assigned them to different persons. In the area of the chancel stands the altar-tomb of Edmund Earl of Richmond, the eldest son of Owen Tudor, by Catherine, Queen of Henry V., and father of Henry VII., on which were formerly his effigy and various escutcheons and other ornaments in brass, which were removed by the parliamentarians, who stripped the cathedral of many of its costly decorations: the earl was first interred in the monastery of Grey friars, at Carmarthen, on the dissolution of which his remains are said to have been removed to this place. On the floor of the south side of this portion of the building are the recumbent effigies of Bishops Iorwerth and Anselm; and, under recesses on each side of the altar, are figures of two knights in armour, well executed in freestone. That on the south side, which is in good preservation, is interesting as the memorial of Rhys ab Gruffydd, last prince of South Wales, who died in 1196: the effigy represents a man rather advanced in years, in a recumbent posture, his vizor raised, and his head supported by a helmet, with a sword suspended at his side by a rich belt, a lion rampant sculptured on his breastplate, and another lion supporting his feet. The other effigy is that of a Welsh chieftain, named Rhys Gryg, and represents a younger man, similarly accoutred. Near it is the handsome tomb of Treasurer Lloyd, who died in the reign of James I. In the roofless aisle on the north side of the chancel are the mutilated effigies of a Knight Templar and a monk, another effigy with an inscription much defaced, and two arched ornamented recesses. Beneath a richly adorned canopy, on the south side of the dilapidated chapel of St. Mary, lie the remains of its founder; and on the opposite side is the tomb of Bishop Houghton. The decayed aisle on the south side of the chancel contains the monuments of various dignitaries of the cathedral, one of which is supposed to be the effigy of Giraldus Cambrensis, who was interred here. In the north transept, in which there is an effigy of some dignitary, many relics of antiquity, found in the cathedral, and some of them very curious, are deposited. In this part of the building there is a place separated by a railing, said to have been anciently used as a penitentiary; and in the wall are some round holes, by means of which the voices of the priests officiating in the choir might be heard by the inmates. Near the west end of the cathedral stands a building, erected towards the close of the last century, as a chapter-house; but, from the inelegance and impurity of its style of architecture, and as it obstructs one of the finest views of the venerable cathedral, it has been the object of general censure. Besides a room in which the affairs of the chapter are transacted, it comprises a handsome apartment, forty-two feet long, in which the audit entertainments of the chapter take place, with kitchens, cellars, &c., the whole being surmounted by a fancifully ornamented spire. The records of the minor chapter are kept in a room over the porch on the south side of the cathedral.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Upper Chapter of St. David's. The cathedral is used as the parish church, divine service being performed in the nave four times every Sunday, twice in the English, and twice in the Welsh language. Formerly there were several small chapels in the parish, most of them situated near the sea-side, adjacent to the landing-places, so as to attract the devotion of seamen and passengers; and the offerings received at them were carried to the cathedral, and there divided every Saturday among the canons and priests. Of these, the names of four have been preserved, viz., St. Justinian's, St. Non's, Capel y Pystill, and Capel y Gwyrhyd. St. Justinian's is said to have been built by Bishop Vaughan, and now forms a very interesting ruin in a beautiful and romantic situation: there are also some remains of St. Non's. There are two places of worship each for Calvinistic Methodists and Independents, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school attached to the cathedral affords instruction to six choristers, the number fixed by Bishop Morgan, in 1501, who conferred upon it a handsome endowment, which, however, it lost at the time of the Reformation, by the act for the suppression of chantries: the master is appointed by the upper chapter, and receives from that body a stipend of £20 per annum; and each of the choristers receives £3. 8. per annum from the same source. Another free school has been established by the upper chapter, from whose funds it is principally supported: there are at the present time upwards of eighty boys and fifty girls in this school. St. David's is one of the four parishes participating in the munificent bequest of the late Dr. Jones, made in the year 1698, for the relief of the poor and the ap-

Winchester, whose conduct towards his vassals was highly oppressive, in depriving them of several of the privileges conferred by Lacy. On the execution of Spencer, this lordship was again forfeited to the crown, and was conferred by Edward III. on Roger Mortimer, Earl of March. This nobleman having suffered the same fate as his two predecessors, that monarch assigned the lordship to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, who died in 1333; and on the reversal of the attainder of the Earl of March, it was restored to his grandson Roger, and, passing to Richard Plantagenet, Earl of Cambridge, by marriage with Anne, sister of Roger, the last Earl of March, it came to the house of York, and thus became vested in the crown. During the war between the rival houses of York and Lancaster, Denbigh was held for Henry VI. by his half-brother, Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, from whom it was taken by the Yorkists in 1460; but in 1468, Pembroke, returning with an army of two thousand Welshmen, burnt the town in revenge. Leland informs us that Edward IV. was besieged in the castle, from which he was permitted to retire only upon condition of leaving the kingdom for ever. The castle appears to have remained from this time in the possession of the crown, till the year 1563, when Elizabeth granted it, with the lordship, to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, whom she created Baron of Denbigh. The conduct of this nobleman rendered him obnoxious to the inhabitants, whom his extortions drove into open rebellion against his authority: various tumultuary proceedings took place, in which some of the gentlemen resident in the neighbourhood being implicated, were tried and beheaded. The queen, in order to allay the strong feelings of discontent which the rapacity of the earl had excited, secured to the tenants by charter, in the nineteenth year of her reign, the quiet possession of their property within the borough, and conferred upon the burgesses several new and valuable privileges; and the earl, with a view to make some satisfaction for the evils he had inflicted, and to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants, commenced at his own cost the erection of an elegant chapel in the castle, of which he laid the first stone on the 1st of March, 1579, as appears from a foundation stone now in the south-east corner of the building. This edifice, which was intended as a parochial church for the inhabitants, was from some circumstance not completed, and the walls, which had been raised to a considerable height, were left to moulder into ruin.

On the subsequent attainder of the Earl of Leicester, the castle and lordship again reverted to the crown; and from this time till the commencement of the civil war of the seventeenth century, very few circumstances of historical interest are recorded. In 1643, the castle was garrisoned for the king, at the sole expense of the inhabitants of Denbigh and the gentry resident in the vicinity, and the custody of it was given to William Salusbury, a gentleman in the neighbourhood, who repaired it at his own expense, and raised and maintained an armed force sufficient to resist every effort made by General Mytton to reduce it for the parliament. The royalists retained possession of the castle, which after the disastrous battle of Rowton Moor, in September 1645, afforded an asylum to the vanquished monarch, who occupied for two nights the tower, now in ruins, which from that circumstance was called Siambr y Brenin, or "the royal apartment." On the first of October, in that year, the parliamentarians obtained an important advantage over the royalists, within sight of the castle, on which they afterwards made an unsuccessful attack, that fortress having resisted all their efforts to obtain possession of it, and after the battle afforded an asylum to the wounded royalists who were left upon the field. In 1646, the parliamentarians obtained a victory over the king's forces at Llanrhaiadr, about two miles from Denbigh; but they made no impression on the castle, which the garrison continued to defend with unabated intrepidity, till September 1646, when, in obedience to a special order from the king, dated at Newcastle, the governor capitulated on honourable terms, and, after the treaty was signed, delivered the keys to General Mytton, on the 26th of October; this being the last fortress which held out for the king. Soon after the Restoration, the fortifications were dismantled by order of Charles II. William III. granted the castle and lordship of Denbigh, together with several large possessions in Wales, to the Earl of Portland, which excited a considerable ferment among the inhabitants, who having sent a petition to parliament, which gave rise to some animated debates in the House of Commons, the grant was rescinded, and the castle and lordship are still under the superintendence of a steward appointed by patent from the crown.

The town is picturesquely situated nearly in the centre of the rich and beautiful Vale of Clwyd, partly at the base, and partly on the acclivity, of a steep, isolated, rocky eminence, the summit of which is crowned by the venerable remains of the castle. At a distance it presents an interesting appearance, which, however, is not entirely sustained on entering the town. It consists of three principal and several smaller streets and lanes, and is well paved and lighted, but only scantily supplied with water, which is brought from several springs, each at some distance from the more respectable portions of the town. Leland informs us that there were formerly several streets within the walls, but that, at the period at which he wrote, namely, in the reign of Henry VIII., most of the houses were in a dilapidated condition, or wholly removed. The environs abound with beautiful and richly varied scenery; the air is remarkably salubrious; the land in the vicinity is rich and in a high state of cultivation; and in the immediate neighbourhood are numerous splendid seats and elegant villas, inhabited by opulent families, whom the advantages of its situation have induced to select Denbigh for their residence. Considerable improvements are now in progress, by widening the narrower streets and excavating the rock, by which some good levels have been obtained, and various other advantages gained. The great Eisteddvod, or congress of bards, was held here on the 16th and two following days of September, 1828, and was honoured by the presence of His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, and most of the nobility and gentry of the surrounding country. The proceedings were opened by reading the old proclamation, usual on such occasions; after which the prize compositions were read, and the medals were distributed by some of the ladies to the successful candidates. The Duke of Sussex, on his arrival on the second day, was met by the corporation at the con-finer of the borough, where an address was read and the freedom of the borough presented to His Royal Highness, who, having returned a suitable reply, proceeded to the area beneath the castle, where the competitors recited their englynion, and displayed their trials of skill in performing on the harp: some of the most eminent vocalists from the metropolis were engaged at the festival, which was also enlivened by the Denbighshire band, during the intervals of the public performances. A Welsh literary society was formed here a few years ago, which now languishes for want of sufficient support: a news-room and reading-room have been for some time established, to which the terms of subscription are £2.2. per annum. The trade is principally confined to the supply of the inhabitants, for whose use commodities of every kind are brought by land carriage from the port of Rhuddlan, eight miles distant. Some tanneries are carried on to a considerable extent; and on the banks of a stream, at a small distance from the town, are two small cotton-mills, principally employed in spinning for the manufacturers at Manchester. The manufacture of gloves and shoes, from skins made at Dôlgelley and other places, was formerly carried on here to some extent: about seven thousand dozen pair of gloves were annually sent to London, Bristol, and other places; and the shoes were sent to Liverpool, and there shipped for the West Indies, &c. A most extensive bleaching establishment was erected at Llewini, in 1780, by the Rt. Hon. Thomas Fitzmaurice, who, in order to encourage his tenantry in Ireland, and to promote the national manufacture, received his rents in brown linen cloth, which was sent to this place to be bleached; and for this purpose he erected, at an expense exceeding £20,000, one of the most complete and elegant structures of that kind in the kingdom, in which, under the immediate superintendence of the proprietor, more than four thousand pieces of Irish linen were bleached annually. After his decease, the works were carried on by some persons from Lancashire, for a few years; but this extensive concern has been discontinued, and the buildings have been taken down. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday (the former being the principal), and are plentifully supplied with provisions, which are sold at a moderate price: fairs are held on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, May 14th, June 28th, July 18th, September 25th, and the second Wednesday in November.

The first charter of incorporation obtained by the inhabitants was granted by Henry Lacy, in the reign of Edward I., and was confirmed by Edward III., who conferred on the inhabitants additional privileges, which were subsequently confirmed by Richard II., Henry IV., Henry VI., Richard III., Henry VII., Henry VIII., Elizabeth, and Charles II.: by the two last of these charters the government is vested in two aldermen, a recorder, two bailiffs (who are also sheriffs), two coroners, and twenty-five common-councilmen, assisted by a town-clerk and other officers. The aldermen are annually chosen, at Michaelmas, from among the common-councilmen, by whom the recorder is elected; the common-councilmen, as vacancies occur, are chosen by the burgesses at large, and the town-clerk by the council, though the charter contains a reservation in favour of the king. The aldermen are justices of the peace, exercising exclusive jurisdiction within the borough, the limits of which, as defined by the charter, extend to the distance of one mile and a half in every direction from the centre of the town, including the parish of Denbigh, formerly called Whitchurch parish, and parts of the parishes of Hênllan and Llanrhaiaadr: in the following year they succeed to the coronership. This borough first received the elective franchise in the 27th of Henry VIII., and in the year following Ruthin and Holt were made contributory boroughs, since which time they have continued jointly to return one member to parliament: by the late act for amending the representation of the people, Wrexham has been added to this district of boroughs. The right of election is vested in the resident burgesses, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, amounting at present to three hundred and forty-eight, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which were not altered by the late Boundary Act, is two hundred and sixty: the bailiffs are the returning officers. The freedom is obtained only by gift of the corporation, who acknowledge no inchoate right in sons of freemen, apprentices, or others. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, for determining on all offences, except such as are capital, arising within the borough; and a court of record is held every alternate Friday, in which the bailiffs preside, for the recovery of debts and the determination of pleas to any amount: the process in this latter court is by attachment against goods for debts of £2 and upwards. A court baron for the lordship is held by prescription, every three weeks, under the steward, who also appoints a recorder, in which debts to the amount of forty shillings and upwards are recoverable: this court has also the power of attaching goods, and, in default of special bail, of issuing a writ of fiery facias, for levying on them for the debt and costs. The Easter and Michaelmas quarter sessions for the county are held here. The town-hall, which is situated in the centre of the market-place, was erected in 1572, by Robert Earl of Leicester, and was considerably improved and enlarged in 1780: it is an extensive and commodious building, comprising in the lower part a covered area for the use of the market, above which are the council-chamber, in which the business of the corporation is transacted, and a court-room, in which are held the quarter sessions and court of record for the borough, and the Easter and Michaelmas sessions for the county.

The living consists of a discharged rectory and vicarage, united by an act passed in the 29th and 30th of Charles II., in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £23. 17. 3½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The ancient parochial church, dedicated to St. Marcellus, and now in a very dilapidated condition, is situated at Whitchurch, about a mile from the town, from which place the rectory was transferred by act of parliament to Denbigh, which was made the head of the parish. In the porch of this church are two monumental effigies, in brass, and in a kneeling posture, of Richard Myddelton, of Gwaynynog, governor of Denbigh castle, in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, and of his wife Jane, both of whom were here interred; the latter died in 1565, and the former ten years subsequently. In the body of the building there is an ill-executed mural monument to the memory of the learned Welsh antiquary, Humphrey Llwyd, of Foxhall, near Denbigh, who is represented kneeling beneath a range of small arches, and in Spanish costume. He was born in 1527, and, in addition to his great skill in physic and music, is celebrated as an excellent rhetorician, a sound philosopher, and a profound antiquary: he was representative in parliament for his native place, and, dying prematurely, was interred here in 1568. There is also a large altar-tomb to the memory of Sir John Salusbury, and his lady, the former of whom died in 1578. A neat mural monument on the western wall has been erected, by the Gwyneddigion Society in London, to the memory of Thomas Edwards, of Nant, commonly called Twm o' Nant, the celebrated Cambrian poet, who died on the 3rd of April, 1810, at the age of seventy-one, and was interred in the churchyard. All parochial duties are now performed at the chapel of St. Hilary, within the walls of the castle, with the exception of funerals, which still take place at Whitchurch, there being no cemetery attached to the former. The chapel of St. Hilary is a spacious structure, in the later style of English architecture, with various modern additions, by which its original character, especially in the northern part, has been materially destroyed. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists: that belonging to the Calvinistic Methodists is large and commodious. The free grammar school was founded in 1727, by subscriptions from thirty-three individuals, amounting to £340. 2., which was vested in the purchase of an estate in the parish of Tremerechion, county of Flint, now under the management of three trustees: the representatives of the original subscribers have the privilege of nominating one boy for every £5 so subscribed: the present income is £70 per annum, and there are twenty boys on the foundation. The Blue-coat charity school was founded, pursuant to the will of Mrs. Oldfield, dated in 1714, whereby she bequeathed lands in the parish of Llanrhaiadr, now producing £90 per annum, for its endowment, which was subsequently augmented by a bequest of £200 by Mr. Morgan Evans, with which land, now producing £22 per annum, has been purchased: there are twenty-four boys upon the foundation, who are clothed and educated from these funds. A National school in connexion with the parent institution, built by subscription in 1816, and in which eighty-six boys and one hundred girls are instructed, has been incorporated with the Blue-coat charity school, and is principally supported by subscription. Numerous charitable bequests have been made for distribution among the poor, amounting in the aggregate to more than £1700; but nearly the whole has been lost by mismanagement or neglect.

Contiguous to the town are the remains of a priory of Carmelite, or White friars, founded before the year 1289, and dedicated to St. Mary, by John Salusbury, of Lleweni, who, from an inscription on a mutilated brass plate, discovered some time since, appears to have been buried in the conventual church of the priory, which was the mausoleum of the founder's family until the period of the Reformation. The remains consist principally of the church, now converted into a malt-house, of which the eastern window is a fine composition, in the later style of English architecture, and in excellent preservation: the roof also, which is a beautiful specimen of carved oak, is still entire. Various mutilated effigies, and fragments of tombs, bearing inscriptions in some instances much defaced, have been discovered among the ruins of this once stately structure. The castle is situated on the summit of the Caled-Vryn, an isolated limestone rock, rising abruptly to the height of two hundred and forty feet from the western boundary of the Vale of Clwyd, and encloses an area of considerable extent: the principal entrance is on the north, under a lofty and magnificent arch, which is nearly entire, and flanked by two large towers, now in ruins; above it is a niche, in which is a robed figure of the founder, Henry Lacy, in a sitting posture: the whole of the rooms and towers are in a state of the utmost dilapidation. The citadel is surrounded with walls, a mile and a quarter in circumference, which enclose the whole of the ancient town: the principal entrance is on the north-west, and is defended by two majestic towers, which are nearly entire: from these the walls extend round the brow of the hill, on the most elevated and precipitous parts of which numerous lofty towers have been erected, forming together one of the strongest bulwarks in the kingdom. There were two gates on the line of wall, called the Exchequer gate and the Burgeses' gate, the former from having been the place where the court for the lordship was held, and the latter from having been appropriated to the same use by the burgeses. Within these walls are the ruins of the church, or chapel, founded by the Earl of Leicester, and the chapel of St. Hilary, formerly appropriated to the use of the garrison, and now the parochial church. The former appears to have been of very large dimensions: the walls enclose a considerable area, now covered with grass, in which horses and cattle are depastured: of the original building one lofty arched gateway alone remains, of which, according to a vulgar prophecy, the key-stone will one day fall on the head of the most illustrious man in Denbigh. Within the walls of the fortress are numerous cottages, which materially diminish the interest commonly excited by these extensive ruins; and on the south-west front of the castle, and on the boundary wall on this side, are an extensive terrace and bowling-green, commanding one of the richest and most interesting views of the fertile Vale of Clwyd, embracing the whole of the eastern portion of this beautiful and finely varied tract, and terminated by the ocean at Llandulas bay, and on the south by the whole range of the mountains of Clwyd, with their numerous camps and tumuli. On this delightful spot, the grand congress of the Bards, called the Great Eisteddvod, was held in 1828.

According to Leland, a chapel of ease was built here by a person named Fleming, after whom it was called Capel Fleming; and near it anciently stood an almshouse, founded by the same individual, and built of hewn stone, which, in Leland's time, had already fallen into decay: no traces of either of these buildings are now visible. Among eminent men who have been connected with this place, in addition to those already noticed, was Sir Hugh Myddelton, who was born at Galt Hill, within half a mile of the town: he was alderman of Denbigh in 1597, and in the following year presented the corporation with two maces, and two elegant cups of silver. In 1608, Sir Hugh succeeded in bringing the New River to London, upon which occasion he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1622 was raised to the baronetage: he represented the borough in many successive parliaments, and died in 1631. In the park of Gwynnynog, about two miles from the town, a monument, consisting of a tall Grecian urn, resting on a square pedestal, has been erected to the memory of Dr. Samuel Johnson: on one side is inscribed the time of his death, and on the other an inscription records that the spot was often dignified by the presence of that great moralist, whose writings, "exactly conformative to the principles of Christianity, gave ardour to virtue and confidence to truth." Denbigh gives the title of earl to the family of Fielding. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £917. 3.

DENBIGHSHIRE, a maritime county of NORTH WALES, bounded on the north by Flintshire, the Irish sea, and a detached part of Carnarvonshire; on the west by Carnarvonshire; on the south by Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire; on the south-east by the English county of Salop; on the east by a detached portion of Flintshire; and on the north-east by the English county of Chester. It extends from 52° 48' to 53° 18' (N. Lat.), and from 2° 54' to 3° 47' (W. Lon.); and includes an area, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, of three hundred and eighty-seven thousand six hundred statute acres, or nearly six hundred and six square miles. The population, in 1831, was 83,167.

At the period of the Roman invasion of Britain, the territory now forming the county of Denbigh, in Welsh called Sir Dinbech, was included in the country of the Ordovices, a people who, according to Whitaker, extended their dominion over North Wales, from the districts now forming the county of Salop, a great part of which, on their advance towards the north-west, fell into the possession of the Cornavii. Under the Roman sway it formed a portion of Venedotia, one of the minor divisions of the great province of Britannia Secunda, but retains hardly any trace of its occupation by that people. No station is known to have been situated within its limits; and the only roads connected with it were, a branch of the Watling-street, which crossed the northern parts of it, from the station Varis, at Bodvari, on the western confines of Flintshire, to that of Conovium, at Caerhên, near Aberconway, in Carnarvonshire; and the Via Devana, which, from the station Deva, at Chester, passed southward within or near the eastern confines of Denbighshire towards that of Nidus, at Neath, in Glamorganshire. Nothing of importance is recorded concerning this territory until the reign of Offa, the Anglo-Saxon king of Mercia, who, to put an end to the predatory incursions made by the Welsh into the western parts of his dominions, led a powerful army against them, pursued them to their fastnesses, and extorted a peace on his own terms: by these means he annexed to his former dominions extensive districts, until then possessed by the native Britons, which he colonized with a Saxon population, and separated from the territories of the Welsh by the vast ditch and rampart which bears his name, extending from the æstuary of the Dee to the banks of the Wye, and including in the Mercian territory part of the present county of Denbigh. To the eastward of this is another similar boundary line, running nearly parallel with it, at a distance varying from five hundred yards to three miles, and called Wat's Dyke, of the formation of which there is no authentic record. Offa's Dyke, however, prevented not the hostile incursions of the Welsh into the Saxon territories; and the Saxons retaliated by making dreadful ravages on the more accessible parts of the country of the Cymry. Egbert, in the year after his accession to the throne of Wessex, entered North Wales with a formidable army, devastated the whole country to the foot of the Snowdon mountains, and seized upon the seigniory of Rhyvonioc, in Denbighland. On the death of Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, sovereign of all Wales, the greater part of this county became included in the principality of North Wales, called by the Welsh Gwynedd, and the seat of the government of which was at Aberfraw, in Anglesey; while those parts of it lying eastward and southward of the Vale of Clwyd were included in the sovereignty of Powys, the seat of government being at Mathraval, near Meivôd, in Montgomeryshire. Anarawd, the son of Roderic, who succeeded to his kingdom of Gwynedd in 877, was, a few years afterwards, applied to for an asylum in his dominions by the remainder of the Strath-Clyde Britons of the North, who had been long harassed by the Danes, Saxons, and Scots, and had lost Constantine, their king, in battle. Anarawd received them on the condition of their recovering a portion of the Saxon territory, on which to settle, and of their defending it by arms: under the conduct of one Hobart, they easily dispossessed the Saxons of the country between the Dee and the Conway, of which they remained in quiet possession until Eadred Earl of Mercia began to make preparations for regaining the territory from which he had been so summarily expelled. The Britons, receiving early intelligence of his designs, removed their cattle and goods beyond the Conway, and being promptly joined by Anarawd with a powerful body of forces, this prince completely defeated the Saxons at Cymryd, about two miles from the town of Aberconway, and pursued them into Mercia, whence his troops returned to their own country loaded with spoil. The northern Britons were allowed to establish a separate state in the conquered country, which included the greater part of the counties of Denbigh and Flint, and received from its inhabitants the name of Strath-Clwyd, or Ystrad-Clwyd, from its being traversed by the river Clwyd. In the contests maintained for the sovereignty of Wales between the sons of Hywel Dda and those of Edwal Voel, the former, assembling their forces in South Wales, laid waste the territory of North Wales, as far as the river Conway, on the banks of which they were encountered by the latter at Llanrwst, where, after a sanguinary conflict, the sons of Edwal Voel were victorious, and, pursuing their enemies into South Wales, they retaliated upon their territories the evils which had been inflicted upon their own.

From this period no event peculiarly affecting Denbighshire is recorded, until after the conquest of England by the Normans. Henry II., leading a large army into North Wales, in the year 1157, drove Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, out of his camp near Northop in Flintshire; and the latter took up a strong position, since called Cil Owain, or "Owain's Retreat," near the city of St. Asaph: on Henry's further advance, Owain retreated to Bryn y Pin, a still stronger post, situated about five miles to the west of St. Asaph, in this county, and soon after concluded a peace with the English monarch, among other conditions of which he and his chieftains submitted to do homage to Henry. A few years after this, all the princes of Wales, with Owain at their head, entered into a confederacy for the recovery of their independence; and the first enterprise of the revolt was an inroad by Davydd, son of Owain, into Flintshire, whence he carried off the inhabitants and the cattle, and brought them into the Vale of Clwyd. Henry advanced with a small army to Rhuddlan, in Flintshire, but soon returned into England, where, having assembled the choicest troops from every part of his dominions, he advanced into Powys by way of Oswestry in Shropshire. The combined forces of the Welsh assembled to oppose him at Corwen, a little beyond the southern border of Denbighshire; and Henry, desirous of bringing them to action, led his army to the Ceiriog, a small river in the south-eastern part of the county, the woods on the banks of which he ordered to be cut down, to escape the danger of ambuscades. In attempting to force a bridge over this river, the English monarch was aimed at by a Welshman, whose arrow would inevitably have pierced his body, had not Hubert de St. Clair, constable of Colchester, sprung forward and received it in his own. While the English were cutting down the woods, a strong party of Welsh, without any orders from their leaders, being acquainted with the ford, crossed the river, and suddenly attacked the van of Henry's army, which was composed of pikemen; and in the warm action that ensued many were slain on both sides. Henry, however, effected the passage, and advanced across the south-eastern part of this county and the Berwyn mountains to the confines of Merionethshire, where he encamped for several days, the Welsh being posted upon the opposite heights, losing no opportunity of cutting off his supplies. The English army was at length reduced to great distress, and its difficulties were rendered still greater by sudden and violent rains; so that Henry was constrained to return into England with great loss of men and ammunition: in revenge for the disappointment of his designs, he commanded the eyes of the hostages, which he had previously received, to be plucked out: this defeat has generally been called the battle of Crogen. After the death of Llewelyn, the last prince of North Wales, his brother Davydd held a meeting of the Welsh chieftains at Denbigh, of which he possessed the lordship, in which it was determined to maintain the war against the attacks of the English. This task, however, proved far beyond their strength; and Davydd, being soon afterwards taken prisoner near this place, was put to death as a traitor by the English monarch. About the period of the subjugation of Wales by Edward I., the eastern parts of this county fell into the hands of English possessors, under very peculiar circumstances: Emma, widow of Gruffydd ab Madoc, who died in 1270, disagreeing with her husband's relatives respecting the education of her sons (or, as Mr. Pennant thinks, her grandsons), obtained possession of the eldest two, and delivered them over as wards to Edward I. One of them, named Madoc, with his inheritance of Bromfield and Yale, was placed by that monarch in charge of John Earl Warren; and Llewelyn, the other youth, with his patrimony of Chirk

and Nanheudwy, in that of Roger Mortimer, third son of Roger Mortimer, the son of Ralph Lord Mortimer, of Wigton. These noblemen having obtained possession of the territories above-mentioned, conspired together, and caused the sons of Gruffydd to be drowned in the river Dee; after the perpetration of which murder they each received from the king a grant of the estates of their respective wards, dated at Rhuddlan, October 27th, 1281, with the exception of the castle of Hope, and the lands thereto appertaining, which Edward retained in his own possession. The first-mentioned lordship continued in the family of the Warrens until the year 1347, when it descended by an heiress to the Fitz-Alans, Earls of Arundel, who purchased from John, grandson of Roger Mortimer, the lordship of Chirk and Nanheudwy: these united domains remained with the Fitz-Alans for several generations, and at last, after repeated attainders and forfeitures of different heirs, became finally vested in the crown.

The lordship of Denbigh was bestowed by Edward I. upon Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, who, among other conciliatory concessions to his new vassals, granted them permission to kill all kinds of wild animals, except in certain parts reserved for his own amusement: but the exercise of these privileges seems to have been abridged by his successors, for, in the reign of Henry VI., five parks are enumerated in this lordship, viz., Moylewike, Caresnodooke, Kyfford, Bagh, and Posey, the rangership of which that monarch gave to Owen Tudor. Lacy erected a castle to secure his new acquisition, and converted the neighbouring village into a walled town, thus laying the foundation of the future importance of the present county town. A wide-spread revolt soon compelled Edward again to head an expedition into North Wales, on which occasion the Earl of Lincoln, to preserve his newly-erected castle of Denbigh, advanced before the king, and, arriving under its walls on November 11th, 1294, was suddenly attacked by the Welsh insurgents, who, encouraged by the situation of the English, were desirous of hazarding their fortunes upon the issue of a single battle, in which the English forces were defeated and compelled to retire. From the Earl of Lincoln the lordship descended to Thomas Earl of Lancaster, who married that nobleman's daughter Alicia, and, after whose attainder, Edward II. gave it to his favourite, Hugh le Despencer. After the execution of the latter nobleman, Edward III. bestowed it on Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, who being a few years after attainted of high treason, the seigniorship of Denbigh was granted by the same monarch to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury; but it was soon restored to the family of Mortimer, in which it remained until conveyed by marriage to Richard Duke of York, on the accession of whose son Edward to the throne of England, it became vested in the crown. Queen Elizabeth, in the sixth year of her reign, granted it to her favourite, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, at the same time creating him Baron Denbigh; but on the attainder of this nobleman, the title and estates reverted to the crown. In 1696, William III. issued a patent, under the great seal, conferring on William Earl of Portland the lordships of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, without regard to the tenures of persons then occupying various parts of such estates, by compositions, rents, royal payments, and services to the crown, or to the Prince of Wales, on whom it had been usually settled for his support: but the Welsh landholders, aware that such an unqualified grant would encroach upon their liberty and property, and form a dangerous precedent, applied to their representatives to state their grievances before parliament; and the Commons, after due deliberation, presented a petition to the king, from the whole House, earnestly requesting him to recall his grant of the above-mentioned lordships, with which the king complied. The lordship of Denbigh, with the forests (as they are legally termed) of Bromfield and Yale, still form a part of the landed possessions of the crown.

The other grand seigniorial territory in this county, namely, the lordship of Ruthin, was granted by Edward I. to Reginald Grey, second son of Lord Grey, of Wilton, in whose descendants it remained until the reign of Henry VII., when, for some valuable consideration, it was conveyed to the crown by George Grey, Earl of Kent, and Baron Ruthin, in whose family the latter title continued until the death of Charles Grey, eighth Earl of Kent, after which it descended, by female heirs, through the families of Longueville and Yelverton, to that of Talbot, by which it is now enjoyed. The lordship of Ruthin, after its conveyance to the crown, seems to have been possessed by the Earl of Warwick, and subsequently formed part of the estates belonging to the Myddeltons of Chirk castle, and in the early part of the present century was vested in three co-heiresses of that family: by a decree of Chancery, in 1819, it was finally settled on Miss Myddelton, the present owner. Richard II., during his expedition into Ireland, deposited a vast amount of treasure in the castle of Holt, in this county, which had been originally erected by Earl Warren, and which was delivered up to Bolingbroke, in 1399, prior to the deposition of that unfortunate monarch. During a fair holden at Ruthin, in the year 1400, the Welsh chieftain, Owain Glyndwr, suddenly made a descent upon that place, attacked its castle without success, and, after pillaging the inhabitants and burning the town, returned to the mountains. In the wars of the Roses, Edward IV. is said by Leland to have been besieged in the castle of Denbigh, on which occasion he entered into a compact with the Lancastrians, by which he was allowed a safe retreat, on condition that he should leave the realm, and never return. Denbigh, among several other strong places in Wales, was held, during the latter part of the year 1459, by Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, in behalf of his half-brother, Henry VI.; but in the following year it was taken by the Yorkists. In 1468, however, the earl is said to have returned into Wales, and being joined by a large body of forces, he pillaged and burned the town of Denbigh. The statute of the 27th of Henry VIII., which for ever abrogated the peculiar jurisdictions of the lordships marcher, at the same time incorporated the lands subject to such jurisdictions in new and additional counties, of which this of Denbigh is one. In the year 1643, during the great civil war of the seventeenth century, Holt castle, which had been garrisoned for the king, was taken for the parliament by the troops under Sir William Brereton and Sir Thomas Myddelton, the latter of Chirk castle, in this county, which he represented in parliament: it was soon after retaken by the royalists, but, in April 1646, was again compelled to surrender to the parliamentary forces, after a vigorous siege of about two months. After the retreat of Charles I. from Chester, in 1645, he took refuge for some time at Denbigh. In November, the parliamentary forces under General Mytton gained an important victory, near that town, over the royalist troops commanded by Sir William Vaughan, slaying about one hundred, taking nine hundred prisoners, and totally dispersing the remainder. The castle of Denbigh, nevertheless, remained in the undisputed possession of the royalists until July of the following year, when it was besieged by General Mytton, to whom it surrendered on the 3rd of November ensuing. In the mean time the castle of Ruthin, which had been first attacked by the same commander in the middle of February, had surrendered to him in the middle of April. In 1659, Sir Thomas Myddelton, in concert with Sir George Booth, having declared too precipitately in favour of the restoration of Charles II., the castle of Chirk was besieged and taken by the troops under the command of General Lambert.

Denbighshire is in the diocese of St. Asaph (excepting fourteen parishes, which are in that of Bangor), and in the province of Canterbury: the portion in the first-mentioned diocese is included in the archdeaconry of St. Asaph, and deaneries of Rhôs, Bromfield and Yale, and Marchia: the fourteen parishes of the latter are in the immediate jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bangor, and form the deanery of Dyfryn Clwyd: the total number of parishes is fifty-eight, of which twenty-three are rectories, twenty-one vicarages, and fourteen perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the six hundreds of Bromfield, Chirk, Isaled, Isdulas, Ruthin, and Yale. It contains the borough and market towns of Denbigh, Ruthin, and Wrexham, the last having been added to the district of boroughs by the late Reform Act; the borough of Holt, and the market towns of Llangollen and Llanrwst. One knight was formerly returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative is now returned for Denbigh and the three other boroughs conjointly: but the county is now entitled, under the late act, to the return of two members, who, with the member for the boroughs, are elected at Denbigh: the polling-places are Denbigh, Llangollen, Llanrwst, and Wrexham. This county is included in the North Wales circuit: the assizes are held at Ruthin, and the quarter sessions at Wrexham and Denbigh alternately; the county gaol is at Ruthin, and the county houses of correction, or bridewells, are at Ruthin and Wrexham. There are thirty-six acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £41,139, and the expenditure to £41,311, of which £34,272 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The form of this county is extremely irregular; and beyond its south-eastern extremity is a detached portion, comprising part of the village of Llanymynech, bounded on the west by the river Tanat, and on the south by the Vyrnwy (which streams separate it from Montgomeryshire), and on the east and north by Shropshire. Its surface and scenery are much diversified; and the rugged and mountainous features of the principality are here conspicuous, though frequently softened into picturesque beauty by an intermixture of varied fertility. The hundred of Yale, in the eastern part of the county, is for the most part mountainous, bleak, and barren. This elevated district, almost the only produce of which is heath, is formed by the Clwydian and Hiraethog range of mountains, which, with its dependent hills, also form the greater part of the elevated wastes which occupy so much of every other district of the county: this range is in the form of the Roman letter U, its two sides running parallel with each other, and enclosing the beautiful Vale of Clwyd. The north-eastern, or Clwydian wing, entering within the north-eastern border of the county from the vicinity of Ysceiviog, in Flintshire, presents a variety of limestone and argillaceous strata in its course by Yale, Minera, the Vrondeg hills, Eglwyseg lime-works, Oernant slate-quarries, and Cevn dû, to Bryn Eglwys, where it completes the curve which connects it with the south-western, or Hiraethog range: this wing extends from above Derwen, on the southern border of the county, to Eglwys-Bâch, on the river Conway, its north-western extremity, and forms one of the most extensive and dreary wastes in the whole principality, being from twenty-five to thirty miles in length, and varying in breadth from five to nine miles: its chief covering is heath. Among these hills, in the western part of the county, are several small lakes, which give rise to numerous meandering streams. The hills on the coast extend no farther eastward than Abergele, where the country begins gradually to sink into the extensive plain of Morva Rhuddlan, which stretches eastward into Flintshire. By much the greater part of the far-famed Vale of Clwyd is in this county, in which it extends in length more than twenty miles, and in breadth generally from five to seven: thickly studded with towns, villages, and seats, its appearance is rendered still more pleasing by being enclosed on every side by mountains, whose brown and barren summits form a fine contrast with the verdant meads and luxuriant fields below. The dreary appearance of the desert moors is also, in many parts, relieved by small and fertile valleys, watered by sprightly streams, one of the principal of which is that called the Valley of Yale. Bromfield, by far the most important division of the county, with regard to population and wealth, was anciently called Maelor Cymreig, "Welsh Maelor," to distinguish it from the detached portion of Flintshire, on the opposite side of the Dee, called Maelor Saesneg, "English Maelor": lying to the north and west of the Dee, and to the south and east of the Alyn, the former in its western part shares in the wild and mountainous character of the adjoining hundred of Yale; but the greater portion of it is fertile, pleasant, and highly cultivated. Chirk, anciently called Gwayn, forming the south-eastern extremity of the county, almost wholly consists of hills, of which the two most conspicuous are Cader Verwyn and Cevn Uchâ, forming part of the Berwyn range of mountains, which, from the vicinity of the village of Chirk, extends south-westward into Shropshire, Montgomeryshire, and Merionethshire. The mountains of Denbighshire are not among the highest in North Wales: some of the most remarkable elevations are, Moel Vammau, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five feet above the level of the sea; Cyn y Brain mountain, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight; Moel Venlli, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven; Craig Eglwyseg, one thousand six hundred and eighty-eight; Moel Arthur, one thousand four hundred and ninety-one; Pen y Cloddiau, one thousand four hundred and fifty-two; Molvre Uchâ,

The climate is very various in different situations. On the hills the air is generally cold and sharp; for even the westerly winds, during the greater part of the year, are deprived of their genial mildness in their passage to this county by the snow-clad heights of the Snowdon range; and the more elevated districts are wholly exposed to the east and north: this keenness of the air, however, added to the dryness of the soil, renders the inhabitants of the more hilly regions particularly hardy and robust. The atmosphere of the valleys is milder and more humid; but the Vale of Clwyd, as it opens northward to the sea, is exposed to the full violence of boreal blasts, which are nevertheless supposed to contribute to the salubrity for which it is celebrated: its inhabitants are distinguished for the soundness of their constitutions and their longevity. On some parts of the Hiraethog hills no grain is sown but the hardy oat; and so unpropitious is the climate there, that in some years it never ripens, but is quite green in the month of October. The soils vary in richness, in proportion as their situation is more or less favourable for receiving alluvial deposits from higher grounds. Strong loams, excellently adapted for the cultivation of wheat, &c., and for permanent pastures, occupy the Vale of Clwyd below Ruthin, a low maritime tract in the vicinity of Abergele, the banks of the Conway near Marl, and upwards towards Maenan and Trêvriw, the borders of the Dee adjoining Cheshire, and much of the detached portion of the county bordering on the river Vyrnwy. Free loams, adapted for the general purposes of tillage, are found in patches adjoining to, or intermingled with, the strong loams; as also in the Vale of Clwyd, above Ruthin; in the valley of Llanrwst, above Trêvriw; in small proportions in the valley of the Tanat, and in the lower parts of the smaller valleys. Light soils, consisting of various admixtures of sandy loams, rounded pebbles, gravel, and peat, more particularly adapted for the culture of barley, peas, turnips, &c., abound in the valleys, particularly in their higher recesses, and on slopes having a southerly aspect: the soils of this kind on the limestone, though shallow, are fertile. Ferny soil, or hazel mould, of various colours, occurs in small tracts, intermingled with the foregoing soils, and on the sides of the inferior hills, naturally producing fern, broom, furze, and underwood of various kinds, particularly hazel and hawthorn. On the slate hills, and on the slopes of the lesser valleys, is found till, or a hungry light mould, tinged with oxyde of iron, producing mountain ash, birch, and dwarf furze. Some parts of the Vale of Clwyd have their soils tinged by a substratum of a reddish sandstone, of loose texture; and a similar soil touches this county at Holt, on the Dee. The dry argillaceous substrata, of which most of the mountains consist, are generally covered with a thin coat of light peat, upon a substratum of till or of shale, and over run with common heath. The hollows and levels of the Hiraethog mountains abound with a considerable depth of excellent peat for fuel, which is so close-grained that, if cut with a sharp instrument, when dry, it presents a polished surface.

About a third part of the vales of Denbighshire is under tillage, and annually produces great quantities of grain for exportation. The common corn crops are wheat, barley, and oats. Wheat is commonly cut with the reaping-hook; and barley, in the Vale of Clwyd, with cradled scythes. Rye is occasionally grown; as also are peas, though to a much less extent than formerly: beans are hardly ever seen. The culture of turnips was introduced into this county about the year 1765, and though it has here made more progress than in the other counties of North Wales, it is yet far from being extensive. Potatoes are grown for home consumption. The most common artificial grass is red clover, with which rye-grass is sometimes mixed: some of the clover is seeded: in the hilly districts hay seeds are obtained from Anglesey. Only the meadows of the Vale of Clwyd, and those bordering on the Dee and the Vyrnwy, are rich enough to fatten cattle: the hilly parts of the county rear great quantities of cattle, to be sold lean to the graziers of richer districts. Artificial irrigation is assiduously practised in all convenient situations. In the more fertile vales of the eastern parts of the county, the grass lands are chiefly appropriated to the dairy, the produce of which, in both cheese and butter, is conveyed in considerable quantities to the markets of Chester, Shrewsbury, and Bridgenorth: the greater part of the cheese is made and sold as Cheshire cheese: a small quantity as Gloucester: annatto is used for colouring in the lowlands, but seldom in the uplands. Lime is the most general manure, where it can be conveniently obtained: it is frequently burned in sod kilns, on the field to be manured. Sea-thong, or sea-weed, is collected in considerable quantities on the coast after storms, and is highly valued as a manure. Shell-sand, containing a proportion of from two-thirds to four-fifths of decayed shells, is sometimes imported in sloops from the coasts of Carnarvonshire and Anglesey, for the same purpose, and is the most fertilizing of all. The "Lummas plough," a variation of the Rotherham plough, is in almost universal use, having been first introduced, in place of the large old-fashioned plough, about the year 1760: the Scotch plough, drawn by two horses abreast, is also occasionally seen; but the horse-teams more generally draw singly: oxen are commonly yoked in pairs. The cattle of the high lands are almost wholly of the diminutive race which occupies so much the greater part of North Wales, and are provincially called runts: their colour is chiefly black; their horns long, and curving upwards; and their particular value consists in their extreme hardness, owing to which they may be reared on their scanty pastures at little expense or trouble. In the vales the cattle are of a superior kind, larger, and of all varieties of colour: those reared in the maritime plain extending from Abergele eastward are distinguished for their aptitude to fatten. The sheep in the mountainous districts are small and hardy, having generally white faces and legs, and sometimes horns, and their wool is commonly coarse: the weight of their carcass varies from seven to twelve lb. per quarter; that of their fleece, from three-quarters of a lb. to two lb. and a half. Another native breed is that which occupies the south-eastern and eastern parts of the county, from the border of Montgomeryshire to Wrexham: they have black faces, and as fine wool as any sheep in the island, that of the Ryeland breed only excepted: the mutton of those fed on the limestone lands is reckoned particularly delicious. Other breeds, of various kinds and crosses, are kept by individuals in the enclosed districts. Hogs are most numerous in the dairy district. In the vales, excellent draught horses, both for the coach and for the waggon, are obtained from England: their colour is generally black, or bay, and they are strong, active, and well made. Towards the eastern border of the county are some orchards, from which, in plentiful seasons, cider and perry are sometimes made for home consumption. The most extensive woodlands are in the Vale of Clwyd and on the eastern border of the county: on the latter side there are about five hundred acres in the parish of Chirk only. The woods around Erthig, or Erddig, the seat of Simon Yorke, Esq., are distinguished for their luxuriance, and the taste with which they have been formed: this is the only spot in North Wales where the song of the nightingale is known to have been heard. Some of the most flourishing trees in the Vale of Clwyd are, the oak, sycamore, ash, chesnut, elm, and poplar. The enclosures of waste lands, since the year 1790, when they formed one-half of the county, have been very numerous and extensive. The more elevated regions, being sterile, and having so ungenial an aspect, are applied with most profit to the rearing of lean cattle. Some parts of the Vale of Clwyd are rendered of very little value by stagnant water, for which there is no outlet, and which causes the soil to produce little besides rushes and other coarse aquatic grasses; but much of this land has been greatly improved by draining and embanking. Coal is the common fuel, except in the districts most distant from the pits, where peat is used. In the year 1796, an Agricultural Society was established at Wrexham, which extends the sphere of its transactions over the country around that town, to the distance of twenty miles in every direction. In the Vale of Clwyd is a Farmers' Club, which holds its meetings monthly.

The geology of this county is interesting, and its mineral productions are various and important, consisting chiefly of coal, iron and lead ores, slates, limestone, and freestone. The Berwyn range of mountains is composed of primitive schistus, that is, such as does not contain iron pyrites, or any impressions or remains of organized bodies; the position of the strata being at the same time nearly perpendicular. The greater part of it lies in thick irregular laminæ, intersected in different places by veins of quartz; but the slates that are quarried are unmixed with quartz, and frequently incline in their position considerably from the perpendicular: the position of the strata is most irregular on the eastern descent of Trim y Sarn, and the southern side of Llangollen Vale. On the border of Flintshire, the Clwydian hills consist of argillaceous shale, which, proceeding south-eastward, is bounded on the north-east by the limestone of that county, and on the south-west by that bordering the Vale of Clwyd: from Moel Accre to where this range joins the Hiraethog mountains, at the head of the Vale of Clwyd, limestone and argillaceous strata are met with alternately. The Hiraethog range consists of shale, with grey mountain rock, or semi-indurated whinstone, and flags used for flooring and for tombstones: this is bounded on the east by limestone, and on the west is intersected by narrow tracts of grey limestone, which run transversely to the direction of the chain of hills. The great limestone tract of North Wales commences in an abrupt precipice, about nine hundred feet high, at Llanymynech, in the south-eastern detached part of this county, and thence proceeding northward, the range of hills of which it is composed forming the western boundary of the great plain of Salop, it is found successively at Porth y Waŷn, Coed Trêvlech, Soughton, Cyn y Bwch, Bryn y Garth, and the Vron: near the latter place it reaches the river Dee, and, making a turn towards the north-west, it extends over almost the whole county of Flint, and a great part of that of Denbigh. The south-westernmost line of rocks may be traced from Trevor, on the northern side of the Dee, by the bold rocks of Eglwyseg, near Valle Crucis Abbey, the heights of Yale, and the upper extremity of the Vale of Clwyd, down the south-western side of that beautiful district from Llanellidan to Evenechtyd, Coed Marchan, Llanrhaiadr, Denbigh, Cevn Meiriadog, and Llandulas; and terminates in the cliffs overhanging the sea at Llandudno, or Orme's Head, in Carnarvonshire: the north-easternmost range passes the collieries and freestone quarries at Ruabon to Minera, and thence runs parallel with the former into Flintshire. Eastward and north-eastward of this limestone range, which, in geological position, rests upon the slate, is a rich tract of coal measures, resting upon the limestone, from which they dip eastward while it ranges northward, and north-eastward when its direction is changed to the north-west. The thickest seam, at Brymbo near Wrexham, is fifteen feet; further south, at Ruabon, nine feet; at Chirk, seven feet; and at Llwyn y maen, and other places near Oswestry, only six feet: while at the southern extremity of the field, at Alberbury, in Shropshire, there are no seams thicker than from eighteen inches to two feet: the dip of the strata varies from two yards in three to one yard in seven. The coal is of different qualities: the most bituminous species is called binding, or coking coal; while others, having less bitumen, and exhibiting varieties of fracture, are called stone coal, hard coal, run splent, &c.: the latter are most useful for domestic purposes, as they do not cohere in burning, or leave many cinders, but emit a clear flame and diffusive heat. The principal coal-pits are in the vicinity of Wrexham and Ruabon, and at Minera, Acrevair, the Cevn, and Black Park near Chirk. Iron-ore is found in connexion with the coal strata, and is raised of a peculiarly excellent quality, and in great quantity, at Brymbo, where there are several furnaces for smelting it, together with the glossy and more fusible ore of Cumberland: there are also extensive iron-works at Acrevair, Rhôs-Llanrygog, and the Cevn; in the neighbourhood of which last place is obtained iron pyrites in large masses, which, being in some cases used in dyeing black, is sent in great quantities, by the Ellesmere canal, to Chester and Liverpool, to be shipped for America. The lead-ore is chiefly found in the limestone, though in some places in a gritstone, and in others in a blackish shale: the principal mines are, that at Minera, near Wrexham, and those in the parish of Llanverras, which have been worked for a long series of ages: the calcareous rocks of Coed Marchan, in the neighbourhood of Ruthin, of Llanverras, and Llanarmon, and along the sea-coast, are also known to contain ores of this metal. A green, dusty, rich ore, called by the miners "copper malm," is found in the, Llanymynech lime-rocks, whence many tons of it have, at different times, been exported to be smelted: calamine is also obtained in great quantities at the same place. The limestone is of an excellent quality, and very white in its efflorescence after calcination: it is worked in almost innumerable places. The principal slate quarries are in the south-eastern part of the county, being those of Oernant, near Llangollen, and Glyn Ceiriog: to the former quarry there is a branch from the Ellesmere canal, and the latter are within five miles of the same canal at Chirk: the slates obtained at the former place are more durable than those of the latter, which, when exposed to the action of sulphuric acid, show symptoms of decomposition in four days. Chert is found at Trêvarclawdd, near Oswestry, and on the Llêchrydau hills, near Glyn Ceiriog. On the banks of the Dee, between Overton and Bangor, are great quantities of ductile clays, that will bear calcination, but are not used by any pottery. Carbonate of lime, in the various forms of spars, stalactites, and coarse mineral agaric, are found at Trevor, near Llangollen.

The principal article of manufacture is what are provincially called webs, and, by the London drapers, Welsh plains, or cottons, a coarse sort of thick, white, woollen cloth, made in pieces of from ninety to one hundred and twenty yards long: this is confined to the small district of Glyn, which comprises a few parishes to the north and west of the town of Oswestry in Shropshire, and contains eleven fulling-mills: the webs here made are termed by the drapers "small cloth," to distinguish them from those manufactured in Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire, which are about one-eighth of a yard broader. Instead of lambs' wool, in this manufacture, the clothiers mix, with the woofing of the coarse sort of webs, flocks from the fulling-mills, and, with the finer sort, combings from Yorkshire and Lancashire, generally in the proportion of about one-third. The market for the Glyn webs is held every Wednesday, at the town-hall in Oswestry. The southern parts of the county share in the manufacture of knit woollen stockings and socks, of which Bala, in Merionethshire, is the centre: the northern boundary of this manufacture extends from Bettws, in Merionethshire, by Ysptyty-Ivan, and Llanrwst, in this county, to Penmachno, in Carnarvonshire: next to Bala, the principal market for these stockings is at Llanrwst. In the Vale of Llangollen is a factory for spinning cotton yarn, and weaving it by means of power-looms. Many skins of the native sheep, and foreign lamb and kid skins, dressed at Dôl-gelley, in Merionethshire, are sent to Denbigh, and there manufactured into shoes and gloves, the former of which are sent to Liverpool, to be exported to the West Indies; while the latter, to the amount of about seven thousand dozen pairs annually, are disposed of to London, Bristol, and other places. Notwithstanding that this is geographically a maritime county, it possesses neither sea-port nor haven; and as none of its rivers, except the Conway, near its mouth, are navigable, while flowing through it or upon its borders, its natural facilities for water-carriage are very limited. The chief exports are, lean cattle and sheep; webs, stockings, shoes, and gloves; lead; malleable and manufactured iron; slates; and butter, cheese, and bacon: and the principal imports, besides the various kinds of shop-goods for the ordinary supply of the inhabitants, are, dressed skins, to be manufactured at Denbigh; and pig iron, to be rendered malleable. The produce of the greater part of the county in wool is either sold to the adjoining manufacturing districts, or taken to the fairs of Chester and Shrewsbury, where it is purchased by the clothiers of the North of England. At Wrexham is held the greatest fair in North Wales, to which, besides the ordinary articles of sale, is brought the surplus clover and trefoil seed of the surrounding country, and, in some years, great quantities of Dutch grass seeds: at this fair, which commences on the 23rd of March, and continues to the end of the following week, are also exposed great quantities of Yorkshire cloths, and Lancashire and Sheffield manufactured goods, which supply nearly the whole of North Wales, and a great part of South Wales, for the ensuing year. A wool fair was established at Denbigh in the year 1808.

The principal rivers are the Dee, the Clwyd, and the Conway; besides which, the smaller rapid streams, descending from the mountains towards any of these three great channels, or from the south-eastern extremity of the county towards the Severn, are very numerous. The Dee, descending from Llyn Tegid, or Bala lake, in Merionethshire, enters a few miles below the small town of Corwen, in that county, and crosses the south-eastern part of Denbighshire from east to west, through the beautiful and picturesque Vale of Llangollen: on reaching the eastern side of Denbighshire it becomes its boundary, and forms the line of division between England and Wales; but flowing north-eastward, it separates from this county, in a very devious part of its course, the large isolated portion of Flintshire, which for several miles occupies its eastern bank: then, becoming the boundary of Cheshire, it takes a northerly course towards the city of Chester, and wholly quits Denbighshire at its north-eastern extremity, at Holt. The chief tributaries of the Dee from this county are, the Alwen, which has its source in one of the lakes in the western part of the county, and flows south-eastward into Merionethshire; the Ceiriog, a torrent which descends from the slate mountains in the hundred of Chirk, and joins it below Brynkinalt, in the parish of Chirk; the Clywedog, which it receives from the westward, a little below Bangor, in Flintshire; and the Alyn, which, rising among the hills about Llandegla, flows northward into Flintshire, through which county it makes an extraordinary circuitous course, and again touches Denbighshire in the vicinity of Gresford, from which village it runs eastward to the Dee, a little below Holt. The Clwyd descends northward from a small lake among the hills on the southern border of the county, through the rich and spacious vale to which it gives name, being joined in its course by numerous streams from the mountains on either side; having flowed past the town of Ruthin, it reaches the border of Flintshire, a little below the village of Llandyrnog, and, taking a north-westerly direction, enters that county in the vicinity of Bôdvari: its chief tributary is the Aled, which descends in a very irregular north-easterly course from the mountains near the source of the Alwen, in the south-western part of this county, and joins it a little below St. Asaph, in Flintshire. The Conway, issuing out of the small lake called Llyn Conway, at the point of junction of the three shires of Denbigh, Merioneth, and Carnarvon, makes a rapid descent northward in successive cataracts, almost immediately becoming the boundary between the counties of Denbigh and Carnarvon: emerging from under the wooded cliff of Gwydir, it rushes into the beautiful Vale of Nantconway, and, a few miles below the handsome bridge of Llanrwst, enters the eastern confines of Carnarvonshire, between which and Denbighshire, after a course of a few miles, it again becomes the boundary, and so continues until below Llansantffraid, where, fast increasing in breadth, it again enters Carnarvonshire: the Conway is navigable to Llandoged, in this county, near which place it meets the tide. The south-eastern extremity of the county is bounded on the south-west by the rivers Rhaiadr and Tanat successively; the former, about midway in this line, falling into the latter, which in its further course to the Severn is joined by a small stream from the hundred of Chirk.

The Ellesmere canal, which forms a communication between the navigable channels of the rivers Mersey, Dee, and Severn, was originally designed to pass from Chester, through the eastern part of the county of Flint, and, entering Denbighshire in the parish of Gresford, to have proceeded southward through the eastern part of this county, to Shrewsbury; thus also opening a direct communication between Chester and the great coal district of Denbighshire. But, owing to the broken and unsound state of the country, caused by the various excavations which had been made for coal and other minerals, it was found necessary to abandon the construction of the above-mentioned line, in the country lying between Chester and the vicinity of Ruabon, to which a branch of the main canal now extends northward from the vicinity of Ellesmere, and terminates on the northern side of the Dee, at Pont Cysylltau. Here it is met by several rail-roads from the collieries, furnaces, and forges in the parish of Ruabon; and adjacent to it have been constructed basins, wharfs, and warehouses, which afford facilities for a considerable trade in the mineral produce of the country, &c. Hence a navigable branch extends up the northern bank of the Dee to Trevor, Llangollen, and the vicinity of the Oernant slate quarries, near Llantysillio, where it receives a powerful stream of water from the river Dee, turned into it by a very extensive weir and flood-gates, and by this means supplies an extent of nearly forty miles of the main canal and its branches. From Pont Cysylltau the principal branch crosses the Dee and the Vale of Llangollen upon a magnificent aqueduct, constructed partly of cast iron, one thousand and seven feet long, and one hundred and twenty-six feet eight inches high above the bed of the river: from the southern end of this aqueduct it is conveyed, by means of a high embankment, about five hundred yards in length, to the same side of the valley, passes the Vron lime-works, and then, after being carried through a tunnel, proceeds between the village and castle of Chirk, within a very short distance of Black Park colliery, from which there is a tram-road leading to a wharf on its banks: it then enters another tunnel, on emerging from which, near the village of Chirk, it is conveyed across the valley and river of Ceiriog, into Shropshire, by a second aqueduct of freestone, of ten arches, seven hundred feet in length, and seventy feet high above the surface of the ground below : proceeding towards Shrewsbury, a branch from the vicinity of Frankton takes a south-westerly direction to the Llanymynech lime-works, in the detached part of the county, on the borders of Shropshire and Montgomeryshire. Here terminates, in this direction, the property of the Ellesmere Canal Company, and the navigation is continued to Welshpool and Newtown by the Montgomeryshire canal, the work of a separate company, which hence crosses the river Vyrnwy into the county of Montgomery, on an aqueduct of five arches, each of forty-five feet span, and twenty-five feet high above the ordinary level of the water in the river beneath : there are, besides, various smaller arches for the passage of flood water. From the lime-rocks at Llanymynech a railway, about two miles and a half in length, greatly facilitates the conveyance to the boats on the canal. The total length of the branch canal, which terminates at Pont Cysylltau, is little more than eleven miles ; that of the navigable feeder, which extends to the Dee at Llantysillio, nearly six miles ; and that of the Ruabon brook railway, which proceeds from the termination of the canal at Pont Cysylltau through an extensive coal field to Ruabon brook, three miles and a quarter. The roads of Denbighshire are in general good, the materials for making and repairing them being abundant and of good quality : their extent has also of late years been greatly increased. The great mail-coach road from London to Holyhead, by Birmingham and Shrewsbury, enters it from Oswestry at the village of Chirk, and crosses its south-eastern extremity, through Llangollen, to Corwen in Merionethshire, beyond which it again passes for some distance within its southern boundary. The old mail-coach road from London to Holyhead, by Chester, runs across the northern part of the county, from St. Asaph, in Flintshire, through Abergele, to Aberconway in Carnarvonshire : a branch from this, at the village of Northop, in Flintshire, passes through Denbigh, and rejoins the main road at Aberconway.

This county contains no remains of Roman occupation, unless the vast mining level which pierces the limestone hill at Llanymynech be of their formation : in this, now called Yr Ogo, or "the Cavern," have been found various Roman coins and other interesting antiquities, besides numerous skeletons. On one of the sloping sides of this hill is raised a stupendous rampart of loose stones, accompanied by a deep fosse, beyond which are two other fosses, cut in the rock with immense labour. But the most ancient monument of known date is "the Pillar of Eliseg," raised in memory of a British chieftain of that name, slain in battle against the Saxons, near Chester, in the year 607, by his grandson, Concenn : it is situated about two miles from Llangollen. Offa's Dyke, still by the Welsh designated by the synonymous appellation of Clawdd Offa, may be plainly traced in nearly the whole of its course through this county, which it enters from the north-western part of Shropshire, in crossing the river Ceiriog to Glyn, whence it proceeds by Chirk castle and across the river Dee and the Ruabon road, and forms part of the Wrexham road, as far as Pentre Bychan : hence it is continued, by Plâs Power, Adwy'r Clawdd near Minera, and Brymbo, across the little river Cegidog, and on the southern side of Bryn Yorkyn mountain into Flintshire, its direction being first northward and then north-westward : near Chirk castle, by the river Ceiriog, is a large breach in it, supposed to be the place of interment of the English who fell in the battle of Crogen, and still called Adwy'r Beddau, or "the Pass of the Graves : " it is observable that the ditch is in all parts on the western, or Welsh, side of the rampart, and along its course are many artificial mounts, the sites of small forts. Wat's Dyke, to the east of Offa's Dyke, of equally large proportions, but not of so great a length, is first discoverable to the south of Maesbury, in the vicinity of Oswestry, whence it may be traced across the eastern part of this county to the æstuary of the Dee, near Basingwerk, in Flintshire : it enters Denbighshire, in crossing the Ceiriog at the spot where that river unites with the Dee, between Brynkinalt and Pen y Lan ; and then takes its course through Wynnstay Park, and by Pentre'r Clawdd to Erddig, where there is the site of a strong fort : hence it passes above Wrexham, near Melin Puleston, by Dôlydd, Maes-gwyn, Rhôs-ddû, Gwersylt, across the Alyn, and through the township of Llai, to Treuddin, in the county of Flint. Mr. Pennant notices it as remarkable, that Wat's Dyke should have been overlooked, or confounded with that of Offa, by all early writers, except Thomas Churchyard, the poet, who supposes the object of its formation to have been, that the intervening space between it and the latter might be free ground, for the purposes of traffic, between the Danes and the Britons. On one of the limestone hills to the west of Abergele, called Copa yr Wylva, or the "Mount of the Watch Tower," are the remains of a very strong British post ; as there are also of another, called Caerddin, or Garthen, on a lofty hill, about two hundred yards distant from Offa's Dyke, near Ruabon ; and of a third, at the extremity of the elevated ridge, overlooking the Vale of Gresford, in a field called the Rofts. In the parish of St. George, on the summit of a hill called Pen y parc, are vestiges of the camp occupied by Owain Gwynedd, after his retreat from Cil Owain. In the parish of Llanarmon are numerous remarkable sepulchral tumuli, or barrows, of different forms, composed of stones and earth, covered with sods, and enclosing cinders, fragments of bones, and urns containing ashes.

At the time of the Reformation there were, at Denbigh, a house of Carmelite friars ; at Ruthin, a college of regular priests ; and at Llanegwest, a Cistercian abbey, called De Valle Crucis : the remains of the last form an interesting and romantic object. The most remarkable churches are those of Gresford, Llanrhaiadr, Ruabon, Ruthin, and Wrexham, which latter is one of the most beautiful specimens of ecclesiastical architecture in the principality. That of Hênllan, too, is rendered worthy of notice by the peculiarity of its tower standing on a lofty rock, while the body of the edifice is situated in the vale below. There yet exist picturesque ruins of the castles of Castell Dinas Brân, near Llangollen ; Denbigh ; Holt ; and Ruthin : Chirk Castle is now the large and ancient mansion of Robert Myddelton Bidulph, Esq., having been awarded by the Court of Chancery to his mother, as one of the coheiresses of the Myddelton family. Near the village of Llanarmon, on a remarkably large artificial mount, called Tommen y Vaerdre, may be traced the foundations of a square fort. The principal modern residences in the county are, Acton Hall, the seat of Sir Foster Cunliffe, Bart.; Bathavern Park, that of Thomas Downward, Esq.; Brynkinalt, that of Viscount Dungannon; Dyfryn Aled, that of P. Wynne Yorke, Esq.; Erddig, that of Simon Yorke, Esq.; Eyarth, that of Richard Miles Wynne, Esq.; Galtvaenon, that of J. Lloyd Salusbury, Esq.; Glanywern, that of John Madocks, Esq.; Gresford Lodge, that of Mrs. W. Egerton; Gwersyllt, that of John Williams, Esq.; Kimmel, that of Lord Dinorben; Llanbedr Hall, that of Joseph Ablett, Esq.; Llanerch, that of Mrs. Allinson; Llangedwin, that of the Rt. Hon. Charles Williams Wynn; Llŷs Meirchion, that of the Rev. Robert Chambres; Pen y Lan, that of Ed. Lloyd Williams, Esq.; Penbedw, that of Thos. Molineux Williams, Esq.; Plâs Heaton, that of John Heaton, Esq.; Plâs Power, that of Thomas Fitzhugh, Esq.; Pool Park, that of Lord Bagot; Ruthin Castle, that of the Hon. Frederick West; Trêvallyn, that of John Townshend, Esq.; and Wynnstay, the princely residence of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart. Though the farm-houses and offices are, in numerous instances upon modern and improved plans, yet the greater number is of an inferior kind. In the vicinity of the slate hills the fences are commonly walls of flat stones; but modern fences are most frequently made of hawthorn sets, of which great quantities are raised by nurserymen in this county. In those parts of Denbighshire bordering on Cheshire servants hired for the year commence their term of service on the 1st of January; but in the rest of the county, on the 1st of May. During the hay and corn harvest, the farmers of the Vale of Clwyd and its vicinity go every morning to the cross, or market-place, of any of the towns of Wrexham, Ruthin, or Denbigh, to hire workmen for that day only; the latter being there assembled for the purpose, with their scythes and hooks. From time immemorial it has been customary for men, of from forty to sixty years of age, to come down, during the winter season, into the lowlands of this county, from Merionethshire and other mountainous districts, as professed feeders of cattle: they are commonly called "cow-men." The farmers of the lower parts of Denbighshire excel those of most other parts of North Wales in the quality of their bread, beef, bacon, cheese, and ale, which constitute the main support of the labouring classes; but advancing thence into the more mountainous tracts, the wheaten bread is found mixed with different proportions of rye and barley, or wholly superseded by oatmeal cake. There are springs of ancient celebrity, for their medicinal qualities, in the parish of St. George; at the foot of an eminence, called Gwladus' Chair, to the north-west of the church of Llanrhaiaadr; and near the church of Llandegla. A lofty precipice on the sea-shore to the west of Abergele, called Cevn Ogo, is pierced by several caverns, washed by the waves at high water: the largest of these, by way of distinction, is called Yr Ogo, or "The Cavern," and has its roof and sides decorated with stalactites, in various fanciful forms. The most remarkable waterfalls are, two upon the river Aled, near its source; and that of Pistyll-Rhaiaadr, near Llanrhaiaadr yn Môchnant.

DENIO. (DENEIO), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, including the town of Pwllheli, and containing 2091 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llannor, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is situated about half a mile to the north of Pwllheli; but being very small and in a state of great dilapidation, it is in contemplation shortly to erect a new church at that town, where all ecclesiastical rites, except that of burial, will be performed: the present ancient structure is built somewhat in the form of the Roman letter L. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, including those of the town of Pwllheli, amounts to £511. 11. See PWLLHELI.

DERWEN, or DERWEN-YNIAL, a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S.W. by S.) from Ruthin, containing 522 inhabitants. The village is situated near the source of the river Clwyd, and abounds with springs of excellent water, one of which, called Fynnon Sarah, was in great repute for its efficacy in the cure of cancer. About a mile from the village is a quarry of stone, which is soft and of peculiarly fine grain, and is much esteemed for sharpening the finest instruments, being found nowhere else in this country: great quantities are sent to London, and some of it has been exported to America. A fair is held on February 11th. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £10. 15., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but interesting edifice, in the decorated style of English architecture, containing much beautiful screen-work, and ornamented with an elegant east window. In the churchyard there is a richly sculptured stone cross, in the same style of architecture, seventeen feet high, ornamented in alto relievo with a device of the Crucifixion, and with emblematic figures of Justice, Mercy, and Faith, in richly canopied niches. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. On the river Clwyd is a mill for spinning woollen yarn, which was purchased with the amount of several charitable bequests, and produces at present a rental of £7 per annum; and in 1828, Godfrey Roberts, of Richmond, gave a rent-charge of £7, on an estate called Tŷ Cerrig, for the benefit of the poor: both these sums are distributed annually at Christmas. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £238. 4.

DERWLWYN, a township in the parish of CARNO, lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (W. N. W.) from Newtown. The population is returned with the parish, but in 1821 it was included in the return for the township of Trawscoed. The names of these townships denote that they formerly abounded with wood, though little of that article is observable at present, they being for the most part rugged and mountainous.

DERWYDD, a joint hamlet with Garn, in the parish of LLANDEBIE, upper division of the hundred of ISCENEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the parish. The name of this place signifies that it formerly appertained to a Druid, and several appearances in the neighbourhood indicate that it was anciently the resort of some of that class. It is situated near the south bank of the river Cennen, and is partially wooded.

DEVYNOC (DEVYNOG), a parish in the hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (W.) from Brecknock, comprising the hamlets of Cray, Glyn, Maescar, and Senni, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 2031 inhabitants. The name of this extensive parish, which anciently formed part of the great forest of Devynock, is, according to the historian of Brecknockshire, derived from the same British root as that of the English county of Devon, both names being equally descriptive of the face of the country, which is every where varied by deep valleys and extensive hills. By other writers, and perhaps upon equally good authority, the name is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Dyfnog, an eminent British saint, who flourished towards the close of the sixth century. The whole of the parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Usk, is comprehended within the lordship or manor of Devynock, which was held as a fief under the crown by the lords marcher of Brecknock, and was subject to the arbitrary operation of the forest laws, which were enforced with unrelenting rigour under the lords marcher and their successors. This extensive district was designated the "Manor of the Great Forest," or of the "Great Forest of Devynock," within the county of Brecknock; and the whole, or at least a considerable part of it, having been acquired by the successors of Bernard Newmarch in the lordship of Brecknock, formed no part of the lordship marcher, but was held by them separately under the crown of England. Under the feudal laws all the tenants of the manor were compelled to bring their corn to be ground at the lord's mills, of which, within the limits of the manor, there were, within the last twenty-five years, no less than seven remaining; four of them were in this parish, and situated respectively at Devynock, Cray, Glyn-Tawe, and Senni: this custom, however, is not now observed with the same strictness as formerly. On the banks of the river Senni was anciently a small castle, from which the farm on which it stood is still called Castell Dú, or "the Black Castle:" this fortress, which was of Norman origin, is supposed to have been the residence of the constable of the forest, an office held at one time by a descendant of Sir Reginald Aubrey, one of the companions of Bernard Newmarch, serving also as a keep, or prison, for the confinement of mountain robbers, who frequently made predatory incursions into the vale, and also for the punishment of offenders against the forest laws. During the insurrection of Owain Glyndwr against Henry IV., that monarch, on visiting the principality, is said to have staid for some time at this castle, where he caused a proclamation of pardon to be drawn up, which received the royal signature at Devynock, September 15th, 1403, and is still extant. Upon the attainder of the last Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VIII., this extensive district was subdivided into the manor of the Great Forest of Devynock, and that of the Little Forest, both of which, at no remote period, were held by different tenures under the crown; and, with the exception of the lands of the latter division, which, reserving the manor, have been sold to different purchasers, within the last twenty-five years, are now the property of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart., of Tredegar. The present appearance of this district forms a striking commentary upon the tenour of an ancient document of the 9th of Elizabeth, reserving "all wild beasts and fallow deer, all woods, underwoods, and timber trees, &c.," in this now desolate tract of country, where for miles not a single tree of any kind is to be seen, where even the fences are of stone, and where the only animals to be found are a few mountain sheep, ponies, and small hardy cattle.

The village is pleasantly situated at the extremity of the Vale of Senni, and is intersected by the river of that name, which flows through the parish, and empties itself into the river Usk near Rhŷd y Briw. It is sheltered by some abrupt eminences, two of which, being richly clothed with wood, add greatly to the beauty of its appearance. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and in many places highly picturesque; and the views from the higher grounds comprehend many interesting features, and much variety of character. Coal, culm, and limestone are found in abundance in the southern part of the parish and the adjacent district; and a tram-road from Gwain Clawdd, in the parish of Ystradgynlais, intersecting an extensive limestone district, traverses it from south to north, and terminates near Rhŷd y Briw, in the Vale of Usk. This road, which was constructed at the expense of John Christie, Esq., of London, connects those parts of this and the adjoining parishes which border upon Glyn-Tawe, being the chief seat of the mineral works in this part of Brecknockshire, with the centre of the same county. The great road from London to Milford passes through the northern part of the parish, running nearly parallel with the course of the Usk. Fairs are held on April 16th, May 9th, August 12th, October 6th, and December 5th.

The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Ystradvelltey annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £14. 14. 4½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester, who is impropiator of one-third of the great and small tithes, under the charter, as is supposed, of Bernard Newmarch, by whom they were granted to the abbey of St. Peter, in that city, the church of which, on the foundation of the bishoprick, was made the cathedral church. Another third, which was anciently the property of the priory of St. John, in Brecknock, now belongs to Penry Williams, Esq., and the remaining third belongs to the vicar, who is patron of the three perpetual curacies of Llan Iliid, Llan Illtyd, and Callwen. The church, dedicated to St. Dyfnog, and situated at the northern extremity of the village, where it forms an interesting and prominent feature in the view, is a spacious and venerable structure, principally in the later style of English architecture, with a well-built tower at the western end, having on its south-western angle an inscription in ancient Saxon characters, which has not been satisfactorily decyphered: the body consists of a nave, chancel, and south aisle; the nave has been thoroughly repaired, if not entirely rebuilt, and the whole of the interior is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. A curious custom prevails here, by which the parish clerk is entitled, on the death of any inhabitant, to certain garments of the deceased, which is more fully detailed in the account of the parish of Llywel, where it is also observed. There are two places of worship each for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A free school for the gratuitous instruction of all children of this parish and of the hamlet of Ysclydach, in the parish of Llywel, and five almshouses in the village of Devynock, were founded by Sir John Davy, of Aldermanbury, in the city of London, who, in 1624, bequeathed for their support £40 per annum, charged upon his advowson of Abernant, in the county of Carmarthen: the almshouses and school-room, with a house for the master, were erected in 1626, and have regularly, since that period, been appropriated to the purposes of the founder's will. Of the £40 per annum left for their endowment, £13. 6. 8. is paid to the schoolmaster, who has also a house and garden rent-free; £10 is annually given in equal portions towards apprenticing three of the scholars; £10 is divided in equal shares among the five inmates of the almshouses, and the remainder is reserved for the necessary repairs of the premises. The concerns of this charity are under the superintendence of twelve trustees, consisting of the vicar and eleven of the most respectable inhabitants of the parish. The Rev. Mr. Watkins, who died about ten years ago, bequeathed £3 per annum for the augmentation of the schoolmaster's salary; and the rent of a farm called Pathegau, in the hamlet of Glyn, bequeathed by an unknown benefactor, and now producing about £20 per annum, is distributed among the poor of the parish. Lewis Havard, by will in 1716, charged two tenements in Glyn Tawe, with the annual payment of ten shillings to the poor of the hamlet of Maescar, and the like sum to the poor of the hamlet of Senni. David Gwalter, of Maesgwalter, in the year 1723, bequeathed £3 per annum, to be paid out of the tenement of Maesgwalter, for apprenticing two poor children of the hamlet of Senni, or, in default thereof, of the parish at large, not participating in Sir John Davy's charity, and to be nominated by the occupier of Bailiau farm. The same benefactor also left five houses and gardens, adjoining Maesgwalter, one of which was to be divided into two, for six poor persons of the hamlet of Senni, or, in default of such, for poor persons of the parish at large: these houses having been suffered to fall down from neglect, the ground has been taken possession of, and built upon; and the intention of the testator has thus been frustrated.

On the mountain adjoining Llywel, on the western confines of the parish, were formerly two monuments of supposed Druidical origin, one of which, now destroyed, consisted of seven stones, said to have been arranged according to the configuration of the Pleiades, and called Meini'r pedair Gawres, "the memorial stones of the four heroines;" but to whom these monuments were erected is not known, neither has any traditionary account of them been preserved; they have been incorporated in the wall of a sheepfold. The other monument, which still remains, near the road from Trêcastle to Tavern y garrig, is called Cerigduon, or the "Black Stones:" they are arranged in the form of a circle, and are said to resemble the stones called the Hurlers, in the parish of St. Clare, in the county of Cornwall. Two Roman roads traversed this parish: one passed by its northern confines, from the Camlais to the Senni, in its course from Bannium, near the present Brecknock, to Maridunum, the modern Carmarthen: the other, called the Sarn Helen, anciently forming the great road from Deva, now Chester, to Nidus at Neath, entered this parish from the Vale of Senni, proceeded in a direction across the forest to a great stone called "Maen Llia," and thence declined into the Vale of Ystradvelltey. Maen Llia, which is about eleven feet high, is by some antiquaries supposed to have been a Roman milliary, but by others to have been erected as a guide to travellers in traversing the forest: it is situated at the distance of a few hundred yards from the present turnpike road leading from Brecknock, over the Great Forest, to Neath, and within fifty yards of the old Roman road. Numerous carneddau, or heaps of sepulchral stones, are scattered over the hilly parts of the parish; and barrows are frequently found in the valleys. A golden angel, of the time of Henry VII., was dug up about twenty-five years ago, in the north-eastern extremity of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £827. 7.

DIHEWYD, a parish partly in the hundred of TROED-YRAUR, and partly in that of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 533 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the pleasant Vale of Aëron, and not far from the river Mydur; the scenery is beautifully diversified, and towards the vale becomes highly picturesque. A fair is held at Llanwyddalys, within its limits, annually on the 9th of May. It constitutes the endowment of a prebend, formerly in the college of Llandewy-Brevi, but now in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, consolidated with that of Llanychaëron, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Vitalis, was rebuilt within the last five years, and is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. On the summit of a lofty hill, called Moel Dihewyd, are the remains of an ancient encampment, of the origin and history of which nothing is known. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £96. 17.

DINAS, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Fishguard, containing 741 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the coast of St. George's channel, and intersected by the turnpike road from Fishguard to Newport, is of small extent, and probably owes its name, which signifies "fortress," or "city," to the bold promontory of Dinas Head, which forms one side of Fishguard bay, and was fortified on the land side by an agger, now nearly demolished. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of Thomas Lloyd, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Brynach, occupies a remarkable situation on the beach, and at spring tides the walls of the churchyard are washed by the sea: but it is probable that this was not the site of the original structure, from a place called Brÿn Henllan, "old church hill," in the vicinity. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £106. 2.

Seal and Arms.

DINASMOWDDWY, an incorporated market town and township in that part of the parish of MALLWYD which is in the hundred of TAL Y BONT and MOWDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Dôl-gelley, and 202 (W. N. W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place is disreputably distinguished in the Welsh annals as having become, soon after the termination of the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the resort of numerous felons and outlaws, from whom sprang a race of lawless banditti, principally divided into Gwylliaid y Dugoed, "the banditti of the Black Wood," and Gwylliaid Cochion Mowddwy, "the red-haired banditti of Mowddwy," who for some time set the laws at defiance, and perpetrated the most frightful outrages, filling with terror the minds of the peaceable inhabitants of the district; who, rather than hazard their lives and property by proceeding along the regular roads to Shrewsbury and other places, were accustomed to pass over the mountains, and, to protect themselves from being surprised in the night, placed scythes in the chimneys of their houses, some of which singular defences were remaining so late as the close of the last century. To put an end to such acts of robbery and bloodshed, a commission was granted to John Wynn ab Meredydd, of Gwydir, Esq., and Lewis Owen, of Llwyn near Dôl-gelley, Esq., Vice-Chamberlain and Baron of the Exchequer of North Wales, who, by virtue of this authority, raised a body of strong men, and on Christmas eve made prisoners of about eighty of the depredators, upon whom they proceeded to hold trial, punishing them according to the extent of their crimes. Among these were two young men, whose mother urgently entreated Owen to spare one of them, which being denied, she, with all the vindictiveness of malignant fury, vowed that revenge should be taken by her remaining offspring upon the baron, who, on his journey to the assizes at Montgomery, in 1555, was waylaid among the thick woods of Dugoed Mowddwy, by a band of desperadoes, who blocked up the road with several long trees, which they had felled, and, after discharging a shower of arrows, rushed upon their victim, whom they assassinated, and left his body covered with upwards of thirty wounds: the scene of this tragical event is now called Llidiart y Barwn, "the Baron's Gate." This act of atrocity against one of the king's justiciaries drew down upon the proscribed bandits that punishment which a long series of merciless outrages demanded: vigorous measures were adopted for their extirpation: many of them, having been apprehended, were tried and executed, and the rest obliged to abandon their haunts, so that security and tranquillity were restored throughout the district. Bwlch oer Ddrws, "the Cold Door Pass," which is gained from this town by ascending a steep hill on the road to Dôl-gelley, is noted as having been one of the three places where the most powerful individuals of certain districts met, and entered into a compact for enforcing the strict dispensation of justice for all wrongs done prior and subsequently to the war brought on by the ambitious proceedings of Owain Glyndwr, whereby each individual who had been deprived of property was to have it restored to him without lawsuit, and various regulations for restoring the government of the country were resolved upon.

The town is pleasantly situated on the shelf of a rock, called Craig y Dinas, near the margin of the small river Cerist, at its conflux with the Dovey, and on the road from Dôl-gelley to Mallwyd, at the junction of three vales, each of which is enclosed by lofty mountains: it consists principally of one street of meanly built houses. There are some deserted lead-works on the road to Dôl-gelley, in which a kind of blueish ochre is found; this the shepherds wet and pound in a mortar, and then form into balls, which they use in marking their sheep. The market is on Saturday, but it has almost fallen into disuse. Fairs are held on the Friday before Palm-Sunday, June 2nd, September 10th, October 22nd, and November 13th. Dinasmowddwy was anciently a place of much greater importance than it is at present, and is said to have been a fortified city, and the residence of a chieftain: it still retains its corporate privileges, and is the capital of a lordship, which includes the whole of the parishes of Mallwyd and Llanymowddwy (except the township of Caer Einion Vechan in the former), over which also the jurisdiction of the corporation extends. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, and burgesses: the mayor, who was formerly elected annually, is now chosen only triennially: he is a justice of the peace, and possesses the power of trying criminals, but seldom exercises it, except in cases for which the punishment of the stocks, or confinement in the veg vawr, or "great fetter," is assigned, or in such cases as the duties of a magistrate ordinarily embrace. The recorder determines all actions regarding property, not exceeding forty shillings, and also holds a court leet twice a year, in May and November. The freedom is inherited by birth by the sons of freemen, on the decease of the father. The corporation are entitled to the exclusive right of licensing victuallers within the lordship, and although they have lost much of their ancient authority, they still retain its insignia, consisting principally of a mace, standard measure, stocks, and the veg vawr, or "great fetter." The county magistrates exercise concurrent jurisdiction within the borough and lordship, and hold petty sessions once a month. There is a place of worship for Independents.

DISCOED, a chapelry in that part of the parish and newly-created borough of PRESTEIGN which is locally in the hundred of Radnor, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Presteign, containing 116 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael. It is situated in a pleasant valley, a short distance south of the river Lug, on the road between Presteign and Cascob. Offa's Dyke passes within half a mile north-west of the village. There is a separate assessment for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure for which amounts to £17.7.

DISERTH, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See LLANSANTFRAID GLAN CONWAY.

DISSERTH (DISERTH), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles

(N.) from Builth, comprising the townships of Disserth and Tre'r Coed, each of which separately supports its own poor, and containing 610 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the banks of the river Wye, which is not navigable in this part of its course; and is intersected by the turnpike roads from Builth, in the county of Brecknock, to Newtown, in Montgomeryshire, and to Aberystwith, in the county of Cardigan. A place called Llêchryd, situated within its limits, has generally been considered the scene of the celebrated victory, gained by Rhys ab Tewdwr, the rightful prince of South Wales, at the head of his Irish forces, over the usurping princes of Powys, the three sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn; but this event may, with greater probability, be referred to Llêchryd near Cardigan, on the banks of the river Teivy. The general surface of the parish is gently undulating, with the exception of a range of hills called Carneddau, which rise to a considerable height, and command an extensive and interesting prospect over the northern parts of the county of Brecknock, and a considerable portion of that of Radnor. The soil is in general fertile; and the lands, which are for the greater part enclosed, are in a good state of cultivation. The scenery of the parish is pleasingly varied, but not particularly striking; and as, with the exception of the Carneddau, there are few hills of any height, the views of the surrounding country are rather confined. The Carneddau hills afford good pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep, of which the wool is of very superior quality and highly esteemed. Fairs were annually held, on Hawey common, on the Saturdays before the 11th of February, the 11th of May, and the 11th of November, chiefly for the sale of live stock, but they have fallen into disuse. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Bettws-Disserth annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Cewydd, is a spacious and venerable structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and a lofty tower, crowned with turrets, which, from being white-washed, forms a conspicuous object in the distant view, but loses much of its original character upon nearer inspection. The rectory-house was burnt down, and has not been rebuilt; there is only half an acre of glebe. A charity school is supported by the subscriptions of a few benevolent individuals: it is in contemplation to erect a school-room, and to increase the number of children, who will be taught on the National plan. Ezekiel Williams, in 1762, bequeathed £40 to the poor not receiving parochial relief. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £372. 15., of which sum the portion raised by the township of Disserth is £187. 9.

DOGMAEL'S, ST. (ST. DOGVAEL'S), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (W.) from Cardigan, containing 2109 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and is connected with some events of importance during the earlier periods of the history of the principality. In 987, the Danes, who had effected a landing on this part of the coast, after ravaging and laying waste the surrounding country, plundered and burnt the church of this place. In the reign of William Rufus, Llewelyn and Einon, sons of Cadivor ab Collwyn, and Einon ab Collwyn, their uncle, formed a conspiracy against Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales; and having prevailed upon Gruffydd ab Meredydd, another nobleman of that country, to join them, advanced with their united forces to St. Dogmael's, where Rhys at that time resided, hoping to attack him by surprise. But Rhys was fully prepared for the encounter, and a severe and well-contested battle took place near the village, in which, after much slaughter on both sides, the confederates were totally defeated. Llewelyn and Einon were both killed in the engagement, and Gruffydd ab Meredydd was taken prisoner after the battle and beheaded, as a traitor to his country. Einon ab Collwyn, the only leader who escaped, fled for refuge to Iestyn ab Gwrgan, lord of Morganwg, who was at that time at enmity with Rhys; and, suggesting to him the fatal expedient of having recourse to Norman auxiliaries, introduced into that part of the country a power which afterwards displayed itself in violent acts of aggression, and in the rapacious seizure of territory, by finally depriving Iestyn of his dominions, which were distributed among the Norman knights. A monastery of the order of Tirone was begun here by Martin de Tours, who forcibly obtained possession of the district of Kemmes, in the reign of William the Conqueror, and was completed by his son, Robert Fitz-Martin, in the reign of Henry I., and dedicated to St. Mary: its revenue, at the time of the dissolution, was estimated at £96. 0. 2., at which period it was granted to John Bradshaw, who lies buried beneath the chancel, under a tombstone bearing the following inscription:—"Hic jacet Johannes Bradshaw, Armiger, qui obiit ultimo die Maii, A. D. 1588:" of this family was Bradshaw, who presided at the trial of Charles I. The buildings, which were in the early style of English architecture, appear to have been substantial and on a considerable scale: the remains consist of part of the choir and transept of the church, and the refectory, which has been converted into a barn. The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Teivy, and is intersected by a small rivulet, across which, and serving as a foot bridge, was a Roman monumental stone, about five feet and a half in length, bearing the inscription "ACRANI FILI: CVNOTAMI:" it has, however, been removed, and is now placed in the corner of a wall near the church. The surrounding scenery is pleasant, and in some instances picturesque; and the view, embracing the course of the river Teivy from its influx into the sea, with the town of Cardigan and its ancient bridge, is exceedingly interesting. The lands are all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is fertile and productive. A salmon fishery is advantageously carried on during the summer, and a herring fishery in the autumn and winter, affording employment to such of the inhabitants as are not engaged in agricultural pursuits. A small portion of the town of Cardigan, called Bridge-End, which has been very recently built, extends into the hamlet of Bridge-End, in this parish, and has, by the late Boundary Act, been included within the enlarged limits of that borough: one of the Cardigan fairs is held here, and the principal proprietor intends to erect some more new houses along the banks of the river and up the road. The living is a discharged vicarage, with those of Llantyd and Monington annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A Sunday school, which is said to be the oldest in the principality, is supported by subscription. The sum of £2 per annum, chargeable on the farm of Rhôs y Moeliad, and some other trifling donations, are annually distributed among the poor. There is a strong chalybeate spring in the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £601. 17.

DOGWELL'S, ST. (ST. DOGVAEL'S), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, on the road from that town to Fishguard, containing 514 inhabitants. This parish is noted, on traditional authority, as the birthplace and place of burial of that distinguished patriot and chieftain, Owain Glyndwr, who is said to have been born at Little Trêfgarn, and to have been interred at the small village of Wolf's Castle, both situated within its limits. The manor of St. Dogwell's was granted to the upper chapter of St. David's by Sir Richard Symmond, Knt., in 1328, for the maintenance of two priests in the cathedral church of that place, to say mass for the benefit of his soul and that of his wife: the rectorial tithes of the parish had been given to the same body by Bishop Thomas Wallensis, in the year 1254. Little Trêfgarn was originally annexed by Bishop Iorwerth to the precentorship in the cathedral church of St. David's, on the foundation of that dignity, but was subsequently resumed by Bishop Gower, and an annual stipend of twenty marks allowed in its stead: it does not appear at what time it was re-appropriated, but it is now held on lease of the precentor by William Edwardes Tucker, Esq., of Sealy Ham, as representative of the family of Edwardes, of Little Trêfgarn, in which it has been vested for upwards of two hundred years. Sealy Ham is an elegant modernized mansion on the bank of a small stream, called the Sealy, and has been in the possession of the same family since the reign of Edward III.: it is now the property and residence of W. E. Tucker, Esq., by marriage of William Edwardes, Esq., of Little Trêfgarn, with the heiress of that house. Slate of good quality is found in this parish, and is worked upon a limited scale. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. 0½., and in the patronage of the Upper Chapter in the Cathedral Church of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Dogvael, is a plain building of considerable antiquity, without either tower or spire: the nave is separated from the south aisle by low Norman arches. The sum of £7. 10. per annum is paid to the poor of this parish by Major Harries of Trêvacoön, under the will of the late John Edwardes, Esq., of Trêfgarn. Within the limits of the parish are, a cromlech, and other remains of antiquity, some of which, supposed to have been Druidical altars, are at present little more than an indiscriminate heap of stones: there are also slight remains of three ancient encampments, probably of Danish origin, and in a more perfect state than the relics above mentioned; of these, one, near which are three tumuli, is situated at Wolf's Castle, and the two others, within one of which there is a rocking-stone, are within the demesne of Sealy Ham. The annual average expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £105.

DÔLBENMAEN (DÔL-BEN-MAEN), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.W. by W.) from Trêmadoc, on the road from Carnarvon, containing 355 inhabitants. There are some considerable veins of copper-ore in this parish, but no spirited efforts have ever been made to work them; and the higher, or mountainous, part of it contains an abundance of manganese. Numerous quartz crystals, in the form of regular prisms of six, eight, and ten sides, terminating at one extremity in an obtuse point, and of considerable magnitude, have been found here, deeply imbedded in a species of black vegetable soil. A fair is held annually on August 26th. The living is rectorial and is consolidated with the rectory of Penmorva, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is a small structure, in the later style of English architecture, built in 1432, and now in a very ruinous and neglected state. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Not far from the church is a circular artificial mound of earth, on which was a castle, apparently built to guard the pass of the valley, and probably of British origin; but no remains of the building are now in existence. At Ystum Cegid, not far from the site of the castle, are three vast cromlechs, situated near each other and of very rude construction. A rent-charge of £2. 10. was bequeathed to the poor of this parish by an unknown benefactor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £111. 7.

DÔLGELLEY (DÔLGELLAU, or DÔLGELLEU), a market town and parish in the hundred of TAL Y BONT and MOWDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 18 miles (S.W.) from Bala, 20 (S.E.) from Harlech, and 211 (W.N.W.) from London, containing 4087 inhabitants. This place derives its name (which is compounded of Dôl "a dale," and Celli, "a grove of hazel trees,") from being situated in a vale abounding with hazels. During the insurrection headed by Owain Glyndwr, that aspiring chieftain assembled a parliament at this town, in 1404, whence he despatched his chancellor, Griffith Yonge, L.L.D., archdeacon of Merioneth, and his kinsman, John Hanmer, ambassadors to the French court, whose credentials, beginning "Owinus Dei gratid princeps Wallie," were dated thus:—"Datum apud Doleguelli 10 die mensis Maii, MCCCC quarto, et principatus nostri quarto." During the war between Charles I. and the parliament, Dôlgelley was occupied by a small garrison for the latter, and was besieged by about one hundred of the king's troops, who, however, were dispersed by Mr. Edward Vaughan, and their captain made prisoner.

The town is justly regarded as the provincial metropolis of Merionethshire, being by far the most populous and centrally situated of any within its limits. It occupies a delightful situation on the road from Welshpool to Barmouth, in a fertile and picturesque vale, bounded by lofty mountains, the sides of which are, in many places, richly clothed with wood, and which is adorned with numerous genteel residences, and watered by the river Wnion, or Gwynion, which unites with the Maw, or Mawddâch, near Llanelltyd, about two miles lower down, and thence, under the latter name, flows into Cardigan bay at Barmouth. The streets are irregularly formed, and the houses mostly ill-built; but a good line of houses was begun on the 4th of June, 1830, by Sir R. W. Vaughan, Bart., called, in respect for the venerable nobleman of that name, Eldon Row; and many other parts of the town have recently experienced, or are now undergoing, considerable improvement. The river Wnion is here crossed by a stone bridge of seven arches, erected in 1638, which was some years ago enlarged and repaired. A book society has been formed, which consists of several highly respectable members. The parish is about sixteen miles in length and from three to four in breadth: nearly the whole of it is rocky mountainous land, consisting of sheep-walks and turbaries, in the latter of which a considerable quantity of peat is obtained; and the proportion of arable and meadow land exceeds little more than one-fortieth part of its superficial extent: upwards of six thousand acres of waste land were enclosed by act of parliament in 1811. A great quantity of peat is brought up the river Maw from an extensive turbarry near Barmouth, at which place the coal used by the inhabitants is imported. Dôlgeley and its vicinity have long been noted for the manufacture of a sort of coarse woollen cloth, or flannel, called "webs," or "Welsh plains," in which about one thousand four hundred persons are at present employed: the number of pieces made annually amounts to about thirty thousand, averaging one hundred and ten yards each, which are chiefly sent to Liverpool, and thence shipped to Charlestown, South Carolina. This material is likewise manufactured in two other small districts, one in Montgomeryshire, and the other in Denbighshire; but the quantity produced in Dôlgeley and its environs is by far the greatest. The manufacture of "webs" in this town is of remote origin, as appears by acts of parliament of the first and third of James I., and by two orders for its regulation from the Privy Council of Charles I., which are further noticed in the article on the county of Merioneth. The warp is now composed of the fleece wool of the country; while the woof is a mixture, containing about one-third, and sometimes one-half, of lambs' wool. The "webs" of Dôlgeley, in common with those of Machynlleth in Montgomeryshire, are called by the drapers "strong cloth," to distinguish them from those of the Glyn district, near Oswestry, which are termed "small cloth," because the pieces are about one-eighth of a yard narrower, though of the same length. Until towards the close of the last century, the only market for them was one held weekly, on Thursday, at Shrewsbury, in the hall belonging to the drapers of that town, where no buyers but of that particular guild were admitted, and an injurious monopoly consequently prevailed; but agents are now employed by the merchants of Liverpool and Shrewsbury, to collect them at the place of their manufacture. In the last century they were chiefly sold directly from the loom; but fulling-mills have since been erected upon the banks of the streams in the neighbourhood, and bleaching-grounds formed along the sides of the hills. Much business is done in the dressing of native lamb-skins and foreign lamb and kid skins, upwards of one hundred thousand of the former being sent annually to Worcester and Chester, and a few to London: tanning is also carried on to a considerable extent, and in some of the adjacent parishes are mines of copper and lead. During the period of about ten years which intervened between the close of the American war and the commencement of the great European struggle, the web-manufacturers of Dôlgeley established a warehouse at the port of Barmouth, and thence conveyed about one-third of their manufactures by sea to London, the small vessels employed taking each about three hundred webs, each consisting of two pieces, over a ballast of slate or paving stones; and the total number of yards annually exported amounted to about twenty-five thousand. This maritime trade, however, ceased in 1793, when it became necessary to return to the old method of land carriage, which was five times more expensive, and, conjointly with other circumstances, caused such a decline in the prosperity of the trade, that many of the weavers were compelled to seek other employment. At present the webs, skins, &c., are carried by land, in waggons, to Shrewsbury, and thence distributed to different parts of the kingdom. The town is principally supplied from Liverpool with groceries, which are brought to Barmouth, and thence conveyed up the river Maw, in boats varying from ten to twenty tons' burden, to a place near Llanelltyd bridge, within two miles of Dôlgeley. There are two weekly markets, on Tuesday and Saturday; and fairs, chiefly for the sale of horned cattle, horses, cheese, butter, &c., are held on February 20th, April 21st, May 11th, June 27th, August 13th, September 20th, October 9th, November 22nd, and December 16th. The summer assizes, and the Easter and Michaelmas quarter sessions, for the county are held at Dôlgeley; but seldom more than two or three prisoners are tried at the former, and frequently none at all. The county court, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, is also most commonly held here, though sometimes at Bala; and petty sessions are held here for the division. The county hall, which is situated near the river Wnion, is a neat stone edifice of mixed architecture, erected in 1825, at an expense of £3000: the length of the front is seventy-two feet eight inches: the court-room is handsomely fitted up with necessary accommodations for the officers of justice, and measures forty-three feet nine inches by thirty feet: on the right of it are, a retiring-room for the judges, an apartment for the petty jury, and the record office; and on the left are a grand jury room and an armoury for the county. The county gaol, situated at the outskirts of the town, is a semicircular edifice of stone, built in 1811, at an expense of nearly £5000: it includes also the house of correction, and comprises three day-rooms and four airing-yards, and will admit of a classification of the prisoners into five divisions.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £13. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. There is no parsonage-house, nor was there any land attached to the living prior to the enclosure of waste land in the year 1811, when five acres, lying about three miles from the town, were assigned to the rector out of the allotment due to the crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat structure, principally of Grecian archi-

ture, with a square embattled tower, containing an excellent peal of eight bells: the interior exhibits a singularity in the seats, which are simply forms, or benches, with backs to them. There is an ancient monument to the memory of Meiric Vychan ab Ynwr Vychan, fifth in descent from Prince Cadwgan, son of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, who resided at the neighbouring house of Nannau, which still continues in the possession of his descendants: he is represented as clad in close mail, wearing a helmet and neck guard, with a sword in his hand, and a dog at his feet: his shield bears a lion passant gardant, with the inscription "Hic jacet Mauric filius Ynwr Vychan." A handsome modern monument has also been erected to the memory of the late Lord Chief Baron Richards, who was a native of this parish. An ancient chapel, called Ysppyty Gwanas, was formerly situated on the road to Dinasmowddwy, about four miles distant, the site of which is now marked by a few yew trees. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached to each. The free grammar school was founded in 1665, by John Ellis, D.D., incumbent of this parish, who bequeathed a tenement called Penrhyn, in the parish of Llanaber, in this county, for the instruction of twelve poor boys: it was further endowed by the Rev. Ellis Lewis, of this place, by will dated August 21st, 1727, with a tenement called Cilgwyn, in the parish of Llandrillo yn Rhôs, Denbighshire, and with £50 for the erection of a school-room; also with £300 in the three per cent. consols., by the Rev. Mr. Tamberlain, a late incumbent: the present income, arising from these and some minor donations, is about £40 per annum: the master, who is appointed by the rector of Dôlgelley, must be a graduate of either Oxford or Cambridge, and is not allowed to accept church preferment, without resigning his situation. A National school, in which about one hundred children of both sexes are at present instructed, was established in 1827, and is supported by subscription. John Rowlands, Esq., of London, left the sum of £4 per annum for apprenticing poor boys: and a few other small benefactions have been made for the poor of this place, the principal of which is a farm, called Vaenol, in the parish of Towyn, producing about £15. 15. per annum, for distribution at the discretion of the rector.

Part of the building in which a parliament was held by Owain Glyndwr is still standing among a group of old houses near the Ship Inn, and is called Cwrt Plâs yn y drêw, "the town-hall court." The Roman Via Occidentalis is supposed to have taken its course from Menapia (St. David's) to Segontium (Carnarvon) by this town, between which and Trawsvynydd, at a place called Pen y Strÿd, or "the head of the street," part of it may yet be traced. Close to the town, near a well called Fynnon Vair, "St. Mary's Well," the water of which was formerly considered efficacious in the cure of rheumatic diseases, a few Roman coins have been discovered. A golden torques (a baldric worn as a badge of distinction by some of the Roman conquerors of Britain, and by such of the ancient British chieftains as were their allies) was found in a turbarry, on the 2nd of September, 1823, on the margin of Llŷn Gwernan, near the northern cliffs of Cader Idris, by James P. Hughes, Esq., who discovered it whilst shooting, and, ignorant of its value as a very rare relic of antiquity, offered it for sale to a friend for five shillings, but the offer being rejected, he presented it to David Jones, Esq., one of the clerks of the ingrossments of the House of Commons, by whom it has been discovered to be a torques: it is forty-two inches in length, weighs eight oz. and eight dwts., and the intrinsic value of the metal is about £36. In the grounds of Nannau, in this parish, there are the remains of a British fortification, called Moel Orthrum, "the hill of oppression," or Moel Ofrwm, "the hill of sacrifice:" it is formed by the summit of a high rock, encircled by a rampart of loose stones. The mansion of Nannau, situated about two miles from Dôlgelley, is a handsome substantial structure, rebuilt on a more eligible site by its present owner, Sir R. W. Vaughan, Bart.; it stands on very high ground, and is surrounded by thick woods and plantations, which hold a high rank among the beauties of the Vale of Dôlgelley. In the reign of Henry IV., the estate of Nannau belonged to Howel Sele, a warm partisan of the house of Lancaster, and the bitter enemy of Owain Glyndwr, his first cousin. To reconcile the kinsmen, the abbot of Cymmer contrived a meeting at this place, and apparently succeeded in his design; but whilst walking out, Owain, observing a doe feeding, pointed it out as a fine mark to Howel, who was considered the most skilful archer of that period, and the latter bent his bow, and pretended to take aim, but suddenly turning round, let fly at Owain, who, however, being protected by armour which he wore under his clothes, received no injury. Owain immediately seized his treacherous kinsman, and burnt his mansion of Nannau to the ground. Howel was conveyed to some place of imprisonment, and was never afterwards heard of alive; but, about forty years after this event, the skeleton of a man, supposed to be his, was discovered in the hollow trunk of a huge oak, in which he had probably been confined by Owain.

The Vale of Dôlgelley is remarkable for the number and variety of rich prospects which it affords; and the scenery of the surrounding country is characterized by a surpassing grandeur, richness, and diversity of aspect: there is, probably, no place in the principality whence so many interesting excursions may be made, as from Dôlgelley; in consequence of which tourists usually station themselves here for some days. Among the principal objects claiming notice is the towering Cader Idris, "the seat of Idris," situated in this parish, the summit of which is two thousand eight hundred and fifty feet above the level of Dôlgelley green, being exceeded in height only by two other mountains in Wales: its south-western ascent commences on the sea-shore, close to the æstuary of the small river Dysyni, about a mile from Towyn, and proceeds almost uninterruptedly, first northward for three miles, and then for ten miles east-north-eastward, with a branch, nearly three miles long, extending in a south-westerly direction parallel to the main ridge. The ascent from Dôlgelley, which usually occupies nearly three hours, commences about a mile and a half from the town, on the road to Towyn: this performed, and the highest summit, called Pen y Gader, once attained, a richly diversified scene of vast extent, having a circumference of at least five hundred miles, and of almost indescribable grandeur, presents itself. To the north the prospect is terminated by Snowdon, with its dependent mountains; on the west, by the bay of Cardigan, bounded by the Carnarvonshire hills; on the south, by the Radnorshire hills and Plinlimmon mountain, with a partial glimpse between them of the bay of Swansea and the Bristol channel, together with the conspicuous summits of the Brecknockshire hills; and on the east by the lake of Bala, the two Arenig mountains, the two Arans, and the long chain of the Berwyn mountains, with the Breidden and Wrekin hills, and even Blackstone Edge, on the border of Lancashire: occasionally also some of the Irish mountains are visible. Within the limits of these interesting boundaries numberless objects of romantic beauty, including mountains of different forms and elevations, valleys, lakes, harbours, towns, and villages, combine to form a picturesque and diversified landscape, rarely excelled for richness and variety. The mountain is steep and craggy on every side, but especially on the south, to the border of Tal y Llyn lake, where the descent is almost perpendicular. Its breadth bears only a small proportion to its length; a line passing along its base and intersecting the summit would hardly measure four miles and a half; while in other parts the breadth of the base seldom exceeds one mile. At a place called Rhiwgredydd, within a few yards of the path along which the ascent is generally made, in the side of the mountain, a sort of mineral, much resembling English amber, was discovered in 1831, of which several tons have already been procured: the vein extends horizontally between two rocks, and is about three-quarters of a yard in breadth. The cataracts in the vicinity are also of surpassing interest and transcendent beauty. Of these, the nearest is Rhaiadr dû, or "the Black Cascade," more commonly called Dôl y Melynllŷn Cascade, situated a little beyond the fifth milestone, on the road to Trawsvynydd: it is approached by a path leading from the left of the road up a tolerably steep woody ascent, whence the river Camlan is seen pouring its waters over a rocky precipice full forty feet in perpendicular height, in two principal sheets, and through some lateral gulches into a bed of dark-coloured disjointed rocks, through which it rushes with foaming fury, and is speedily engulfed in the darkness of the adjacent woods. A view of its further progress is obtained by means of a steep and intricate path, which leads to the foot of the cascade, where a grand and beautiful prospect opens: an additional waterfall, nearly thirty feet in height, appears immediately in front; to the left, the former cataract tumbles furiously over the rocks, which in many places are covered with a pure white lichen, and to the right rises a perpendicular mass of rocks, crowned with trees. About two miles to the north-east of these falls, in a deep, narrow, and thickly wooded valley, are the cascades of Pistyll Cain and Pistyll Mawddâch, situated within a short distance of each other: the former is generally approached over a rude alpine bridge, formed by the trunk of an oak thrown from rock to rock across a dark narrow chasm, through which the river Cayne rushes with noisy and impetuous rage; after which, descending to the bottom of the fall, the river is seen rolling its foaming waters over a rugged ledge of rocks, about two hundred feet in height, nearly perpendicular, and, falling upon rocks of a light dun colour, has worn them into hollows of great depth and grotesque form. Pistyll Mawddâch consists of three falls, the first forming a sheet of water, about twenty feet broad, and nearly as many in height, which is received into a kind of natural basin, about thirty feet in diameter: hence the river glides over the second precipice, by a fall of about thirty feet, into a second basin, larger than the former; and from this, contracting itself, it is precipitated over the third ledge, by a fall of twenty feet, into a capacious pool, from which, issuing with boiling fury, it foams among the rocky fragments that interrupt its course, and proceeds onward to its junction with the Cayne. The small mountain river Clywedog, which rises on Cader Idris, is in this parish, and, in its course of about two miles, forms numerous waterfalls, some of which are fifty feet in height. This river winds pleasantly through the grounds of I. H. Lewis, R. Richards, and J. Edwards, Esqrs., at whose expense an excellent gravel walk has been constructed along each of its banks, with others branching off, so as to afford a better view of the falls; and its waters, after heavy rains, descend with great velocity and noise over the huge rocks: its banks are well wooded, and the whole forms a scene highly picturesque and romantic. The road to Dinasmowddwy commands a fine view of the vale, with the town of Dôlgelley, and the lofty Cader Idris; and from Twrglâs, near Garthynghared, are seen the bay of Cardigan, Bardsey Island, the coast of Carnarvon, and the town of Barmouth, at the mouth of the Mawddâch, with that river winding westward through the vale, which is bounded by the two Arans: the fore ground is delightfully varied by the picturesque road from Dôlgelley to Barmouth, and the lofty rugged mountains and well-wooded fertile valleys which intervene. Lewis Owen, Esq., Vice-Chamberlain and Baron of the Exchequer for North Wales, who was barbarously murdered by a gang of lawless banditti, near Dinasmowddwy, whilst on his journey to the assizes at Montgomery, in 1555, resided at Llwyn, near this town. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1343. 3.

DÔLGWDEN (DÔL-GWDEN), a township in the parish of TRÊVEGLWYS, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W.) from Llanidloes. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated in a vale near the junction of the Bâchau stream with the river Clywedog, on the road from Machynlleth to Llanidloes. There are a few agreeable residences, though the general aspect of the surrounding district is wild and mountainous.

DÔLWYDDELAN (DÔL-WEDDELAN), a parish in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Llanrwst, containing 601 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the south-eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Merionethshire, by which it is bounded on the south, and extending on the west to the mountains of Snowdon, which are partly within its limits. It is intersected by the small river Ledan, which receives several streams that descend from the neighbouring hills, and, taking an easterly course through the parish, falls into the Conway near Capel Garmon. The surface is abruptly broken, rising in many places into lofty eminences; and, with the exception of the valleys, which are fertile and well cultivated, the lands are for the greater part mountainous and barren. The surrounding scenery is marked with features of romantic grandeur, and distinguished rather for striking boldness of character than for picturesque beauty. Fairs, principally for the sale of cattle, are held here annually on April 16th, August 15th, and September 20th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Willoughby de Eresby. The church, dedicated to St. Gwyvelan, is not remarkable for any architectural details. Elinor Thomas, in 1735, bequeathed £60 for the benefit of the poor, the interest of which is annually distributed among them. In this parish are the remains of the ancient castle of Dôlwyddelan, built probably by some of the princes of North Wales, though the original founder, and the time of its erection, are unknown. Iorwerth Drwndwn made this castle his residence, and his son Llewelyn the Great is said to have been born at this place. In the reign of Henry VII., Meredydd ab Ievan, ancestor of the Wynns of Gwydir, purchased the castle and its dependencies from the executors of Sir Ralph Berkenet, and made it his principal residence, while employed in reducing to order this part of the principality, which was at that time infested with banditti. For this purpose he kept an armed force here, which attended him on all occasions, and by his courage and perseverance succeeded in restoring order and tranquillity. The castle occupied the summit of a precipitous rock, and consisted of two square towers, between which was the castle yard; it was built of the stone of the country, and was a place of considerable strength. About a mile distant from it was the strong house called Penamnaen, built by Meredydd ab Ievan, of which some vestiges are still discernible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £146. 7.

DÔL Y GARROG, a township in the parish of LLANBEDR, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Llanrwst. The population is returned with the township of Arddr. This place is situated on the turnpike road between Aberconway and Llanrwst, where the scenery of the beautiful vale of the river Conway assumes its most diversified and picturesque character. A stream, issuing from Llŷn Cawlwyd, a lake on the lofty mountains to the south, and, rushing down with great force between steep banks, forming many pleasing cascades in its course, crosses the road here, and falls into the Conway. Over it is a lofty bridge of one arch, from which the varied scenery of the surrounding district is seen to much advantage.

DONATT'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6½ miles (S. W.) from Cowbridge, containing 151 inhabitants. This place is distinguished as the site of an ancient castle, formerly of great strength and magnificence, which was one of the twelve fortresses erected by the Norman knights who attended Fitz-Hamon in his conquest of this part of the principality. The lordship of St. Donatt's was given by Fitz-Hamon to Sir William le Esterling, or Stradling, in the possession of whose descendants it continued without interruption for more than seven hundred years, and on the decease of Sir Edward Stradling, Bart., who died at Montpellier, in 1738, it passed, with the castle, to Mr. Fontaine Tyrwhitt, and both are now the property of Thomas Tyrwhitt Drake, Esq., grandnephew of that gentleman. The castle is situated on the sea-coast, and is an extensive pile of building, occupying a spacious quadrangle, over the gate leading into which are the arms of the Stradlings: part of it is now habitable, and in the later style of English architecture. The park lies to the west of it, and the gardens are on the south, between the walls of the castle and the sea, and are constructed on terraces descending to the shore of the Bristol channel, of which they command a fine view. Within the park is a quadrangular watch-tower of lofty elevation and picturesque appearance, which, according to local tradition, was erected for observing vessels in distress, not for the purpose of rendering assistance, but with a view to take immediate possession of the wreck, which became the property of the lord of the manor. In the neighbourhood there is a cave of considerable extent and grandeur, accessible only at low water, which in the summer time is much visited by parties, who, after having been gratified with a view of the romantic beauties of the place, usually dine upon the rocks. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £3. 14. 4½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Thomas Tyrwhitt Drake, Esq. The church is beautifully situated beneath the castle, in a romantic dell, abounding with valuable timber, and contains, in a small sepulchral chapel belonging to the owner of the castle, some handsome monuments of the Stradlings, and an elegant sarcophagus of white marble to the memory of the last of that name, who died abroad; there are also several paintings of the fifteenth century, commemorating different members of that family. In the churchyard stands an elegant cross, of elaborate design and execution. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £90. 3.

DONATT'S (WELSH ST.), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 304 inhabitants. This place was formerly annexed to the parish of Llanblethian, from which it has been separated, and is now a parish of itself. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanblethian, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church possesses no claim to architectural notice. Miss Leysons, about the year 1774, bequeathed a rent-charge of £5 for distribution among the poor of this parish. Caercady, the property of John Thomas Jones, Esq. R. N., is a genteel mansion, built by the late Colonel Jenkins, one of the auditors of the public accounts, from whom it came by marriage to its present proprietor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £127.

DOTHIE-CAMDDWR (DEUTU-CAMDDWR), a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14½ miles (E. N. E.) from Lampeter, containing 150 inhabitants. This place takes its name from the river Camddwr, which falls into the Towy at the junction of the counties of Cardigan, Brecknock, and Carmarthen. In 1074, a sanguinary battle was fought here, between Rhŷs ab Owain and Rhydderch ab Caradog, princes of South Wales, on the one side, and Gronw and Llewelyn, the sons of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, on the other, to avenge the murder of the late prince, their grandfather, in which the latter were victorious, and Rhydderch was slain, but Owain was, nevertheless, allowed to retain the sovereignty of South Wales. On the western bank of the river Camddwr there is an ancient military work, called Castell, constructed by Owain and Rhydderch on this occasion; and the place where Gronw and Llewelyn crossed the river by a ford is still named Rhŷd y meirch, "the ford of the cavalry." The ground in the neighbourhood of this place is rugged and mountainous. The township separately supports its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £44. 7.

DOTHIE-PYSCOTTWR (DEUTU-PYSGOTWR), a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 132 inhabitants. This township is situated near the source of the Piscottwr stream, which unites with the Dothie, previously to the latter joining the river Towy on the border of Carmarthenshire. It separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £24. 15.

DREMERCHION, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES. — See TREMERCHION.

DREWERN (TREWERN), a township in the parish of GLÂSCOMB, hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Builth, containing 203 inhabitants. This place is situated in a valley in the upper part of the parish, near the source of the river Edwy. It comprises one-half of the parish, of which the township of Vainor forms the other. In some places the scenery is of a pleasing character, agreeably contrasting with the contiguous mountains. The mineral springs called Blaen Edwy Wells are situated in this township. A bridge crosses the Edwy here on the road from New Radnor to Builth.

DUTTON-DIFIETH (DUTTON-DIFFAITH), a township in the parochial chapelry of ISCOED, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. by S.) from Wrexham, containing 161 inhabitants. It is separately assessed for the support of its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £53. 19.

DUTTON Y BRÂN (DUTTON Y BRAIN), a township in the parochial chapelry of ISCOED, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Wrexham, containing 58 inhabitants. This township is very small, but is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor: the average annual expenditure is £50. 4.

DWYGYVYLCHI (DWY-GYVYLCHI), a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Aberconway, on the road from Liverpool to Holyhead, containing 444 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the mountainous district of Carnarvonshire, and is bounded on the east by the æstuary of the river Conway, which here falls into the Irish sea. In altering and improving the line of road from Liverpool to Holyhead, in 1826, a new route was formed through it from Aberconway, nearly four miles in extent, at an expense exceeding £20,000: it passes through the immense rocky mountain of Penmaen Bâch, which here projects into the sea, and, being carried immediately above the sea, is impassable during the winter from the heavy gales which prevail, in consequence of which the mail and other coaches are compelled to travel along the old line of road through the mountain pass of Sychnant. The village is small, and consists only of a few scattered houses irregularly built. Copper-ore and manganese have been found in the parish, in small quantities, and pyrites in large masses; but the copper mines only are now worked, and that upon a limited scale. There is also an abundance of feldspar, but the works have been nearly discontinued. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of I. Wynne Eyton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Tegonwy, is a small neat edifice, pleasantly situated beneath the lofty mountain of Penmaen Bâch, and is appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The produce of several charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £76. 14. per annum, is annually distributed among the poor on St. Thomas's day. On the mountains within the parish are numerous ancient encampments and fortresses, of which those to the south of Penmaen Bâch are the most extensive and singular in their construction. The principal of these occupies a very spacious area, enclosed by a strong stone wall of rude construction, much of which, with its facing of uncemented stones, is still remaining entire. Near it are seven smaller circular enclosures, about fifteen feet in diameter, formed of large upright stones, and in the centre of some of them stands a single upright stone. To the south of these are no less than twenty-six circular enclosures of similar construction, varying from twelve to twenty-two feet in diameter; and upon a rocky promontory facing Deganwy is a very deep narrow fosse, surrounding a wall of loose stones. The whole of this range of hills appears to have been anciently occupied, the foundations of several buildings being spread around on all sides; upright stones and carneddau are scattered in various places, and at a short distance stands a large upright stone of rude form, called Maen y Campiau, or "stone of the games," for the celebration of which, and also for the holding of the great Eisteddvodau, or meetings of the bards, these and similar places appear to have been appropriated during the earlier ages of the Britons. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £92. 17.

DYFRYN, a parcel in the parish of LLANGYNIDR, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Crickhowel, containing 934 inhabitants. The Blaen Romney iron-works are situated here, near the source of that river, which rises in the southern extremity of the parish, on the border of Glamorganshire. Several tram-roads traverse the district, the principal of which is the Brŷn-Oer tram-road, terminating at the Brecknock canal. Coal is procured here; and the hills, on which are some few scattered carneddau, abound with limestone. Traces of an ancient Roman causeway, or vicinal road, from Caerphilly to Bedwelty in Monmouthshire, and through the iron mines of Brŷn-Oer to the Roman iron forges at Llanvrynach, in the Vale of Usk, may still be traced on the Trevil Glâs mountain, in this hamlet; and a celt was picked up on this hill some years since. A large natural cavern, called Stabl Vawr, or "the great stable," above which is a large heap of stones, evidently a beacon, as no deposit was found beneath it, is still visible on this mountain. Near the source of the Romney is a ford termed Rhŷd y Milwyr, or "the soldiers' ford," of the origin of which there is no tradition. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment: the average annual expenditure amounts to £143. 1.

DYFRYN, a hamlet in the parish of LLANTHETTY, hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. E.) from Brecknock, containing 248 inhabitants. The parochial church is situated in this hamlet, which is bounded on the south by the Crawnnon brook, and on the north-east by the river Usk. It is also traversed by the Brecknock canal, to which a tram-road leads, conveying lime from the Llangattock hills, and coal from the banks of the river Romney, in the same parish: this hamlet is extremely well wooded.

DYFRYN, a hamlet in the parish of VAINOR, hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 145 inhabitants. It is situated on the left bank of the Tâf Vawr river: the lower part of the hamlet is well wooded. There are several carneddau scattered on the hills in this neighbourhood. The village of Coedycummer was formerly situated in this hamlet, but it is now a separate hamlet.

DYFRYN-CLYDACH, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON juxta NEATH, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. W.) from Neath, containing 936 inhabitants. This hamlet is intersected by the turnpike road from Neath to Swansea, and is bounded by the little river Clydach, which falls into the Neath about half a mile lower down: it abounds with iron and coal, and there are copper-works on an extensive scale, which afford employment to a considerable proportion of the inhabitants. A rail-road proceeds south from the coal mines in the northern part of the hamlet, until it joins the Neath river, crossing the Briton-Ferry canal, which is conveyed over the lower part of the Clydach stream. Within its limits are the interesting ruins of Neath abbey, of which an account is given in the article on the parish of Cadoxton. On Drymmeu, or Trumau, mountain, which bounds it on the west, there are some intrenchments and a kistvaen, of which no authentic particulars have been recorded. This hamlet separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £286. 14.

DYFRYN-CYDRICH (DYFRYN-CYDRYCH), a hamlet in the parish of LLANGADOCK, lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Llangadock, containing 828 inhabitants. This hamlet is situated between the rivers Towy and Sawdde, and is in general well cultivated and tolerably well wooded: the road from Llangadock to Llandilo-Vawr passes through it. On the top of Trichrŷg, a very long and elevated mountain, are three carneddau, which are very conspicuous at a considerable distance. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor: the average annual expenditure amounts to £346. 14.

DYFRYN-ELLAN (DYFRYN-ELAIN), a township in the parish of CWM-TOYDDWR, hundred of RHAIDR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Rhaiadr, containing 360 inhabitants. This township takes its name from the river Elain, the vale of which abounds with romantic scenery, composed of lofty mountains and rugged and precipitous rocks, which are finely contrasted with the verdant meadows and cultivated enclosures on the banks of the river. Cwm Ellan, a neat modern structure, situated on a bend of the river, became the residence of Thomas Grove, Esq., on his purchasing about ten thousand acres of land in this vicinity, with the lordship of the Grange, which by judicious improvement has, from a barren waste, been converted into a fertile and flourishing tract, thus softening the wildness of the mountain scenery which characterizes this secluded spot: this beautiful and romantic seat is now the property of Robert Peel, Esq. At Nant Wylt, four miles from the mother church, on the left bank of the river Clarwen, is a chapel of ease, a small neat edifice, built in 1772, and in the gift of the vicar; and at Coed y Mynach, or "the Monk's Wood," on the banks of the Elain, about halfway to the mother church, are the remains of an ancient chapel, called Capel Madoc, which is supposed to have been attached to the abbey of Strata Florida, in Cardiganshire, as the vestiges of an ancient road, which connected the two places, are still visible on the lofty hills in this district. There are lead mines in this township, but they are not worked at present.

DYFRYN-GWY, a township in the parish of CWM-TOYDDWR, partly within the new limits of the borough of RHAIDR, and partly in the hundred of RHAIDR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Rhaiadr, containing 507 inhabitants. The road from Rhaiadr to Aberystwith passes through this township, running, in the upper part of its course, along the left bank of the river Elain, which has its rise here in Llŷn Gwingy, on the border of Cardiganshire; and the river Wye flows on the north-eastern side of it: there are two manufactories for flannel. Within the limits of the township are several cairns, the most remarkable of which is Tommen sant Fraid, said to cover the remains of the patron saint of the parish church, which is situated in this township. On the banks of the Wye, nearly opposite to the site on which Rhaiadr castle stood, are traces of an encampment: though a part of the intrenchments were demolished last year, an artificial mount still remains, probably the site of the keep of an ancient castle, which it is said communicated with the former one by a passage beneath the river Wye.

DYFRYN-HONDDŪ, a chapelry composed of the Upper and Lower divisions, in the parish and hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Brecknock, containing 386 inhabitants, of which number, 205 are in the Upper, and 181 in the Lower, division. The name of this place describes its situation in the Vale of HonddŪ, which abounds with pleasingly picturesque and highly romantic scenery. The surface is finely undulated: some of the hills are richly clothed with wood, and others afford good pasturage for the sheep which feed on their declivities; the lower grounds are partly arable and partly meadow land; and the views from the higher grounds combine many objects of interest and features of beauty. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Merthyr-Cynog. The chapel, which was anciently a chapel of ease to Merthyr-Cynog, is situated in a winding and romantic part of the valley, near the source of the rapid river Honddŷ, and on the mountain road from Brecknock to Builth, about two miles eastward from the mother church, and is sometimes called Capel Uchâ, or "the upper chapel," to distinguish it from the chapel of Llanvihangel-Vechan, in the parish of Llandeavillog-Vâch, lower down in the vale. On the right bank of the Honddŷ, a little above the chapel, stands Mynachtŷ, once a residence for the monks from Malvern priory, who were employed to superintend the temporal concerns and collect the dues of that religious house, in this parish: it is now a mean dwelling, with a small farm attached, apparently retaining not the least vestige of the original building. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the Upper division is £96, and that for the Lower division £114. 11.

DYLAS (DULAS) HIGHER, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON juxta NEATH, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Neath, containing 299 inhabitants. This hamlet derives its name from the small stream Dylas, which falls into the Neath in the lower hamlet of the same name: it contains a chapel of ease, called Crynant chapel, which is dedicated to St. Margaret. Fairs are held annually on Whit-Monday, September 29th, and November 20th. The Roman Via Helena, otherwise Sarn Helen, passed over the mountains in this hamlet: it diverged from the Julia Strata Maritima at Neath, and connected that station with the military post Bannium, or Caer Bannau, three miles from the town of Brecknock. This hamlet separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £130. 19.

DYLAS (DULAS) LOWER, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON juxta NEATH, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Neath, containing 197 inhabitants. It is situated at the junction of the river Dylas with the Neath, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Neath into Brecknockshire through the Vale of Neath. At the distance of about one hundred yards from the road there is a very picturesque fall of the Dylas, over a ledge of rock which forms its bed for a considerable distance: a huge mass of rock, as if separated by some violent convulsion, occupies the middle of the channel, and, together with the two projections of the ledge, gives an additional effect to the scene. The scenery of the neighbourhood is particularly interesting, and in proceeding up the vale its beauty improves at every opening. The Neath canal here receives the Swansea and Neath junction canal, which is conveyed over the river by means of a handsome aqueduct. The Aber-Dylas railway, extending from the limestone quarries at Cwm Dylas, communicates with the western branch of this canal. This hamlet separately maintains its own poor: the average annual expenditure is £141. 3.

DYNHYNLLA-ISÂ (DIN-HENLLE), a township in the parish of RUABON, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (S. E.) from Ruabon, containing 489 inhabitants. Wynnstay, the noble residence of Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., occupies the principal portion of this township, and is described in the article on the parish.

DYNHYNLLA-UCHÂ (DIN-HENLLE), a township in the parish of RUABON, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. W.) from Ruabon. The population is returned with the township of Christyonydd. Wynnstay Park forms a portion of this township; and Offa's Dyke passes through it, in a line nearly parallel with the road from Ruabon to Chirk. There are some other respectable residences observable in different parts of the township.

DYSERTH (DISERTH), a parish, partly within the limits of the borough of RHUDDLAN, partly in the hundred of RHUDDLAN, and partly in that of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. N. E.) from Rhuddlan, containing 714 inhabitants. This place was anciently distinguished for its castle, of which mention occurs in various records, under the several appellations of Din Colyn, Castell y Failon, and Castell Gerri. Of its original foundation nothing certain is known: it was probably of Welsh origin, and is supposed to have formed the last of a chain of British posts on the Clwydian hills. This castle was fortified by Henry III., about the year 1241; but, within less than twenty years after, it was razed to the ground, together with the castle of Deganwy, by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd. During the siege of this place, Einon, son of Ririd Vlaidd, was slain, and a cross was erected to his memory on the spot, the shaft of which, ornamented with rude sculpture, was subsequently made to form part of a stile into the churchyard. The parish is bounded on the north-west by the Irish sea; and the turnpike road from Holywell, through Newmarket, to Rhuddlan, passes through the village. In a part of the parish, included in the Bishop of St. Asaph's manor of Rhuddlan, is an extensive lead mine, which is worked by the Talar Gôch Company, and of the produce of which the Bishop of St. Asaph receives the usual proportion, as lord of the manor. A part of the mine also extends into the parish of Meliden, and the produce, in the procuring of which two hundred persons on an average are employed, is shipped off from Rhuddlan to Flint, where it is principally smelted. This parish is the head of an archdeaconry, now annexed to the bishoprick of St. Asaph; and in the village was once an ancient mansion, in which the archdeacons formerly, and some of the bishops subsequently, resided, of which latter Bishop Parry died here in 1623. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Bishop, as archdeacon, who, as such, is also impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is a small neat edifice, without either tower or spire, but embellished with a fine window of painted glass, removed from Basingwerk abbey, near Holywell, at the time of the dissolution: within the church are some ancient grave-stones of Knights Templar; and in the churchyard, which is ornamented with several fine yew trees, are two singular tombstones, with a bow sculptured upon each, and an ancient pillar, or weeping stone, from which the primitive chiefs and princes are said to have dispensed their judgments. The ancient mansion in which the archdeacons resided was rebuilt in 1799, for the parsonage-house, and has been since enlarged by the present incumbent, who has also repaired the church. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A day school is supported chiefly by the curate; and there is a Sunday school for adults, as well as children. The charitable bequests are few and small: the principal is an annual sum of £1. 10., arising from the Bôdryddan estate in the neighbourhood, which is distributed among the poor. The small remains of the ancient castle, consisting only of a few fragments, occupy the summit of a limestone rock about half a mile from the village: from this spot is an extensive view of the Irish sea and part of the Vale of Clwyd. Near the church was formerly a beautiful cascade, formed by a stream from Fynnon Asaph, in the parish of Cwm; but it is now almost destroyed by the diversion of the stream to the mines. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £272. 10.

E.

EDERN (EDEYRN), a parish in the hundred of DINLLAEN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W.N.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 563 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of Carnarvon bay, and has an excellent harbour, called Porthinllaen, whence two vessels sail regularly for Liverpool with pigs, poultry, and eggs, bringing back coal for the supply of the neighbourhood. A new line of road from Merionethshire was made to this port by the late Mr. Madocks, with the view of its becoming the station for the Irish mail packets; but, since Holyhead has obtained the preference, the road and the port have been neglected. That gentleman also greatly improved the pier at Porthinllaen, the construction of which was commenced in the reign of George I., who gave £600 towards defraying the expense. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Pistill and Carngiwch annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £8. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Edeyrn, is a small edifice, displaying some features in the early style of English architecture, and is lighted by one window only, at the east end, consisting of three lancet-shaped lights. At Groesfordd, a short distance from Edern, is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. There are some trifling charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £131. 15.

EDNOL (EDNAWL), a chapelry in the parish of OLD RADNOR, within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N.E. by N.) from New Radnor, containing 45 inhabitants. This chapelry is situated on the eastern side of the tract called the Forest of Radnor, but divine service is not often performed in the chapel, owing to its proximity to the church of New Radnor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £10. 11.

EDREN'S, ST. (ST. EDEYRN'S), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 113 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very small extent, is for the most part enclosed and cultivated. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Upper Chapter in the Cathedral Church of St. David's. The grass in the churchyard is asserted by many residents in the vicinity to be a specific for preserving both men and cattle from the effects of the bite of a mad dog: by the former it is eaten with bread and butter, and the latter are turned in to graze upon it; and in those which in that condition have eaten it no symptoms of madness have afterwards appeared, while, on the contrary, such as would not have uniformly died in a short time: the grass is the perquisite of the parish clerk, and in the wall of the chancel is a cavity, into which is put whatever persons choose to pay for eating it. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £24.

EDWINSFORD, a joint hamlet with Glyn, in the parish of LLANSAWEL, lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8½ miles (N.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the parish. This hamlet is situated in an agreeable and well-wooded vale, on the right bank of the river Cothy, and on the road from Llandilo-Vawr to Lampeter. The seat of Sir James Hamlyn Williams, Bart., forms a fine object fronting the road, with an ample demesne to the left, on the other side of the river, which flows here at the northern foot of a very elevated hill, called Moelvre. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, including those of the hamlet of Glyn, amounts to £162. 11.

EGERMONT, otherwise EGREMONT, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Narberth, containing 139 inhabitants. This parish, which borders on the county of Pembroke, and is pleasantly situated on the eastern branch of the river Cleddau, is about two miles and a half in length, and, in the widest part, about two miles in breadth: the surrounding scenery, though pleasingly varied, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature. Stone of very good quality for building is found here, and some quarries are now being worked. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Rowley Eddingbrooke Mansel, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not distinguished by any peculiar architectural feature. There are some vestiges of an ancient encampment in the parish, but nothing has been recorded concerning its history. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £27. 17.

EGLWYSAEL, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES.
—See LLANGADWALADR.

EGLWYS-BÂCH (EGLWYS-VÂCH), a parish chiefly in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, but comprising also the township of Maenan, which separately supports its own poor, in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.) from Llanrwst, on the road to Aberconway, and containing 1108 inhabitants. Its length from north to south is seven miles, and its breadth, in a transverse direction, four: the surface is very hilly, which circumstance causes a great variety of soil, some being extremely barren, and some, on the contrary, tolerably fertile, yielding good crops of corn. The village is situated in a pleasing and fertile vale watered by the river Conway, and the vicinity abounds with agreeable and richly varied scenery. Near the north-western extremity of the parish is Bodnod, the head of a township of that name, and the residence of William Hanmer, Esq., to whom it passed by marriage with the heiress of the family of Lloyd, who appear to have held this property in the reign of James I. The old mansion was taken down by the late John Forbes, Esq., and a new one erected on its site, in 1792, which was considerably enlarged and improved by the present proprietor, in 1829: it is a handsome edifice, pleasantly situated, and commanding extensive and richly diversified views over the Vale of Conway to the Snowdonian mountains. Here are also two other mansions, viz., Pennant Ereithlyn, belonging to the family of Edwards, and Maenan, to that of Lenthal. Though the Conway is navigable the entire length of the parish, Eglwys-Bâch possesses neither manufactures nor trade. At Tal y Cavn, within its limits, is a ferry across that river, communicating with the Carnarvonshire coast; and near this point the navigation of the river is in some degree obstructed by the Arw, or Arrow rocks, which prevent vessels from approaching nearer to the village. Fairs are held on February 24th, May 11th, August 24th, and November 24th. A court leet and a court baron are held annually, in April, for the manor of Maenan, which extends over the whole of that portion of the parish which is within the county of Carnarvon, and claims all the privileges anciently enjoyed by the abbots of the monastery which formerly existed there. The rectorial tithes were appropriated by Sir John Wynne, Bart., to the endowment of a hospital and grammar school at Llanrwst, founded by him about the year 1610. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, was entirely rebuilt in 1782: it is a neat and spacious edifice, with a low square tower. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, one in the township of Cevn y Coed, and the other in that of Bodnod; and there is one for Wesleyan Methodists, situated in the village. In 1821, a school for the gratuitous instruction of children, supported by Mrs. Bevan's charity, was held in the church; and the inhabitants of Eglwys-Bâch are supposed to have an interest in the endowed school of Sir John Wynne, of Gwydir, at Llanrwst. In that portion of the parish which is in the county of Carnarvon anciently stood Maenan abbey, said by some historians to have been founded in the reign of Richard I.: but no authentic notice of it is found prior to the year 1283, when Edward I., by the authority of Pope Nicholas, removed to it the Cistercian monks of Aberconway, when he fortified that town against the Welsh: on establishing them at Maenan, the English monarch confirmed all the privileges which they had enjoyed in their former habitation, and added materially to their possessions. The abbey continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was £179. 10. 10. Queen Elizabeth, in 1563, granted it and the township in which it stood to Elizeus Wynne, who took down the greater part of the abbey buildings, and with the materials built a mansion not far from the spot: of the ancient structure only one small arch at present remains. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £809. 3., of which sum, £578. 16. is raised for that portion which is situated in the county of Denbigh.

EGLWYS-BREWIS, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Cowbridge, containing 19 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 6½., and in the patronage of L. W. Dillwyn, Esq., who is proprietor of the greater part of this small parish. The church is a very small edifice, dedicated to St. Brise, and presents no architectural feature worthy of especial notice. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £15. 4.

EGLWYS-CUMMIN (EGLWYS-CYMMYN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Laugharne, on the road to Narberth, containing 373 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable antiquity, derives some degree of celebrity, from an allusion made to it by Sir John Pryce, in his history of the Welsh wars, as the place in which a peace was once concluded; and a memorial of this event is preserved in the name of "Peace Park," given to the spot on which the negotiations were transacted. The parish is of great extent, and a considerable portion of it is at present uncultivated: it is intersected by two streams, which, after pursuing a subterraneous course for a considerable distance, discharge their waters into the bay of Carmarthen. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, contains a monument to the memory of Sir John Perrot, who was the first sheriff of the county of Pembroke; and on the chalice of the communion plate is inscribed, in old letters, Poculum Ecclesiæ de Eglos Skymine, with the date 1574: the word Skymine, signifying "bleak," is supposed to allude to the situation of the church on a lofty unsheltered eminence. Zacharias Thomas, in 1682, bequeathed to the poor not receiving parochial relief a rent-charge of £1. 6. 8. There are some vestiges of an ancient military earthwork in a field, which, from that circumstance, has obtained the appellation of "Castell Park." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £105. 11.

EGLWYSILAN (EGLWYS-ILAN), a parish in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil, comprising the market town of Caerphilly, and containing 2818 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the east by the river Romney, and on the west by the Tâf, and is computed to comprise about fifteen thousand acres: it formerly contained several ancient family mansions, of which, Energlyn, or Genau 'r Glyn, the property of Thomas Goodrich, Esq., alone remains, and even this is now uninhabited. That called the Vann, which was for ages the seat of the family of Lewis, ancestors of the Earl of Plymouth, to whom it now belongs, still forms an interesting object in descending the hill towards the town of Caerphilly. The surface of the parish is partly hilly and partly flat: the prevailing soils are gravelly clay and peat. The parish is rich in mineral wealth, especially coal, which is worked to great advantage: iron-ore is raised at its south-western extremity, under Castell Côch, where are also some excellent stone quarries. At Newbridge, the largest village within its limits, are situated the original works of Messrs. Brown and Co., for the manufacture of chain cables, the iron work of suspension bridges, &c.: the suspension bridge over the Thames at Hammersmith, one over the Tweed, another over the Usk, and the chain pier at Brighton, were made at these works, which afford employment to about one hundred persons, and manufacture annually from ten to twelve hundred tons of iron. The Glamorganshire canal traverses the whole extent of the parish, and opens a cheap and expeditious communication between the mines and Cardiff, where the produce of the works is shipped. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvabon annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the Archdeacon and Chapter of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Helen, is situated on the brow of a lofty hill, at a considerable distance from any habitation but the vicar's and the clerk's, and is almost inaccessible, during some weeks in the winter, to the majority of the parishioners. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Aldworth, of Bristol, by will dated in 1729, left certain lands in the parishes of Eglwysilan and Llandaf, in this county, and Bedwas, in the county of Monmouth, to endow a school for the education of poor girls, natives of the parishes of Eglwysilan and Bedwas: the property produces about £140 per annum, the greater part of which is appropriated to the support of three schools, viz., one at Newbridge, to which a salary of £27 per annum is attached; another at Caerphilly, with a salary of £35 per annum; and the third at Bedwas, with a salary of £25. 10. Within the parish are situated two picturesque and interesting ruins, viz., Caerphilly Castle, described in the account of that place, and Castell Côch, or "the Red Castle," at the south-western extremity of the parish. The latter is so called from the colour of the stone used in its erection, which is ascribed to Ivor Bâch, who, having succeeded in compelling Robert Earl of Gloucester, and lord of Glamorgan, to restore the ancient laws of the Welsh to his native vassals in this part of the principality, placed in it a garrison of two hundred men, to command the pass of two valleys, which here converge. The situation of these ruins is very striking, and commands a magnificent prospect of the rich Vale of Glamorgan, with the sea, and the distant hills on the English coast. They consist principally of two circular bastions of unequal sizes: in front is a steep precipice, and behind, a wide and deep fosse, excavated in the solid rock, which rises to a considerable height above it. About a mile higher up the river, on its eastern bank, is a celebrated spring, called Fynnon Tâf, or "the well of Tâf," the water of which is justly held in high estimation for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatic disorders: it is sometimes called Fynnon Dwym, or "the tepid well," and is the only thermal spring in South Wales: an extraordinary flood, in the year 1799, is said to have laid bare some Roman masonry adjoining this well, which was covered again by subsequent inundations of the Tâf. There are some other springs, the waters of which are considered serviceable in the cure of pulmonary diseases. William Edwards, the self-taught architect of Pont y Prydd, who rose gradually by his own talents to be the most celebrated bridge-builder in this part of the kingdom, to which he added also the profession of a Dissenting minister, and the business of a farmer, was born in this parish, in 1719, and was the youngest son of a farmer: his remains were interred in the churchyard: three of his sons practised the same branch of architecture as their father, and greatly distinguished themselves in it. The average annual expenditure of the whole of the parish, including the town of Caerphilly, for the support of the poor, amounts to £664. 12.

EGLWYS-NEWYDD, or LLANVIHANGEL Y CREIDDYN-UCHÂV, a chapelry in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL Y CREIDDYN, hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 1027 inhabitants. This place derives the latter of these names from its relative situation in the parish, and the former from the erection of a church, in 1803, by the late Thomas Johnes, Esq., on the site of a former edifice originally built here in 1620, by the Herberts of Havôd, for the convenience of the family, and the accommodation of the miners employed in the adjoining district of Cwm Ystwith. Havôd, the seat of the late Mr. Johnes, was originally the residence of a branch of the Herbert family, who, embarking in the mining adventures of the neighbourhood, built a house here, which, from the nature of the ground and the badness of the roads, being inaccessible except during the summer, obtained the appellation of "Havôd," signifying a summer residence. From the Herberts the estate passed, by marriage with the daughter and heiress of the last male representative of that family, to Thomas Johnes, Esq., ancestor of the late Mr. Johnes, who in 1783 made it his principal residence, and, perceiving the vast improvement of which the spot was susceptible, projected and executed those extensive and magnificent embellishments, which have rendered it one of the most attractive and admired seats in the principality. Mr. Johnes commenced his improvements by taking down the old house, and erecting on its site an elegant mansion of light and beautiful character, in the later style of English architecture, comprising, upon a moderate scale, a suite of apartments adapted in every respect to the elegant accommodation of his family, with a magnificent library, in which was deposited a rare and valuable collection of books and manuscripts, which with great labour and expense he had formed in every department of literature: adjoining the library he built a conservatory, one hundred and sixty feet in length, stored with every species of exotic plants, and communicating with the library by folding-doors panelled with plate glass. The whole of the interior of this mansion was destroyed in 1807, during the absence of Mr. Johnes, by an accidental fire which broke out early in the morning; and, with the exception of a very small portion of the books, rescued from the flames by the intrepidity of Mrs. Johnes, the whole of the library, consisting of many thousand volumes, several of the paintings, and nearly all the splendid furniture of the house, were consumed. The conservatory only was saved, and the walls of the house were alone left standing: the mansion was soon rebuilt, nearly in the same style, and, with some slight alterations, the internal arrangements are the same: another library has been formed, comprehending the Pesaro collection, purchased by Mr. Johnes in Italy, and which was on its way to Havôd at the time of the fire; many valuable works in the French, Spanish, and Italian languages; some scarce editions of the classics; and almost all the productions of the Aldine press. The principal of the pictures saved from the fire, and some other works of art, are arranged in the apartments of the present mansion. In the octagonal library are the busts of Mrs. and Miss Johnes, by Banks, a bust of Mr. Johnes by Chantrey, and a bust of the late Duke of Bedford by Nollkens. Over the mantel-piece is an old picture of the prophet Elijah fed by the ravens, which anciently belonged to the abbey of Talley, in the county of Carmarthen, and was, on the dissolution of that establishment, given by the superior to an ancestor of Mr. Johnes. In the long library is a beautiful piece of sculpture by Banks, representing Thetis dipping Achilles in the river Styx; and near the entrance from this room into the dining-room is a fine painting, by Reubens, of Decius Mus receiving the benediction of the Pontifex Maximus, on his devoting himself for the safety of his country. Among numerous pictures by eminent masters are, a portrait of Mr. Johnes of Llanvair, by Sir Godfrey Kneller; of Robert Liston, Esq., by Wickstead; of Richard Gorges, Esq., of Eye, in the county of Hereford; and of Viganoni; a fine copy of Guido's Cupid Sleeping, landscapes by Both and Berghem, a fine painting of the ruined Alchymist by Salvator Rosa, and other subjects by different masters. In the drawing-room are, Hogarth's celebrated picture of Southwark Fair, a Descent from the Cross by Vandyke, an "Ecce Homo" by Moralez, two landscapes by Claude, a procession of the Doge of Venice by Canaletti; an Assumption by Bernardo Lonino, pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, which was originally an altarpiece at Lugano; a Holy Family by Reubens, a portrait of Lord Chancellor Thurlow by Gardener, and some beautiful miniatures by the late Miss Johnes. The hall is paved with Mona marble, and is embellished with a Grecian statue of Bacchus; and with six paintings of subjects from Froissart, in imitation of basso relievo, by Stothard. The grounds, which are very extensive, and are laid out with exquisite taste and judgment, comprehend a rich and diversified assemblage of every thing that is beautiful in picturesque, and impressive in romantic, scenery. The natural advantages of the spot have been improved by every variety of embellishment, and numerous walks have been formed through the grounds, in such directions as to bring successively into view the various beautiful features with which the scenery abounds, and the many objects of natural grandeur with which they are powerfully contrasted. The river, in its course through the grounds, frequently obstructed by lofty masses of rock impending over its stream, forms a succession of beautiful cataracts, which are seen from several points of view with peculiar effect: the beautiful church of Eglwys-Newydd forms an interesting feature in the landscape; and on the brow of a hill is an obelisk, erected to the memory of the late Duke of Bedford, with an inscription commemorative of the services which that nobleman rendered to the agriculture of the country. Independently of the mansion and grounds of Havôd, Mr. Johnes bestowed extraordinary attention and unlimited expense in improving the agriculture of the surrounding district, which from a barren desert he changed into a highly cultivated and richly wooded tract: the face of the country has been materially altered by extensive and thriving plantations; and the lands have been brought into good cultivation and are to the utmost as productive as the nature of the soil will allow. Crops of wheat, barley, rye, and potatoes, have been raised with great success on lands which were previously thought to be incapable of producing them; and even some of the high and most exposed portions of land have been progressively advancing into a state of fertility. Numerous cottages of pleasing and comfortable appearance have been built for the labourers employed in cultivating the farms; and a very considerable number of the inhabitants of the hamlet of Llanvihangel y Creiddyn Uchâv, and its vicinity, have found employment upon Mr. Johnes' estate. According to Mr. Malkin, four hundred thousand larch trees, of which very few failed, fifty thousand alders, and two hundred thousand other trees, chiefly elm, beech, birch, and the common and the mountain ash, were planted by Mr. Johnes in the year ending June 1797; from October 1797 to October 1798, ten thousand oak trees of one and two feet in height; and from October 1798 to April 1799, fifty-five acres were set with acorns, and, during the same period, twenty-five thousand ash trees, of which number not more than five hundred died, and four hundred thousand larch trees, which all thrive, were planted on the Havôd estate. The whole number of trees planted from 1796 to 1801 was two millions and sixty-five thousand, and since that period the plantations have been increased by the addition of nearly two hundred thousand trees every year for many years.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Johnes, Esq. The stipend of the incumbent is derived partly from the tithes, and partly from a rate upon the lands, estimated according to an old survey. The chapel, erected at the sole expense of Mr. Johnes, from a design by Mr. Wyatt, and situated within the precincts of the Havôd grounds, is an elegant cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a square tower at the west end. In the centre of the cross is a richly ornamented font of artificial stone, supported on an octagonal shaft; one side of the basin bears a shield charged with the arms of the family of Johnes, and the faces of the shaft are embellished with figures representing the cardinal virtues. A fine painting, by Fuseli, of Christ and the two disciples of Emmaus ornaments the northern transept, and the window of the southern is wholly of ancient stained glass, which formerly ornamented one of the Dutch churches, from which it was removed during the French Revolution, at the close of the last century. Several of the Herberts of Havôd are buried in the chapel, to whom monumental tablets have been erected; and a splendid monument, by Chan-treys, has been erected to the memory of the late Miss Johnes, on which are finely sculptured figures of herself and her weeping parents. Schools for the gratuitous instruction of poor children are supported by the family at Havôd.

EGLWYS - RHÔS, LLAN-RHÔS, or LLANVAIR YN RHÔS, a parish in the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Aberconway, containing 568 inhabitants. This parish is celebrated as having been at a very early period the residence of the sovereigns of North Wales: it contained the ancient royal palace of Deganwy, commonly called Gannock by the English invaders of North Wales, situated about a mile to the west of the church, on a hill commanding the river Conway, and which, for ages prior to the entire subjugation of the principality, formed the military station most earnestly contended for by the native Welsh and their Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman invaders. Deganwy is mistakenly supposed by Camden to have been the Roman station called in the Itineraries Dictum: it appears, however, from the testimony of the Welsh historians, that a city certainly existed here at a very remote period; and by some it is stated that the castle of Deganwy was erected in 550, by Caswallon Law-hîr, the first sovereign of North Wales, who made this the seat of government, previous to the removal of his court to Aberfraw, in Anglesey. He nevertheless left his son and successor Maelgwyn, surnamed Gwynedd, resident in this castle, from which that prince subsequently removed to a place called Penrhyn, in this parish, where he had built a palace, called "Llys Maelgwyn Gwynedd," in which he resided until the period when the pestilence called Vad Velen, or "the yellow fever," nearly depopulated this part of the country; on which occasion he sought refuge from the plague in the parish church of Eglwys-Rhôs, but, notwithstanding, fell a victim to it, as had been predicted, and was there interred. The successors of this prince usually resided either at Deganwy, or at Caer Segont, adjacent to the modern Carnarvon: the former city is said to have been destroyed by lightning, in the year 810, when it ceased to be a royal residence. The Welsh appear subsequently, however, to have erected here a fortress, which aided in defending the great rampart of the Snowdonian mountains against the repeated attempts made to pass it by the Anglo-Saxons. In the latter part of the eleventh century, when Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, overran nearly the whole of North Wales, this castle was rebuilt by that nobleman's zealous officer, Robert of Rhuddlan, who, in 1088, encamped a considerable army near its walls. In the same year, Gruffydd ab Cynan is said to have entered the Conway with three ships, and, landing under the castle at high water, left his vessels on shore at the recess of the tide, and proceeded to ravage the neighbouring country. Returning from his predatory incursion, and driving before him a large booty of men and cattle towards his ships, Robert, who witnessed the spectacle with indignation, descended from his fortress, attended only by a single soldier, and without any defensive armour but his shield. The Welsh attacked him with missiles, and, having filled his shield so full of darts that it fell under their weight, rushed upon him in a body, and, striking off his head, fastened it to the mast of one of their ships, and sailed away in triumph. Llewelyn the Great afterwards destroyed this castle, which was rebuilt by Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester, in 1210. In the following year, the English monarch, John, led his army to the castle of Deganwy, where he posted it for some time; but Llewelyn so infested the roads with his light parties, that John and his forces were reduced to the greatest extremities of distress. Their supplies of provisions from England being intercepted, they were compelled to feed upon the flesh of their horses; and the soldiers, whenever they stirred from the camp, were liable to be cut in pieces; the Welsh, from their knowledge of the country, and the use which they made of it, having usually the advantage in every skirmish. After thus sustaining severe losses, the English king, stung with disgrace, and breathing vengeance against the valiant natives, was compelled to break up his camp and retreat into England. In 1212, an unsuccessful attack was made on this fortress by the Welsh prince, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, to whom it was surrendered two years afterwards, and appears to have been dismantled. Henry III., in his invasion of North Wales, in 1245, halted with his army on the eastern bank of the estuary of the Conway, not daring to pass that river, and enter into the mountainous recesses of the country, while the enemy vigilantly hovered around him in detached parties. Finding on the point of a promontory of this parish, which projects into the Conway, the ruins of the castle of Deganwy, and determined that his expedition should not be entirely fruitless, he began to rebuild this fortress, that its garrison might be able to intercept the enemy's incursions into that part of the principality of which the English had already secured possession. During the ten weeks which Henry employed in erecting this castle, his army, which was encamped in the open field, was exposed to many dangers and difficulties. The weather becoming exceedingly cold towards the close of the summer, the soldiers suffered much by being thinly clad, and by having no other covering than tents made of linen; while at the same time they were occasionally reduced to great distress by a scarcity of provisions, receiving only a precarious supply from Chester and Ireland. They were also much harassed, and their numbers reduced, by the incessant attempts made by the Welsh to cut off their straggling parties, and storm their camp in the night: from one of these conflicts, however, the English, having had the advantage, brought in triumph to their camp the heads of nearly one hundred Welshmen. Henry having, in spite of all the efforts of the Welsh, at length completed this important fortress, placed in it a numerous garrison, with abundant supplies of military stores, and returned into England, at the end of October, with the wasted remnant of his army. In 1257, the castle of Deganwy was vigorously besieged by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, who, however, was soon compelled by the approach of the English army, led by Henry III. in person, to abandon his enterprise. Henry advanced to this place, where, by the aid of a fleet belonging to the Cinque-Ports, he was enabled to maintain his army until Michaelmas, when he once more retired into his own dominions. The advantages afforded to the English invaders of North Wales by the castle of Deganwy were of incalculable importance: situated on the coast, it was open to receive continual supplies; commanding one of the principal passes into the country of Snowdon, across the æstuary of the Conway, its numerous garrison was enabled to cut off the excursive parties of the Welsh; and being likewise a place of great strength, both in situation and structure, it afforded to the English a secure retreat upon any disaster. But the strength of the fortress did not suffice to prevent its being taken and finally destroyed, in the year 1260, by the Welsh prince Llewelyn; and it appears to have been never subsequently rebuilt.

The village of Eglwys-Rhôs is situated in a small valley, surrounded on all sides by hills, on the summits and acclivities of which are extensive woods of full-grown oak, and in the vicinity of the river Conway, which forms the western boundary of the parish. Near it is Bôdscallen, a seat of the Mostyn family, an ancient mansion embosomed in rich woods, and commanding, from an elevated terrace, a beautiful view, over the tops of the trees which grow beneath it, of the town of Aberconway, of part of the river Conway, and of the vast mountains which form the back ground of this interesting picture. Gloddaeth, another seat belonging to the same family, is beautifully situated on the acclivity of an extensive hill, richly decorated with plantations of trees of every description and variety; the upper grounds command some of the most extensive and interesting views in the principality, which present themselves in varied forms and in new combinations at almost every step: among the interesting features composing them may be noticed the windings of the river Conway, towards Llanrwst, and the lofty towers of the castle and the ancient walls of the town of Aberconway, beyond which are the lofty mountains of Moel Siabod, the Drûm, Carnedd Llewelyn, and Carnedd Dayydd. At a greater elevation in the grounds is seen the influx of the river into the sea, the view being bounded on the left by the smaller Penmaen mountain, and on the right by Great Orme's Head, or Llandudno rocks, between which may be discerned the fine bay of Beaumaris, the vast promontory of Penmaen Mawr, the Isle of Anglesey, and the insulated rock of Priestholme. A great part of the mansion of Gloddaeth was built in the reign of Elizabeth, with whose arms and those of the Earl of Leicester the great hall is decorated. A handsome modern structure has recently been erected, by Lord Kirkwall, under the hill on which the ruins of Deganwy castle are situated: from the summit of this hill a fine view is obtained of the castle, town, and bridge of Aberconway. The ruins of Marle, the seat of Owen Williams, Esq., which was accidentally destroyed by fire, in 1750, are seen through the venerable oaks by which this mansion was surrounded. In the neighbouring parish of Llandudno are several copper mines, in which a considerable portion of the inhabitants of this parish obtain employment; and even within the limits of the latter some spirited attempts have been made, and are still in progress, for the discovery of lead-ore, which is supposed to be abundant here; but a sufficient quantity has not yet been found to remunerate the adventurers. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Hilary, is a small, but ancient and venerable, cruciform structure, having an east window of good proportion filled with modern stained glass, which was put up in 1820, at the expense of Mrs. F. Mostyn: the window of the south transept is ornamented with some ancient stained glass of great brilliancy. This church has for many years been the place of sepulture for the Mostyn family, of which the last male heir, Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart., was buried here, in May 1831. Midway between the village and the town of Aberconway there is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, for the instruction of the children of this and the adjoining parishes, was founded and endowed with £1000 by Mrs. Frances Mostyn, in 1822; and a spacious and handsome building, including school-rooms and a house for the master, has been erected for it, principally at the expense of that lady: in this school, which is conducted on the National system, one hundred and four children are gratuitously instructed. Mr. Lewis Owen, in 1623, bequeathed the rectorial tithes of the parish of Aberconway, in trust, to be divided between the vicar of that parish and the poor of the parishes of Aberconway, Eglwys-Rhôs, Llangwstenyn, and Llandudno; the portion of that grant which is assigned to this parish amounts to £16 per annum, and is distributed in clothing to the poor on the festival of St. Thomas. Since the destruction of the castle of Deganwy by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, in the year 1260, this fortress has formed only a heap of ruins, among which are still traceable a few of the outworks; and at a short distance are some small remains of a circular tower, or half-moon battery, apparently of a later date than the ruins of Deganwy. The latter occupy the summits of two low hills near the river Conway: the walls, of which only a few fragments now remain, appear to have crossed the space between them, and to have been continued up their acclivities. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £443. 8.

EGLWYSVÂCH, or LLANVIHANGEL-CAPEL-EDWIN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See SCYBOR Y COED.

EGLWYS VAIR Y CHYRIG (EGLWYS VAIR A CHURIG), a chapelry in the parish of HÊNLLAN-AMGOED, lower division of the hundred of DERLLÛS, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N. W. by N.) from St. Clear's, containing 257 inhabitants. It is situated in the upper part of the vale of the river Tâf, and on the border of Pembrokeshire, which bounds it to the north. The greater part is enclosed and well cultivated, and there are a few respectable residences. The chapel, dedicated to St. David, is a chapel of ease to the rectory of Hênllan-Amgoed. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £89. 9.

EGLWYS-WEN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES.—See WHITECHURCH.

EGLWYSWRW (EGLWYS-EIRW), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Cardigan, on the road to Haverfordwest, containing 563 inhabitants. This parish anciently formed an inferior lordship, dependent on the superior one of Kemmes: it is intersected by the river Nevern, and is included in a very mountainous district, of which the most remarkable summit is that called Percelly, forming the centre of a long range extending across the county in a direction from east to west. The summit of this mountain commands a prospect of vast extent over the adjacent country; and over this elevated range passed the ancient Via Flandrica, or "Flemish Way," a Roman road which has obtained this appellation from the erroneous supposition of its having been constructed by the Flemings, who settled in this part of the principality in the reigns of Henry I and II. The parish is almost entirely enclosed and under cultivation, and the soil is in general fertile. The village, which is situated near the base of the Percelley mountains, is one of the most pleasing and extensive in this part of the country, and contains a good inn and several respectable houses. The scenery in the neighbourhood is bold, but finely varied, and the hills are richly clothed with wood. Berllan, the seat of the Rev. J. Griffith, is an elegant mansion, beautifully situated in grounds which are tastefully laid out, and adorned with luxuriant plantations. A fair is held on the Monday before November 22nd. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Eirw; and in the time of Elizabeth there was a chantry chapel in the churchyard, said to have contained the tomb of this saint. Near the church is a large tumulus. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £114. 13.

EIDDA (EIDDE), a township in the parish of YSPYTTY-IVAN, partly in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, and partly in that of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Pentre-Voelas, containing 394 inhabitants. The river Conway, which flows from a lake not far distant, runs through this township, and separates the two counties of Carnarvon and Denbigh. Here is an almshouse for six poor persons, which was built and endowed with the proceeds of £200, given by Capt. Richard Vaughan, in 1700, and with £14 per annum by Catherine Vaughan, but the funds have not for many years been available to the use of the charity. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £198. 12.

EIREAS (EIRIOES), a township forming that part of the parish of LLANDRILLO YN RHÔS which is in the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Aberconway, containing 262 inhabitants. A small stream, bounding this township on the east, separates the county from Denbighshire. The celebrated well, called Fynnon Eilian, in this township, is still visited by hundreds of people annually, for the purpose of venting maledictions against any person who has unfortunately incurred their displeasure. The usual ceremony attending this unchristian practice is, for the person who owns the well, after having read certain passages from the sacred scriptures, to hand some of the water of the spring to the applicant, who drinks a part and throws the remainder over his head, at the same time cursing his victim in whatever words he pleases, which ceremony is repeated three times. The township is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £114. 3.

ELERCH (ELEIRCH), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{4}$  miles (E. N. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 179 inhabitants. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £41. 10.

ELVIS (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. by S.) from St. David's, containing 44 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of St. Bride's bay in St. George's channel, and near the road from Haverfordwest to St. David's, is one of the smallest in the principality, containing only two farms, which do not comprise together more than two hundred acres. An attempt to procure silver was once made here, but the success with which it was attended was not sufficient to encourage the adventurers to establish any permanent works. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £2. 10. 10., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Teilaw, is a small edifice, possessing no architectural features deserving notice: there is no enclosed churchyard, the funerals of deceased inhabitants being generally solemnized in the adjoining parishes of Brawdy and Whitchurch. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £5. 16.

ENERGLYN (GENAU 'R GLYN), a hamlet in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  mile (N. W.) from Caerphilly, containing, with the town of Caerphilly, which is situated within its limits, 882 inhabitants. The mansion of Energlyn, the grounds of which are well wooded, is situated on the southern declivity of a lofty elevation, which commands a fine view of the plain and castle of Caerphilly, on the south-east, and is skirted at its base by a stream, which winds round to its conflux with the Romney at Pont y Pandy, a short distance to the north of Caerphilly, and on the southern bank of which are some iron-works: on the summit of the hill above-mentioned are several tumuli.

ERBISTOCK, a parish partly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and partly in that of MAELOR, county of FLINT, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Ellesmere, containing 398 inhabitants. This parish, which by tradition is said to have been originally an appendage to the ancient monastery of Bangor, is situated on the river Dee, which is navigable about four miles below it, and comprises but a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil in general is fertile: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some places highly picturesque; and the river Dee, which for a considerable distance forms the boundary of the parish, pursues a winding course through the adjoining tract, and adds greatly to the beauty of the scenery. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7. 14.  $9\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Hilary, is a neat modern edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture, beautifully situated on the bank of the river. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children has been established by the rector, who is now erecting for its use an appropriate building, for the reception of about forty boys and forty girls. Some small charitable donations, amounting in the aggregate to £60, have been left by various benefactors, the interest of which sum is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £195. 5.

ERDDIG, a township in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S. W. by S.) from Wrexham, containing 141 inhabitants. It is surrounded on all sides by the parish of Wrexham, except the east, where it joins that of Marchiel, and is intersected by Wat's Dyke, an ancient boundary between England and Wales. On this rampart, which may be distinctly traced, stands Erddig Hall, the seat of Simon Yorke, Esq., whose father, Philip Yorke, Esq., was author of the "Royal Tribes of Wales." This mansion is beautifully situated between two small vales, watered by a winding stream, and fringed with hanging woods, in one of which are the remains of an ancient camp, almost entire, placed at the junction of two mountain torrents, and defended by deep and strong intrenchments. At the point of land impending over these streams is an elevated mount, inaccessible on every side, except that towards the camp; and on the northern side of the latter is an entrance, which appears to have been defended by a strong gate. This work is supposed by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to be of Roman origin, but no Roman antiquities have been found to corroborate that opinion, and the only remains of mural defences consist of a few stones cemented with mortar. In the mansion are many paintings by eminent masters, among which is a full-length portrait of the notorious Judge Jeffreys, in his robes, by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

ERDDRENIOG (YR DDREINIOG), a township in that part of the parish of TREGAYAN which is in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N.) from Llangevni. The population is included in the return for the parish.

ERLAS (ERLYS), a township in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, containing 69 inhabitants, who are exclusively employed in agriculture.

ERYRYS (ERW YRYS), a township in the parish of LLANARMON, hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Ruthin. The population is included in the return for the parish. This township, which takes its name from Yr Hên Gyrys o Iâl, a collector of Welsh proverbs in the eleventh century, forms the northern portion of the parish, and is situated in a narrow valley through which the river Alyn flows: it is bounded on the western side by the lofty Clwydian mountains, which separate it from the Vale of Clwyd, and on the eastern by a range of hills, nearly equal in height, separating it from Flintshire. The latter exhibit several projections of limestone rock, highly impregnated with lead-ore, the mines of which were productive for many years, but are now only partially worked, in consequence of the low price of that metal. In 1828, however, a very powerful steam-engine was erected, for pumping out the water, and great benefit has been anticipated from the success of this project, by affording employment to many of the inhabitants. The road from Caergwre to Ruthin passes through the township, nearly parallel with the river Alyn, which is here crossed by a bridge, and then continues its course towards the latter town between two lofty mountains, called Moe Venlli and Moel y Cyw, each upwards of one thousand seven hundred and fifteen feet above the level of the sea: this gap is called Bwlch Agricola, from an opinion that it was traversed by that Roman general on his route to Mona. On an artificial mound near the foot of the former stood the castle of Iâl, built by Owain Gwynedd, in 1148, of which the only remains consist of the rampart and fosse surrounding it.

ESCLUSHAM ABOVE, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Wrexham, containing 349 inhabitants. This township takes the adjunct to its name from its situation with reference to that great work of the Saxons, called Offa's Dyke, which separates it from the township of Esclusham Below, and which is here in a tolerably perfect state. It comprises a tract of elevated ground in the south-western part of the parish. There are coal mines within its limits, though the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. It is now separately assessed for the maintenance of the poor, according to an arrangement made in March 1830.

ESCLUSHAM BELOW, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. W.) from Wrexham, containing 570 inhabitants. Offa's Dyke forms a prominent object in this township, separating it on the west from that of Esclusham Above, and hence the adjuncts to the respective names. On this celebrated line of British and Saxon demarcation stands Pentre Bychan, the residence of the Meredith family since 1002; on levelling the dyke, for the purpose of rebuilding the house, in 1824, several Saxon coins were found. The rampart then takes a direction to Cadwgan Hall, a large old mansion also situated upon it, which was formerly in the possession of Edward Jones, Esq., who suffered in London, in September 1586, as one of the confederates in the Babington conspiracy against Queen Elizabeth: near this house was discovered, in 1804, buried in a mound, more than a cart-load of armour, which is now deposited in Chirk Castle. Offa's Dyke hence proceeds in a northern course to Plâs Power, formerly an appendage of Chirk Castle, and in the park there is discovered in its most perfect state, with its deep and wide fosse on the Welsh side. It next extends to Adwy y Clawdd, or "the pass on the Dyke," where it is crossed by the road from Ruthin to Wrexham, and thence enters the township of Broughton. A small isolated portion of this township, on which stood part of the town of Wrexham, has recently been included within the limits of that new borough. This place is separately assessed for the support of its poor, according to an arrangement made in March 1830.

ESGAIR-GEILIOG, a township in the parish of MOUGHTREY, upper division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Newtown. The population is returned with the parish. This township forms the upper portion of the parish, being situated among the mountains bordering on Radnorshire. The unenclosed part of those hills, which exhibit many singular chasms, is allotted as sheepwalks to the different contiguous farms, under an enclosure act passed in 1797, for the adjacent parish of Kerry. The road from Newtown to Knighton and Builth passes through the eastern extremity of the township.

ESKEIRETH (ESGEIRIAU), a township in the parish of TRÊVEGLWYS, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N.N.W.) from Llanidloes. The population is returned with the parish. Several of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of flannel.

EVENECHTYD (Y VYNEICHDYD), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Ruthin, containing 242 inhabitants. This place, of which the name is said to be derived from Mynach, "a monk," and tyd, "land," was probably an appendage, or farm, of some religious house, of which no particular mention occurs. The village is beautifully situated in a sequestered vale abounding with pleasing scenery. The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 5½., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small neat edifice, and contains a curious wooden font rudely carved from one solid block of oak, and ornamented with panelling. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The proceeds of some small charitable bequests are annually distributed among the poor of this parish. On the summit of an eminence above the village are the remains of an encampment, called Pen y gaer; and in the churchyard is a very large stone, called Carreg Gamp, or "the stone of the games," formerly used in the rustic sports of the village. Dr. William Lloyd, Bishop of Norwich, was for some years rector of this parish, to the church of which he presented a splendid service of communion plate in 1710. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £89. 10.

EVENJOB, a joint township with Newcastle, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (E. by N.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with Bareland. It is situated at the intersection of two cross roads, one leading from New Radnor to Presteign, and the other from Discoed to Old Radnor. Offa's Dyke crosses the brow of the hill about half a mile distant to the eastward, near which are vestiges of an ancient camp. This place is assessed jointly with Bareland for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £228. 12.

EWENNY (Y WENNI), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the banks of the Wenny, and on the road from Cardiff to Swansea, 2 miles (S.E. by S.) from Bridgend, containing 239 inhabitants. The manufacture of brown earthenware was extensively carried on here at a very remote period, it being alluded to in the writings of the Welsh bards upwards of three centuries ago; and from the shape of the vessels here made, being similar to those of ancient Roman earthenware found in other places, it has been boldly conjectured to have existed ever since the dominion of that people in Britain. Since the commencement of the present century, seven kilns were kept in full operation, supplying a great part of South Wales with this species of pottery. The clay from which it was chiefly manufactured was procured upon the spot, from a bed varying from ten to fourteen feet in thickness, resting on a substratum of reddish sand, and occupying a tract about three-quarters of a mile in length and half a mile in breadth: the works were likewise conveniently situated for fuel, being only four miles distant from the Bryn Cethin colliery. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Richard Turberville Turberville, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a fine old building, in the Norman style of architecture, consisting of a nave, chancel, and one transept, forming part of the remains of the conventual church of a Benedictine priory, founded here, soon after the Conquest, by Thomas de Londres, lord of Ogmere, and made by Maurice de Londres, in 1141, a cell to St. Peter's abbey at Gloucester: its revenue, in the 26th of Henry VIII., was estimated at £78. 0. 8., and it was granted in the 37th of the same reign, as part of the possessions of that abbey, to Sir Edward Carne, an eminent civilian, from whose family it was transferred to the Turbervilles. Divine service is performed in the nave: the chancel has been used as the family burial-place of the proprietors since the Reformation, and contains some interesting monuments, among which are, one to the memory of Maurice de Londres, a splendid altar-tomb to one of the family of Carne, and an elegant mural monument to the last proprietor, Richard Picton Turberville, Esq., by whom the adjacent family seat was modernized. This mansion stands within the fortifications of the monastic edifice, which were all in the English style of architecture, and is a plain substantial structure, containing numerous elegant and excellent apartments, being exceeded in the comforts of its internal arrangements by few houses in the county. Of the ancient conventual buildings three towers with gateways still remain, mantled with ivy in a picturesque manner: under the tower of the south gate there was a deep dungeon, only six feet in diameter, the entrance covered by a strong iron grating, through which prisoners were let down: the whole forms an interesting group, and may be considered one of the most perfect relics of ecclesiastical architecture in the principality. The seal of Isabel, daughter of William Earl of Gloucester, who had for her dower the lordship of Glamorgan, and was married, first to Prince John, a younger son of Henry II., afterwards to the Earl of Essex, and lastly to Hubert de Burgh, was lately found here: together with her own titles, it is inscribed with that of Countess of Moreton, which she derived from her first husband, who was Earl of Moreton. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £136. 2.

EWLOE, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES. — See COED-EULO.

F.

FAGAN'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W.N.W.) from Cardiff, containing 446 inhabitants. This parish takes its name from the saint to whom its church is dedicated, and who, according to all testimony on this subject, arrived in Britain about the year 180, to preach the doctrines of the Christian religion, and founded the church of this place, which may be consequently regarded as one of the earliest Christian establishments in the island. St. Fagan's is celebrated as the scene of a sanguinary battle, which took place during the protectorate of Cromwell, between the recreant leaders of the parliamentary forces in the principality, and Colonel Horton, who was sent by the protector, with a small army, to enforce the order for disbanding them. The former, among whom were Major-Generals Stradling and Laugharne, having embraced the cause of royalty, contrived to keep their forces under arms, and to augment their number by fresh recruits of such as were favourable to the cause of royalty; and having increased their army to eight thousand men, they confidently advanced to meet Colonel Horton, who had stationed his forces at St. Fagan's. The battle was fought on the 8th of May, 1648, and terminated in the defeat of the Welsh troops with great slaughter, and the capture of many of their principal officers. Among the slain, on the part of the Welsh, were sixty-five of this parish alone; and in the ensuing harvest, so great was the scarcity of labourers, that the crops were chiefly cut and gathered by women. This victory was considered by the parliament to be of such importance, that a day of public thanksgiving was appointed on the occasion. The village, which is situated on the river Ely, a stream abounding with trout and other fish, has a very prepossessing appearance; it lies on a substratum of limestone, and is abundantly supplied with excellent water: plenty of coal is found within five miles of the place, and is supplied at a moderate price to the lime-works in the parish. The living is a rectory, with Llanilterne annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £14. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Earl of Plymouth. The church is a very neat edifice, in excellent repair. The Rev. John Cooke, in 1729, gave £50, producing £2. 10. per annum, and secured on the Cardiff turnpike trust, for the instruction of three children of this parish, and two of the chapelry of Llanilterne; and there are some small charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. Here is an ancient castellated mansion, formerly belonging to the family of Lewis, the heiress of which has conveyed it by marriage, together with a large estate in this county, to the Earl of Plymouth: it is still habitable, and is now in the occupation of a tenant under the present proprietor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £327. 13.

FARRINGTON, a lordship in the parish, and partly within the borough and partly in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (S. E.) from Knighton. The population is returned with the township of Cwmgilla. It is situated between the roads which branch off from Knighton to Ludlow and Pres-teign, and comprises a district on the southern bank of the river Teme, lying between the counties of Salop and Hereford. Offa's Dyke passes on the west between it and the township of Cwmgilla.

FERRY-SIDE, a village in the parish of St. ISHMAEL's, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7½ miles (S. by W.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. This small village, from its situation on the south-eastern bank of the river Towy, near its influx into Carmarthen bay, has recently risen into notice and esteem as a watering-place, and, from its proximity to Carmarthen, promises to become in a short time a valuable appendage to that rapidly improving town. The sands are remarkably fine, affording delightful walks along the margin of the sea: the air is pure and salubrious; and the surrounding scenery abounds with objects of picturesque and romantic beauty. These advantages, united with the facilities for sea-bathing which the place affords, and the accommodations which have been provided for visitors who frequent it for that purpose, have already raised it to a degree of importance among the places of similar resort on this part of the coast, which is every day increasing. It contains several genteel private dwellings and respectable lodging-houses for visitors; and the neighbourhood affords a variety of interesting excursions. The view directly from the village embraces the tastefully ornamented lawns of Llanstephan Place, the seat of George Mears, Esq., with the mansion, and the luxuriant plantations above it; on one side the venerable and picturesque ruins of Llanstephan castle, and on the other the village church half embosomed in trees, with the noble stream of the Towy, which is here a mile in breadth, in the foreground. At the suggestion of Dr. Burgess, late Bishop of St. David's, a church has been erected by subscription, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels, in consideration of which assistance, one hundred and ninety-two seats have been reserved for the free accommodation of the poor. This church, which is dedicated to St. Thomas, was opened for divine service in 1828: it is a neat and appropriate structure, in every respect adapted to the accommodation of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Rev. Edward Pieton, by whom it has been endowed with £4 per annum, to which has been added £600 royal bounty. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists.

FESTINIOG, a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 2½ miles (E. N. E.) from Tan y Bwlch, containing 1648 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on an eminence between the rivers Dwyrdd and Cynvael, on the road from the western coast to Ysppyty-Ivan and Bala, and commands a delightful prospect down the Vale of Festiniog towards Maentwrog, Tan y Bwlch, and Traeth Bach. This beautiful vale, which is partly included in this parish, and partly in that of Maentwrog, was first celebrated by Lord Lyttelton, about the year 1756, since which time it has been visited by numerous tourists, who have described its pictorial beauties in terms of merited eulogy. It is encompassed by lofty hills, the slopes of which are, in many places, well clothed with wood, finely varied with projecting rocks and verdant sward, and contrasted with the rich corn-fields and meadows skirting the margin of the Dwyryd, which winds pleasingly through the centre of the vale, at the lower extremity of which it meets the tide, and expands into a broad æstuary, called Traeth Bychan, which opens to the sea in the northern part of Cardigan bay: this river here separates the parishes of Festiniog and Maentwrog, and receives in its course in the vicinity the tributary streams of the Cymmerau, Cynvael, Llychryd, and Felenrhôd. Tan y Bwlch Hall, a handsome mansion, is charmingly situated on the declivity of a mountain, at the north-western extremity of the vale, embosomed in full-grown plantations, the luxuriant foliage of which fringes verdantly the steep rocky side of the mountain above it. The summits of the Moelwyn mountains, which are in this parish, not only command a pleasing home view of the interesting beauties of the vale, but embrace a wide and varied prospect of the surrounding country. There are various small alpine lakes in the vicinity, the principal of which are Llŷn Morwynion, Llŷn Gammell, and Llŷn Mannod, all much frequented by anglers, particularly the first, the trout caught in them possessing the most delicious flavour. Near the village are two interesting cataracts, called the Falls of the Cynvael: the upper is composed of three steep rocky precipices, over which the waters of the Cynvael are impelled into a deep dark basin, overshadowed by flanking rocks. About three hundred yards below this the river is crossed by a rustic stone bridge, and at an equal distance lower occurs the other cataract, consisting of a broad sheet of water sweeping over a slightly shelving rock, about forty feet high, from the bottom of which it rushes with murmuring impetuosity through a narrow chasm, glistening among the loose fragments of rock which oppose its progress, and, falling from slope to slope, at length gains a smoother channel, and winds placidly through the vale to its junction with the Dwyryd. Between this and the bridge, a tall columnar rock, called Pulpit Hugh Llwyd Cynvael, or "Hugh Lloyd of Cynvael's Pulpit," resting upon a broad base, rises from the bed of the river, detached from those which form its wood-fringed sides. The Hugh Lloyd from whom it takes its name was a reputed sorcerer in the time of James I., and is said to have delivered his incantations from the summit of this isolated rocky pillar, for which dark purpose its situation in a deep umbrageous glen was well calculated. There is a great variety of picturesque and romantic scenery in the vicinity of a spot called Cwm Cymmorthau, near which there are four small lakes, named Llŷn Cymmorthau, Llŷn Dû Bâch, Llŷn Trwstyllon, and Llŷn Conglog. On the road to Bala is a place where, after heavy rains, the waters descend from the mountains with tumultuous rapidity, and form a stupendous waterfall. The extreme length of this parish is about ten miles, and its breadth nearly six: the hilly parts are stony, and have a thin sterile soil; the lower are light and gravelly, but fertile: the vale is liable to frequent inundations, which, when the land floods and tide meet, overspread a considerable portion of its surface; but their injurious effects have been partially obviated by the construction of embankments. Four slate quarries are profitably and actively worked here; and their produce, in beauty and goodness, is equal to that of any in the principality. The slate rock lies in strata like coal, and its precipitous escarpments form vast walls, extending from north to south, or from north-east to south-west: when the superincumbent earth is removed, it is split into portable blocks by means of wedges and levers, or, when these instruments are insufficient, by the application of gunpowder: these pieces are then conveyed to an open space, and divided with a hammer and wedge into thin laminæ, or plates of various sizes. The largest and best shaped are called "queens," the next in size "duchesses," the next "countesses" and "ladies," and the smaller "doubles:" all these are generally sold by the thousand, and the rough heavy ones, called "ton slates," by weight. The labourers in these quarries, called "blasters," "borers," &c., are several hundred in number, and often work in very dangerous situations, standing on ledges projecting over immense precipices, and descending to their stations with the aid of a rope tied round the waist. When a blast, or explosion of gunpowder, takes place, timely notice is given, by loudly calling out "War;" and the echo of these explosions, which are sometimes heard to the distance of five or six miles, reverberating from cliff to cliff, is indescribably grand and appalling. The splitting and dressing of slates, which is performed by men exclusively called "quarry-men," is an operation requiring great skill and much practice. A copper mine is worked at Cwm Cynvael; and a lead mine at Gam-allt: copper-ore is also found at Bwlch y Plwm, near the Traeth Mawr, and peat is obtained within the limits of the parish. Festiniog is a place much resorted to during the summer months by tourists, on account of the beauty of the surrounding scenery; and for their accommodation it has a good inn, with a boarding-house attached. Fairs are held on March 7th, May 24th, the first Friday after Trinity, June 30th, August 21st, September 26th, October 23rd, and November 13th. Petty sessions for the district are held at the inn at Tan y Bwlch, on the first Monday in every month.

The living is a rectory, with that of Maentwrog annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is in the ancient style of English architecture: in 1829, a gallery was erected at the west end, containing seventy-two free sittings, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels granted £13. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists, with Sunday schools attached. A National school for both boys and girls was established in 1830, for the parishes of Festiniog and Maentwrog, for which a neat building of English architecture has been erected near the village, by subscription among the inhabitants, aided by a grant of £62 from the parent society in London. In this parish, near a tumulus called Tommen y Môr, is the site of the Roman station Heriri Mons. Two Roman roads are said to have intersected each other within its limits, one leading from Segontium, near the present Carnarvon, to Mediolanum, in Montgomeryshire; and the other from Conovium, at Caerhên, near Aberconway, to Loventium, at Llanio, in Cardiganshire. Within the parish one of these roads, now called Rhŷd yr Halen, more properly Rhŷd Helen, or Fordd Helen, signifying "Helen's Way," may yet be distinctly traced, though for the most part covered with turf: it is said to have been constructed by Helena, daughter of Octavius, and consort of the emperor Maximus; but this presumption is founded only on its present appellation, which is most probably a corruption from Fordd Lleon, signifying the "Legionary Way." Near it are the remains of Beddau Gwyr Ardudwy, "the graves of the men of Ardudwy," which are about six feet long, and were formerly marked at each end by two upright stones, from two to three feet high, and one broad, long since removed. These graves, and some Druidical circles adjacent, denote this to have been the scene of some unrecorded conflict: the tradition connected with them is, that the men of Ardudwy, in order to people their territory, entered the Vale of Clwyd, and forcibly bore off several of its fair inhabitants; but they were pursued by the men of Clwyd, and overtaken at this place, where a sharp conflict ensued, in which the former were defeated and slain: they nevertheless appear to have secured the affections of the females, who, rather than return home, are said to have rushed into an adjacent piece of water, called from this circumstance Llyn y Morwynion, or "the Maidens' Lake," and there to have perished. A silver seal, now in the possession of W. Oakeley, Esq., of Glân William, was found near the mountain of Moelwyn, in 1831: it bears the inscription "S. LUDOWICI EPI. BANGOREN. AD CAUSAS," having been the seal of Lewis, Bishop of Bangor, whose identity, prior to this discovery, had not been satisfactorily ascertained: he lived in the reign of Henry IV., and, having taken part in the insurrection of Owain Glyndwr, was apprehended in Yorkshire, and deprived of his bishoprick: in old chronicles he is simply called "the Bishop of Bangor." The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £309. 10.

FISHGUARD (ABER-GWAIN), a market town and parish, in two divisions, the Upper and Lower, in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, 26½ (N.) from Pembroke, and 249 (W. by N.) from London, containing 1990 inhabitants. The origin of the present town is of comparatively recent date, but the parish in many respects affords striking indications of very remote antiquity. The numerous Druidical relics which abound in the immediate vicinity prove it to have been a resort of the votaries of that ancient religion, for the solemnization of their sacred rites; and the extensive remains of foundations of ancient buildings still existing in a district within the parish, called Caerau, or "the Fortifications," in which, though it has been for ages under cultivation, they still occasionally obstruct the progress of the plough, are strong evidences of its having contained a numerous population at a very early period. According to Mr. Fenton, the historian of Pembrokeshire, this district was inhabited by an ancient race long before the invasion of Britain by the Romans, whom he supposes to have subsequently had a settlement in this place, in which opinion he is confirmed, in some degree, by the discovery, near the spot, of Roman coins, chiefly of the Lower Empire. In the early part of the fifth century, St. Dubricius is said by Bale to have lived in retirement at this place, and to have had a school, which was numerous attended by the inhabitants of the surrounding country, for some time prior to his elevation to the archiepiscopal see of Caerlleon. Pwll Dyvrig, a spot in the romantic Vale of Gwayn, within this parish, which derived its name from that circumstance, is still pointed out as the place of his retreat; and, within the memory of man, games in honour of that saint were annually celebrated on his festival. At the time of the Norman Conquest of England, this place was a small and unimportant fishing village, which, from its situation at the mouth of the river Gwayn, was called, by the Welsh, Aber-Gwain. Soon after that period, an Anglo-Norman leader, named Martin de Tours, or de Turribus, whose services under the Conqueror had been rewarded by a grant of lands in Devonshire, on the coast of the Bristol channel, being desirous of extending the limits of his possessions, fitted out an expedition to act against such part of the Welsh coast as he should find least prepared for defence; and having sailed round the south-western extremity of the county, he succeeded with little difficulty in landing his troops at this place, and in subduing the territory, which subsequently formed the ancient lordship of Kemmes, within the limits of which it was included, and one of the lordships marcher. In the subsequent partition of the conquered territories among his followers, Martin assigned the town of "Aber-Gwain," and nearly the whole of the district which is at present comprehended within the parish, to Jordan de Cantington, who introduced into his newly acquired possessions an English colony, by which the name of the town was changed to Fish-Garth, the latter word signifying in the Anglo-Saxon language a "wear;" and of this name its modern appellation of Fishguard is only a slight modification. Jordan, after repeated attempts to excite in his Welsh and English subjects sentiments of reciprocal conciliation, and peaceable subjection to his authority, in which endeavours he was invariably frustrated by their mutual dissensions, finally gave the whole to the abbey of St. Dogmael's, which had been founded by his patron, Martin de Tours, in the vicinity, and in the possession of which it remained till the period of the general dissolution of religious houses. The origin of the present town, or at least its elevation from an obscure and inconsiderable fishing village to some degree of importance, may be referred to the sixteenth century, when Newport, the head of the barony of Kemmes, being visited with a desolating pestilence, the inhabitants were driven from it and compelled to seek safety in all directions. Many of them, attracted by the open situation of this place, and the purity of its air, established themselves at Fishguard, which, from these advantages of its situation, had entirely escaped the contagion; and to this circumstance are usually ascribed the first increase and the present prosperity of the town, which, however, only obtained the privilege of a market towards the close of the last century, through the exertions of the late William Knox, Esq. In the year 1797, a French force of about eleven hundred men, under the conduct of General Tate, effected a landing on this coast, within a few miles of the town; but after committing some ravages in the neighbourhood, they were made prisoners by the troops under Lord Cawdor. This event, though generally referred to Fishguard, took place in the adjoining parish of Llanwnda.

The town is beautifully situated on the river Gwayn, near its influx into St. George's channel, and is divided into the Upper and Lower town, the former crowning the summit of a hill commanding an extensive and beautiful marine view, and the latter occupying the banks of the river, over which there is a neat stone bridge of five arches. The Upper Town includes the principal portion, containing the church, market-place, and principal shops, and consists chiefly of three streets, diverging from a common centre, partially paved, and consisting of houses irregularly built and of indifferent appearance. Some improvements, however, have recently taken place, and a better style of building and greater regularity prevail in the houses of more modern erection. The inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water of excellent quality, and the springs are so numerous that, wherever the ground is opened, water is found at a small distance below the surface. The neighbouring lands are, with a trifling exception, enclosed, and the greater portion is in a superior state of cultivation: the soil is tolerably fertile. The surrounding scenery is finely diversified, assuming in some parts a striking boldness of character, and in others a pleasing combination of picturesque features and romantic beauty. The situation of the town upon a small bay in St. George's channel, to which it gives name, and the shores of which are distinguished for the beauty of their scenery; the salubrity of its atmosphere; the abundance and cheapness of the commodities brought to its markets; and the facility for sea-bathing, contribute to render Fishguard desirable as a place of residence, and attract to it numerous visitors during the summer. As a proof of its salubrity, the number of aged inhabitants is, perhaps, greater than in any other place of equal population in the kingdom: from a return of the bills of mortality made by the vicar, in compliance with an order from government, from 1813 to 1830 inclusive, it was found that in every year of the above period there was a majority of persons from seventy to ninety, and often to one hundred, years of age. Fishguard bay extends a distance of three miles in a direction from east to west, and about a mile and three-quarters from north to south, varying in depth of water from thirty to seventy feet, in proportion to the distance from the fine bold shore by which it is enclosed. The bottom is firm, affording good anchorage to ships of the largest size, which may ride in safety in all parts of the bay during the prevalence of gales from any point of the compass, except north and north-east. According to a survey made by Mr. Spence, in 1790, by order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, this bay is reported to be the only place, between Milford Haven and St. Tudwal's roads, which is seventeen leagues farther north, where large vessels navigating the Irish channel can put in for shelter. The harbour, which is capacious and easy of access, is situated on the western side of the bay; it is irregular in form, being about two thousand four hundred feet in length, and about one thousand one hundred and sixty feet wide at the entrance, which is free from obstruction either from rocks or a bar. The erection of a pier, which was strongly recommended by the engineer who surveyed the bay, would greatly tend to improve it; and, according to an estimate delivered by the engineer, it might be completed, for the accommodation of one hundred sail of merchant vessels of the usual class, at an expense of £14,785. The harbour was again surveyed, under the direction of the Lords of the Admiralty, by the late Mr. Rennie, who confirmed the preceding report, and recommended, in addition to the proposed pier from Fort Point, the construction of a breakwater from Cow and Calf Point. The expense of both these works, according to Mr. Rennie's estimate, would not exceed the sum of £80,000, and their construction would render the harbour one of the safest and most commodious on the coast for vessels of almost all descriptions. But in consequence of neither of the above plans having been carried into effect, and no public man in the county interesting himself with government towards the attainment of so desirable an object, the prosperity of the place has been greatly retarded, and, owing to the very indifferent state of repair of the present small pier, Fishguard is daily becoming more impoverished; as not only its own shipping, but vessels from other ports, were accustomed to put in and remain here, while the pier was in a state of good repair, for a greater or less period, making Milford their port as a matter of necessity. The trade of this place, notwithstanding the many local advantages which it possesses, and the spaciousness of its harbour, is consequently very inconsiderable: it consists chiefly of the exportation of corn and butter to Bristol and Liverpool, and the importation of shop goods, coal and culm (from Milford and Swansea), coal (from Newport, Cardiff, &c.), limestone (from Milford), and timber. Some of the largest vessels belonging to the port are engaged in the general carrying trade from Bristol, Liverpool, Milford, and London, to Ireland, &c. The Irish packets often put in here, when driven by stress of weather. The herring fishery, which formerly afforded employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants, became latterly unproductive, and has been discontinued, with the exception of procuring a supply for the immediate neighbourhood only. Lead-ore has been recently found within the parish, but not of sufficient quantity, nor of quality rich enough, to encourage any attempts to work it. Slate of very good quality abounds in the neighbourhood, and iron-ore has been found near the town. The market is on Thursday, and is well supplied with grain, and with provisions of every kind. The fairs are on February 5th, Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, July 23rd, and November 17th. Fishguard is thought to have been anciently an incorporated borough, and is traditionally reported to have possessed a charter, granted by King John, which was lost during the great civil war of the seventeenth century: there is a district in the parish still known by the name of "The Borough." By the late act for amending the representation of the people it has been constituted a contributory borough with Haverfordwest and Narberth, in the return of a representative to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which are given in the Appendix to this work, is fifty-five: the sheriff of Haverfordwest is the returning officer. It has also been made

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 0. 5., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The vicar receives one-third of the whole tithes of that portion of the parish which is situated to the west of the river Gwayn, and the impropriator all the remainder. The church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is pleasantly situated in the Upper Town : it has recently been repaired, and is a neat small edifice, but not distinguished by any peculiarity of architecture. A handsome vicarage-house, called Vicar's Park, from the name of the plot of glebe on which it stands, has been erected by the present incumbent, the Rev. Samuel Fenton, M. A., which has much improved the entrance into the town from Haverfordwest. The town, previously to the erection of the present church, is said to have comprised two distinct parishes, now forming only one ; and the ruins of three ancient chapels, called respectively Llan-Vihangel, Llan-Vartin, and Llan-Ist, may still be traced : of these, two probably were parish churches, and the third a chapel of ease to one of them. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. The hills in this parish, which enclose the romantic Vale of Gwayn, were formerly thickly strewed with Druidical relics, of which several vestiges may still be traced ; and near the site which was formerly occupied by the ancient town called Caerau, three Roman urns have been found, containing numerous coins, chiefly of Gallienus, Posthumus, Claudius, and some other emperors ; but they were melted down soon after their discovery. In various parts of the parish are numerous tumuli, some of which have been found to contain relics of the rudest ages, urns of various forms and of the coarsest workmanship, implements of stone, bones, ashes, and curiously wrought stones. Near the town are several tumuli, or artificial mounds, intrenched, as if for military purposes, and called Castellau, or "the Castles," probably from that circumstance : these Mr. Fenton supposes to be sepulchral monuments of a very remote age, and to have been reduced to their present form, which is that of a truncated cone, and probably surmounted by forts, during the wars between the Welsh and the invading Saxons. On the bank of the river Gwayn, in a secluded and romantic situation, stands the neat mansion of the late Richard Fenton, Esq., barrister-at-law, and author of a "Historical Tour through Pembrokeshire ;" it is pleasantly embosomed in a thick grove of trees, and is now the property and residence of his eldest son. A mineral spring in the parish was formerly in high estimation for its efficacy in the cure of numbedness of the limbs and other complaints. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £480. 11.

FLEMINGSTON, otherwise FLIMSTON, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.E. by S.) from Cowbridge, containing 73 inhabitants. This place is said to have derived its name from the descendants of Sir John Fleming, one of Fitz-Hamon's knights, who was settled at St. George's on the river Ely ; and there are some remains, near the churchyard, of a castellated mansion in which they resided. The village is pleasantly situated upon an elevated part of the fertile Vale of Glamorgan, and its appearance bears evident marks of antiquity. An extensive tract of country hitherto totally unproductive, called Flimston Moors, is now undergoing the process of draining, and, from the improvement which has already taken place, is likely to prove an advantageous speculation to the enterprising agriculturist. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Llanmihangel, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 9. A Sunday school is conducted by the incumbent. Edward Williams, commonly called "Edward Williams, the bard," was a native of this village, in which he resided till his death, at the advanced age of eighty : he was by trade a stone-mason, and laboured at that employment whilst his strength permitted him : his first attempts at poetry were in the Welsh language ; his literary acquirements, considering his station in life, were extensive, and his knowledge of the antiquities of his country was profound. Mr. Malkin, speaking of this self-educated genius, observes that, "had his talents been noticed in early life, the public would probably have gained an eminent architect, or sculptor, without losing a valuable antiquary : " during the last thirty years of his life he is said never to have lain down in bed, being greatly afflicted with asthma. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £37. 11.

FLINT, a borough, market-town and sea-port, and a parochial chapelry, in the parish of NORTHOP, and in the Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT (of which it is the ancient capital), NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.) from Mold, 5 (E. S. E.) from Holywell, 13 (W. N. W.) from Chester, and 204 (N. W.) from London, containing 2216 inhabitants. The name of this place, though not occurring in Domesday-book, is undoubtedly Saxon ; but its derivation has not yet been satisfactorily ascertained, not being in any way deducible from the nature of its soil or substrata, in which is found neither silex nor petrosilex. The origin of the town, though undoubtedly remote, is involved in the greatest obscurity. Although it cannot be identified with any Roman station mentioned in the Itineraries, it was nevertheless either of Roman or Roman British origin, as is proved by the circumstance of its even now occupying a rectangular intrenched area, like that of a Roman place of defence, and by the discovery, at various times, both here and in the neighbourhood, of a vast quantity of Roman coins, fibulæ, &c. ; while at the same time it is still traditionally related that a very large town existed here at an early period. The Roman remains were chiefly found in the "old washes," as the miners term the spots where they separate ore from ancient scoria, from the abundance of which at this place, and in its immediate vicinity, it has been reasonably supposed that the process of smelting was carried on here to a great extent by the Roman conquerors of Britain, who constituted it a port for the exportation of the metal, and placed here a small garrison to protect the works and enforce the payment of the duties. It is conjectured by Mr. Pennant that this place is identical with that noticed in the Norman Survey as "tenementum de Coleselt," comprising one hide of taxable land, and forming part of the possessions of Robert de Rhuddlan, of whom it was held by one Edwin, a free man, and with that included among the benefactions enumerated in the charter of Davydd ab Llewelyn to the abbey of Basingwerk, under the designation of "Capella de Colsul." Flint and its immediate vicinity have at different periods been the scene of important and interesting historical events. In the division of his dominions made by Roderic the Great, sovereign of all Wales, among his three sons, it was ordained, that if any quarrel should arise between the princes of North Wales and Powys, a meeting of the parties was to be held at Morva Rhianedd, on the banks of the Dee, near the site of the present town of Flint, in which the Prince of South Wales was to determine the controversy. Ranulph Earl of Chester, invading North Wales, in the year 1150, was met at Counsylvllt, Cynsylvllt, or Coleshill, to the west of this town, by Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, who totally defeated his forces with great slaughter, few escaping death except the prisoners and the leaders of the invading army, the latter of whom saved themselves by the swiftness of their horses. On the invasion of North Wales by Henry II., in 1157, after a party of his troops had been defeated at Coed-Euloe, near Hawarden, this monarch advanced at the head of his army along the shores of the Dee to the town of Flint, a little beyond which, at the place where the Earl of Chester had been defeated by Owain Gwynedd, he received a severe check from this prince's forces. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Itinerary of the journey made through Wales by Archbishop Baldwin and himself, in 1188, for the purpose of preaching the crusades, mentions the fact of their resting one night at "Coleshulle, or the hill of coal," undoubtedly the same place as that identified by the respectable antiquary above-named with the present town of Flint. Much doubt prevails as to the period of the first erection of the castle of Flint, which, from the thirteenth century until the termination of the civil war of the seventeenth, holds a distinguished place in the Welsh annals. Camden, who is followed by Lord Lyttelton, asserts that it was begun by Henry II. and completed by Edward I.: Leland, however, adduces the authority of an ancient writer, who attributes even its foundation to the latter monarch, in the year 1275, when, being encamped on Saltney marsh, near Chester, preparing for an invasion of North Wales, he certainly either originally erected or rebuilt this fortress, to secure, together with Rhuddlan castle, the country which he had already subdued, and to afford his army a safe retreat, in case he should meet with any disaster. Although Henry, after his partial defeat at Counsylvllt, might probably construct some slight fortification here, for the protection of his discomfited forces, yet the certainty of Edward's being the original founder of the present castle is proved by a petition of the inhabitants of Flint, in the year 1281, in which they state, amongst other grievances, that the king had built the castle upon their soil, by which means numbers of persons were injured, and, although the justiciary had received a royal mandate to grant them a specified remuneration of land, equal in quantity and quality, they had been despoiled of their property, and had received in lieu neither land nor money.

Previously to this, in 1277, the men of Flint obtained an order for the proclamation of a market at this town. In 1280, an order was issued for the custody of the gate of the castle, at which time probably the place was first garrisoned. In 1292, this fortress was besieged and taken by the forces of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, and his brother Davydd; being then, besides Rhuddlan, the only fortress in North Wales in the possession of the English. In the following year, Edward resided for some time in this castle, and made the town a free borough; empowering the inhabitants, by his charter, dated from the castle on the 8th of September, to cut down timber in the woods of Northop, Leadbrook, Keldreston, Wolfynton, Weppre, and Sutton, for the smelting of their lead-ore; also granting them a right of pasture in these woods. The same monarch, in 1290, issued an order for superintending the works of the castles of Flint, Rhuddlan, and Chester, which places were of the first importance, as commanding a free entrance into his newly-conquered dominion of North Wales. Edward II. resided for some time in this castle, in which he received with exulting pleasure his banished favourite, Piers Gaveston, who had landed from Ireland at Carnarvon. The castle and town of Flint appear almost always, when in the possession of the English, to have belonged to the earldom of Chester, with which they were granted by Edward III., in the seventh year of his reign, to his son Edward, surnamed the Black Prince, to whom he issued an order, two years afterwards, to take the castles of Flint and Rhuddlan into his custody, to furnish them with provisions, and to place in them sufficient garrisons, as had been done in the same prince's castles of Beeston and Chester. The castle of Flint has, in like manner, been always enumerated in the charters investing the eldest sons of succeeding kings of England with the earldom of Chester, when they were created princes of Wales. From a schedule of the 50th of Edward III. it appears, that the town of Flint then yielded to the Earls of Chester a revenue of £56; and that of "Colshul," of which there is a separate entry, £4.7.10. But in a later account the profits arising from the former appear to have greatly decreased, while those from the latter have increased, to an amount nearly equal to the original estimate of those derived from Flint. In 1385, the castle was bestowed by Richard II., with the office of chief justice of Chester, on Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, and subsequently, in 1399, on Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who, in the following year, on the return of this unfortunate monarch from his Irish expedition, inveigled him to this fortress, for the purpose of delivering him into the power of the usurping Bolingbroke, who was afterwards advanced to the throne, under the title of Henry IV. Having decoyed him from among his friends at Aberconway, Percy conducted him to Flint castle, under an escort of Bolingbroke's soldiers, who had met them on the road: here the unfortunate Richard was at first received with every outward sign of respect by his rival and his attendants, who, however, on the following day commenced treating him with indignity, and he was conveyed a virtual prisoner to Chester. During the insurrection of the Welsh under Owain Glyndwr, in the reign of Henry IV., that monarch garrisoned the castle of Flint against the men of this borough, who had joined their revolted countrymen, and were making frequent attempts to gain possession of it. But the garrison resisted every assault, and kept possession of the fortress till the insurrection was quelled, upon which event Henry, Prince of Wales, procured from his father a free pardon for all the burgesses of Flint who had joined the standard of the insurgents. Soon after the commencement of the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the castle was repaired and garrisoned for the king by Sir Roger Mostyn, Bart., who had raised a force of one thousand five hundred men, equipped and maintained at his sole expense. Sir Roger was appointed governor of the castle of Flint, which, in 1643, was vigorously besieged by the parliamentary forces under Sir William Brereton and Sir Thomas Myddelton: though closely pressed, the garrison made an obstinate and protracted defence, till reduced by want of provisions to feed on the flesh of their horses; and this resource also failing, and being entirely hopeless of relief, they at length surrendered upon honourable terms. The castle was afterwards retaken by the royalists, under the command of Sir William Vaughan, in September 1645, and was reinforced in the November following by the garrison of Beeston, which, after a gallant but unsuccessful resistance to the parliamentary forces, was allowed by the terms of their capitulation to march to this place with all the honours of war. After receiving this accession of force, the castle remained unmolested till August 1646, when it was finally surrendered to Major-General Mytton, and in the following year was dismantled by order of the parliament.

The town is situated on the shore of the æstuary of the river Dee, which sometimes flows close to it, occasionally receding, and approaching it again, opposite to Parkgate in Cheshire, from which place it is distant five miles, and consists of four principal streets, intersecting each other at right angles, with many smaller ones, dividing it into squares, and exhibiting, with little deviation, the regular plan of an ancient Roman city: the buildings are, notwithstanding, very inferior in appearance to what might be expected from the regularity with which the streets are disposed; and, with the exception of its convenient situation for sea-bathing, which attracts a considerable resort of company during the summer months, the town possesses few recommendations as a place of residence. For the accommodation of persons who visit it for the benefit of the waters hot baths have been constructed on an extensive scale, and are provided with every requisite accommodation. The neighbourhood abounds with pleasing walks and rides through a tract of country rich in picturesque beauty and finely varied scenery. The principal branch of trade is the smelting of lead-ore, for which purpose very extensive works have been erected on the site of the ancient Roman hearths, the proprietors of which, by investing a large capital in the lead and coal works, the formation of wharfs, and other improvements, have materially increased the trade and added to the importance of the town. In these works, erected by Geo. Roskill and Co., in 1812, in which is a very extensive reverberating furnace, six thousand tons of lead are annually smelted, from which nearly forty thousand ounces of fine silver are extracted. In 1824, a tower, one hundred and forty feet high and forty-two feet in diameter, was added to the works, for the purpose of collecting the sulphur from the different flues in this extensive concern, in conducting the various departments of which one hundred and twenty persons are constantly employed. The making of boilers for steam-engines has also been lately introduced, and is carried on to a limited extent; and close to the town are extensive collieries, in which eight hundred men are constantly employed, and one thousand five hundred tons of coal are raised weekly: rail-roads have been constructed to convey the coal from the works to the wharfs, whence it is sent coastwise to Chester and to various parts of North Wales. The principal exports, in addition to the vast quantity of coal, are the produce of the lead-works, consisting of lead in pigs, bars, sheets, and patent pipes, and red lead, litharge, and silver. The æstuary of the river Dee is navigable for vessels of two hundred and fifty, or three hundred, tons' burden, which can at any time approach the quay; and the various wharfs, piers, and embankments which have been constructed, for the accommodation of the works above mentioned, afford every facility to the commerce of the town, which is rapidly improving. The market has fallen into disuse: fairs are held on the first Monday in February, July 3rd, and November 3rd.

This town was first made a free borough by Edward I., who, in 1283, granted the inhabitants a charter of privileges, which is said to have been confirmed by Edward II., and extended by Edward III. The latter monarch bestowed both the town and castle, together with several others, upon his son Edward the Black Prince, whom he created Earl of Chester, to which earldom the town and county of Flint are still appended. Prince Edward gave the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, and ordained that the constable of the castle for the time being should be mayor of the borough. Their charter was confirmed in the 2nd and 3rd of Philip and Mary, and subsequently in the 12th of William III. The government is vested in a mayor (the constable of the castle), appointed by letters patent, two bailiffs, a recorder, and twelve capital burgesses, assisted by a mace-bearer and other officers elected annually, on the 29th of September, from among the burgesses at large. The revenue of the borough has been greatly diminished by an act which was obtained in 1816, for enclosing the waste lands in the parish, by which the burgesses have been deprived of the greater portion of the lands assigned to them by the charter of Prince Edward, exceeding six hundred acres in extent. The elective franchise was first granted to this borough, as the shire town, in the 27th of Henry VIII., since which period it has constantly returned one member to parliament, in conjunction with the contributory boroughs of Caergwrle, Caerwys, Overton, and Rhuddlan: the right of election in this, as in each of the contributory boroughs, is vested in all the resident householders paying scot and lot, in number at present four hundred and forty-nine: the bailiffs are the returning officers; and the nomination and election of the member both for the county and the boroughs take place in this town. The late act for amending the representation of the people added the towns of St. Asaph, Holywell, and Mold to the former district of contributory boroughs, but did not alter the constituency of the latter, owing to its scot and lot character, except by subjecting each individual voter to the registry, in common with the £10 householders in other boroughs. The limits of the borough, which remain unaltered by the late act, include not only the whole chapelry of Flint, but also the township of Coleshill-Vawr, in the adjacent parish of Holywell, the latter of which, on account of its ancient importance, has given name to the hundred in which the whole is locally situated. None of the members of the corporation exercise magisterial authority, the town being under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions here; but though it is the ancient provincial metropolis of Flintshire, the assizes and quarter sessions for the county have for many years been held at Mold. The county court, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, is held here, on the first Wednesday in every month, by the under sheriff. The guildhall, erected in the reign of Elizabeth, is in a very dilapidated state, and is used only at the annual election of the officers of the corporation. The county gaol, erected on part of the site of the ancient castle, in 1785, is small and inconvenient, not admitting of a due classification of the prisoners: the expense of its erection was partly defrayed by subscription, but chiefly by the county, as is expressed by a neat inscription over the entrance gateway, written by Thomas Pennant, Esq., the antiquary and naturalist, who was a great promoter of the work from benevolent motives, the former gaol having become quite unfit for human residence: even the present edifice is about to be taken down, and a building better adapted to the purpose is to be erected at Mold.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Northop: the two last incumbents were, however, presented by the Bishop of St. Asaph. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but neat edifice, having some portions in the early style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school was built here in 1820, by the subscriptions of a few individuals, by whom it is supported; one hundred and twenty children are gratuitously instructed in it. Twelve almshouses were built by the corporation, for the accommodation of poor burghesses; but, from the alienation of the lands of that body, by the late enclosure act, they have no endowment. There are some small charitable bequests and donations for distribution among the poor. At a short distance to the east of the town are the remains of the castle, occupying the summit of a rock of freestone, which is washed by the tide at high water: this extensive pile comprised within its outer walls a quadrangular area, at each of three angles of which was a strong circular tower, and at the fourth a similar bastion of much greater dimensions, erected by Edward I., and called the double tower, from its inner enclosure being surrounded by an outer concentric wall, forming a circular gallery, from which four arched openings afforded entrance to the inner and central area, twenty-two feet in diameter. This tower, which was the "donjon," or keep, communicated with the quadrangle by a drawbridge across an intervening moat, which isolated it from the rest of the works, and, from the prodigious thickness of the walls, and the completeness of its fortifications, was considered impregnable. From it Richard II. descended to meet Bolingbroke, on being betrayed into his power by the Earl of Northumberland. The principal remains of this ancient fortress are the towers and the east and north walls, which are fast going to decay: the foundations of the eastern tower are undermined by the sea, which, in high tides, dashes with great violence against its base; and a considerable portion of this interesting and once important structure was taken down in 1785, for the purpose of erecting the county gaol. It is still nominally under the government of a constable, appointed by the crown, who receives a fee of £10: it has also a porter, who receives a fee of £6. 1. 8. About a mile from the town, on the lower road to Chester, formerly stood an ancient cross, from which the hundred of Atiscross, noticed in the Norman survey as comprising nearly all the country between the rivers Dee and Conway, took its name: the shaft of this cross is still preserved, and the ground around it is called Croes Ati: tradition states that a large town once existed here, and the foundations of buildings have been turned up by the plough. This is one of the places at which the scoria and Roman antiquities above noticed have been found: the scoria contained such quantities of lead as to induce the washers of ore to farm these spots, and to smelt it over again, by which means many tons of metal have been obtained: in removing it for that purpose, coins of the emperors Nero and Vespasian were found in a state of high preservation, together with a variety of ancient instruments and ornaments of Roman construction. Among the interesting remains thus discovered may be noticed a rich ornament of gold, elegantly formed of twisted wire, studded with globular beads of solid gold, which appears to have belonged to a bracelet, or necklace, of gold links, ornamented with pieces of blue glass, of which a part only was found; a small head of brass affixed to iron; a stylus, or instrument for writing on the ceratæ tabellæ, or waxen tablets; a species of narrow spoon used to collect tears for the lachrymatory; instruments of sacrifice; golden bullæ, or amulets; two fibulæ, or brooches; various species of buttons; instruments for dressing lamps, keys, rings, &c. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £325. 13.

FLINTSHIRE, a maritime county of NORTH WALES, the main body of which is bounded on the south, south-west, and west, by Denbighshire; on the north, by the Irish sea; on the north-east, by the estuary of the river Dee; and on the east, by the English county of Cheshire: but the chief part of the hundred of Maelor lies detached from the rest of the county, about seven miles to the south-east, and is bounded on the north by Cheshire, on the east and south by Shropshire, and on the west by Denbighshire. The whole county, exclusively of the detached portion, lies between 53° 2" and 53° 22" (N. Lat.), and 2° 55" and 3° 31" (W. Lon.) The detached portion of the hundred of Maelor is about nine miles long, and three and a half broad: the whole county, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, contains one hundred and seventy-two thousand seven hundred and ninety acres, or nearly two hundred and seventy square miles. The population, in 1831, was 60,012.

At the period of the conquest of this part of Britain by the Romans, Flintshire was part of the territory of the Ordovices, excepting only the detached part of it lying eastward of the Dee, which was occupied by the Cornavii; and, in Mr. Pennant's opinion, the principal part of the main county derived its ancient name of Tegeingl, or Tegangle, from a tribe of the former people, called Cangi, who attended the flocks and herds in different pastures, of various quality, according to the season of the year; teg, importing fair; cang, the name of the people; and lle, a place: in support of this etymology he adduces the circumstance of a plain, in the parish of Caerwys, being at the present day called Maescan-hâvod, or "The Plain of the Hundred Summer Residences." By the Romans this district was called Tegenia; and under their dominion it contained the station Varis, at Bôdvâr, on the banks of the Clwyd, near Denbigh. That of Banchorium, Bonium, or Bovium, was situated at Bangor-Iscoed, on the eastern bank of the Dee; and from the various traces of Roman occupation discovered at Caergwrle, that place also appears to have been an important post belonging to these conquerors. Flintshire was crossed by a branch of the northern Watling-street, which entered it near Chester, and passed by the station Varis to that at Caerhên, near Aberconway. The Romans having withdrawn their forces, and left the native and partly civilized Britons to defend themselves against the northern barbarians, the latter, in the year 448, were totally defeated by the Christian Britons, at Maes y Garmon, or "the Field of Germanus," near Rhual, the seat of Frederick Philips, Esq., and not far from the present town of Mold: the British army was led on by Germanus and Lupus, two missionary bishops from Gaul, commanded by the former of whom, the troops raised such vehement shouts of Alleluia, that the allied Picts and Scots fled in dismay, and were nearly all slain: this, by most of the monkish historians, has been called Victoria Alleluatica. At the beginning of the seventh century, Ethelfrith, King of Northumbria, having gained some advantages over the northern Britons, turned his arms against the Welsh, and, at the commencement of the great battle of Chester, in which he was completely victorious, issued orders for the massacre of the monks of the monastery of Bangor-Iscoed, twelve hundred in number, who had come to offer up their prayers for the success of their countrymen, and of whom only fifty escaped. After the battle, Ethelfrith marched to Bangor, situated on the eastern banks of the Dee, in this county, where he totally destroyed that ancient and celebrated seminary of learning, and committed to the flames its invaluable library. The Saxon prince then attempted to penetrate further into the Welsh territory, but his passage over the Dee, at Bangor, was successfully opposed by the Prince of Powys, until relieved by Cadvan, King of North Wales, Meredydd, King of South Wales, and Bledrus, sovereign of Cornwall. The confederate princes having joined their forces, Dunothus, the abbot of the lately destroyed monastery, made an oration to the army, and, before the action commenced, gave orders that the soldiers should kiss the ground, in commemoration of the communion of the body of Christ, and should take up water into their hands, out of the river Dee, and drink it, in remembrance of his sacred blood which was shed for them. Animated by this act of devotion, the British forces encountered their adversaries with great bravery, entirely defeated them, with the loss of above ten thousand men, and compelled Ethelfrith, with the remainder of his army, to retreat into Northumbria: thus, the desolation of Bangor was severely punished within sight of its smoking ruins.

Offa, the powerful and warlike sovereign of Mercia having, in the eighth century, driven the Cymry westward into the mountains, drew a conspicuous line of demarcation, along the western side of his dominions, consisting of a vast ditch and rampart, which extended from the sea, near Prestatyn, in this county, to the banks of the Wye: through Flintshire it took a direction from north-west to south-east, and the first visible traces of it, proceeding in the latter direction, are found near Golden Grove, whence it proceeds towards Marian, in the parish of Newmarket, and hence to the Holywell race-ground, below which it is lost until found again at Cae-dwn, near Treuddyn, beyond which it soon enters Denbighshire. Mr. Pennant conceives that Offa's Dyke, or Clawdd Offa, as it is designated by the Welsh, terminated northward at Cae-dwn, and observes that, "it seems probable that Offa imagined that the Clwydian hills, and the deep valley at their eastern base, would serve as a continuance of his prohibitory line: he had carried his arms over the greater part of Flintshire, and vainly imagined that his labours would restrain the Cambrian inroads, in one part, and his orders prevent any incursions beyond these natural limits, which he had decreed should be the boundaries of his new conquests." The Mercian monarch, however, having been attacked by surprise, and defeated near this great monument of his power, breathing slaughter and vengeance, once more attacked the territory of the Cymry; but confining themselves to a desultory warfare, the latter made continual and destructive irruptions, from their woods and mountains, upon the forces of the enemy, and for some time maintained a successful defence. But, abandoning this cautious system, they imprudently determined to risk a general engagement, and the hostile armies met on the extensive marshy plain, near the sea-coast, called Morva Rhuddlan: the battle was long and sanguinary, but at length victory declared in favour of the Saxons; the Welsh were completely defeated, with terrible slaughter, and Caradoc, their valiant chieftain, slain. On this event, so disastrous to the Britons, the victor commanded the men and children taken prisoners to be massacred; but, according to tradition, few were left to gratify this barbarous revenge, those who had escaped the enemy's sword, during the action, having fled across the marshes with such precipitation as to perish on the sands in the waters of the advancing tide. Immediately after the surrender of Chester to Egbert of Wessex, the whole of the present county of Flint, being an open tract and devoid of those rugged and almost inaccessible elevations which occupy so much of the rest of North Wales, became subject to the arms of that powerful monarch, who carried his devastations to the foot of the Snowdon mountains. On the death of Roderic the Great, in 877, the cantrev of Tegeingl, or, as the Saxons called it, Englefeld, became included in the district of Perveddwlad, in the kingdom of Gwynedd, or North Wales, the seat of the government of which was at Aberffraw, in Anglesey; while the south-eastern parts of it, contained in the comots of Ystrad-Alun and Caergwrle, formed part of the kingdom of Powys, as also did Maelor Saesneg, or "English Maelor," to the east of the Dee. Early in the reign of Anarawd, who, on the death of his father Roderic, became sovereign of Gwynedd, the remnant of the Strath-Clyde Britons, being harassed by the Danes, Saxons, and Scots, and, after severe conflicts with them, having lost their king, Constantine, in battle, applied to Anarawd for an asylum in his dominions; and the latter agreed to receive them, on condition of their recovering from the Saxons a portion of the territory which the latter had usurped from the ancient Cymry, in which they had permission to settle, and to maintain their position by force of arms: these Britons soon dispossessed the Saxons of the country situated between the rivers Conway and Dee, of which they remained for some time in quiet possession, until it was again overrun by Eadred, Earl of Mercia, who, however, was defeated by the Prince of North Wales, near the town of Aberconway, and pursued into his own country: the northern Britons, who, on the approach of Eadred, had removed their cattle and other valuable effects westward beyond the Conway, now established themselves, as a separate state, in the conquered country, to which they gave the name of Ystrad-Clwyd, from an important part of it lying on the banks of the river Clwyd: this was afterwards peaceably united to the kingdom of North Wales. In the year 1055, this county was laid waste by the forces of Harold, whom Edward the Confessor had sent to punish Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, for assisting Algar, the banished Earl of Chester, in his attacks on the English territories. It experienced a similar calamity, from the same cause, in 1063, on which occasion Harold advanced with such celerity, that he nearly took Gruffydd by surprise, in his palace at Rhuddlan; the latter having only time, the moment before the English presented themselves at the gate, to embark on board of one of his ships, at that time lying ready for his reception in the harbour: mortified that the Welsh prince should thus have escaped, Harold burned his palace, and set fire to all the vessels remaining in the harbour of Rhuddlan.

After the Norman Conquest, nearly the whole of this county appears in the general survey as appertaining to the county palatine of Chester, being then called Englefield: it formed a chief portion of the great district called, in that document, the hundred of Atiscros, lying between the river Dee and the Vale of Clwyd; and many places now contained in it, though difficult to identify, from the disfiguration of Norman orthography, are there described, and their valuations given, under the head of the county palatine. The isolated portion of the county, then called Maelor Saesneg, was, at the period of the Norman survey, included in a hundred called Dudestan; but by the Statutum Wallie, enacted in the twelfth year of the reign of Edward I., it was declared to constitute part of Flintshire; and in the reign of Henry VIII. the south-eastern extremity of the main county was added to it, and the whole formed into the present hundred of Maelor. In addition to Hugh Lupus and his successors in the earldom of Chester, in the reign of William Rufus, a Norman, named Eustace de Cruer, is also noticed among the proprietors of lands in this county, having done homage to that monarch for the territory of Mold and Hopedale, which afterwards, together with Hawarden, formed part of the possessions of Robert de Monthault, high steward of Chester. In 1144, the castle of Mold was besieged and taken by storm, by the forces of Owain, Prince of North Wales. Henry II., in 1157, collected a formidable army from different parts of England, intending to invade Wales; and marching to Chester, thence advanced into Flintshire, where he encamped on Saltney Marsh, bordering on the Dee. So vast were the preparations made by this prince for the subjugation of the Welsh, that he compelled every two of his military vassals throughout England to furnish a soldier for the reinforcement of his army. Owain, Prince of North Wales, with his habitual activity, advanced to the frontiers of his dominions, and posted himself at Basingwerk, near Holywell, to await the approach of the English. Henry, hoping that the Welsh prince intended to risk a general engagement, despatched a chosen body of troops, under the command of several distinguished barons, with the design of either bringing the Welsh to action, or dislodging them from their station. This party, in passing through the woody and rugged district of Coed-Eulo, near Hawarden, was attacked by Davydd and Cynan, sons of Owain, who, with a body of forces, lay in ambush to intercept them: the suddenness and impetuosity of the assault, with the natural difficulties of their situation, so intimidated the English, that they fled in great disorder, and with much loss, to the main body of the army. Alarmed by the danger, and mortified by this disgrace, Henry broke up his camp, and marched along the shores of the Dee to the town of Flint, intending, by another manœuvre, to leave the Welsh on the right, and to cut off their communication with the interior; but in passing through a long and narrow defile at Counsylvll, or Coleselt, now called Coleshill, near Flint, he was intercepted by Owain. The English were permitted to enter so far into the pass as to render their advance or retreat, in case of attack, equally dangerous and difficult, when the Welsh, rushing with frightful outcries from the woods, assaulted them with stones, arrows, and other missiles. Struck with dismay, encumbered with heavy armour, and unaccustomed to fight in such situations, the English were again thrown into the utmost disorder: in the general confusion, Henry himself was obliged to flee, and Eustace Fitz-John and Robert de Courcy, with other noblemen of distinction, were slain. A few of the vanguard of the English army, who had escaped the general slaughter, fell back upon the main body, which was advancing in regular order to the entrance of the defile; and a false report of the king's death being raised, the Earl of Essex, hereditary standard-bearer of England, was seized with the general terror, and, throwing down the royal standard, gave increased currency to the rumour by exclaiming aloud, "The king is slain." The alarm now spread rapidly throughout the whole of the English ranks; and the Welsh, perceiving the disorder, attacked the invaders with such impetuosity, that a total rout must have ensued, had not the king, at length extricated from his perilous situation, appeared at this crisis, and made himself known to his army by lifting up the vizor of his helmet. The English, re-inspired by the gallantry of their sovereign, who with alacrity led them on to the charge, checked the victorious career of the Welsh, and drove them back into the woods. The Prince of Wales, after this slight reverse, retired to a post near St. Asaph, called from this circumstance Cil Owain, or

"Owain's Retreat;" and on the nearer approach of the King of England, he further retreated to a still stronger post, called Bryn y Pin, situated about five miles to the west of St. Asaph. Henry, meeting with no further resistance, advanced to Rhuddlan, and strongly fortified the castle of that town, as well as that of Basingwerk, at which latter place he erected a house for the knights templar, a new kind of military garrison in Wales; and, further to secure his new conquests, by facilitating military movements, he cut down the woods, and constructed new roads through the subdued districts. Meantime, Owain frequently descended from his post on the hill, to skirmish with the English troops and molest them in their operations; but at last he was compelled to enter into a treaty, by which himself and his chieftains submitted to do homage to Henry, and to yield up those castles and districts in North Wales which, in the late reign, had been obtained from the English.

A few years afterwards, all the princes of Wales entered into a confederacy for the recovery of their lost independence, and one of their first enterprises was an expedition, under the conduct of Davydd, son of Owain Gwynedd, into Flintshire, where this leader made dreadful devastations, carrying off the cattle and inhabitants to the Vale of Clwyd. The English monarch, who was absent in Normandy, on his arrival in 1165, marched into this county with a body of troops, which had been levied by parliament for the reduction of Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, to protect Rhuddlan castle, which he feared would be besieged by the Welsh; but the enemy having retired, the king stayed only a few days to reinforce his garrisons, and then returned into England, to prepare new levies for a powerful expedition, which, however, was directed against a more southern frontier. In 1166, the Prince of North Wales took and demolished the castle of Basingwerk. In 1210, the Earl of Chester made an inroad into North Wales; and the prince of this country, in return, cruelly devastated the earl's territories, and brought away considerable plunder. Incensed at this incursion, King John assembled a large army at Oswestry, and, having been joined by many of the Welsh chieftains, his vassals, marched to Chester, fully resolved upon the extermination of the people of North Wales; from that city the English army advanced along the shores of the Dee and of the Irish sea to Rhuddlan, and thence proceeded towards the mountains of Snowdon, but, in a short time, after a harassing warfare, was compelled to make a disgraceful retreat. On several subsequent occasions Flintshire was the scene of like invasions and retreats. About the year 1260, the castle of Dyserth, in this county, was taken from the English and destroyed, by Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, as was also that of Mold, a short time after, by Gruffydd ab Gwenwynwyn. In 1277, Edward I., on his advance with a large army to effect the final conquest of Wales, encamped his forces for some time on Saltney Marsh, rebuilt the castle of Flint, and more strongly fortified that of Rhuddlan, and at the same time bestowed much labour in making good roads for the movements of his troops. Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, and his brother Davydd, having been reconciled to each other, afterwards concerted measures for a general insurrection against the power of the English, and Davydd opened the campaign by taking the castle of Hawarden, by surprise, on the dark and stormy night of Palm Sunday, 1282. After this successful exploit, the brothers, having joined their forces, invested the castles of Flint and Rhuddlan, the only fortresses then remaining in the possession of the English in this part of the principality, and soon gained possession of the former: these enterprises were regarded by the Welsh, in every quarter, as the signal for revolt. Edward, however, came to Chester with a large army, and having remained a fortnight in that city to refresh his troops, he commenced operations about the middle of June, 1282, by investing the castle of Caergwrle, which fortress had been for some time in the possession of Davydd, but was almost immediately surrendered to the English monarch, on whose further advance the Welsh princes raised the siege of Rhuddlan castle, and retreated slowly towards Snowdon. Seizing a favourable opportunity, Llewelyn put to flight a detachment of the English army, taking fourteen standards in the action, in which were slain the lords Audley and Clifford, and various other noblemen and gentlemen, and the king himself was forced to retire for protection into his newly-acquired castle of Caergwrle. In the middle of July we find Edward issuing orders from Rhuddlan; and in the following November he advanced to Aberconway.

In the reign of Henry III., John, surnamed Le Scot, Earl of Chester, having died without male issue, that earldom, to which belonged the territory of Flint, was given by the king to Simon de Montfort, the coheiresses of John Le Scot receiving other lands in exchange: on Montfort's death, in 1265, the earldom was annexed to the crown of England. In succeeding reigns, the eldest son of the reigning monarch, on being created Prince of Wales, has received a grant of the earldom of Chester, including Flintshire, in which grants various items have been recapitulated in the following manner: with the earldom, all lands, viz., the castles of Chester, Beeston, Rothlam, Flint, and Hope, and also the manors of Hope, Hopedale, and Forsham, with the cantred and lands of Englefield; together with the other estates in the counties of Chester, Flint, and elsewhere, belonging to the said earldom; "and the advowson of the cathedral church of St. Asaph, in Wales, and the avoidance, issues, and profits of the temporalities of the bishopricks of Chester and St. Asaph, aforesaid, together with all advowsons, pensions, portions, corrodiages, offices, prizes, customs, liberties, franchises, lordships, comots, hundreds, escheats, forfeitures, and hereditaments, unto the said earldom belonging." By the Statutum Walliæ it was, among other clauses, ordained, that the territory of Flint should, though not disjoined from that of Chester, be separately considered as to certain branches of jurisdiction. In this document we find the first mention of the viscomes, or sheriff, of Flint; and from this period it seems proper to date the origin of the shire or county of Flint. In the great rebellion under Owain Glyndwr, in the reign of Henry IV., great numbers of the men of Flintshire took up arms in favour of their valiant countryman, but on its suppression they were visited with no signal vengeance. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, this county was several times the scene of violence, but never of much bloodshed. Hawarden castle was seized by the parliamentarians at an early period of the struggle; but, in 1643, it was attacked and taken by a small body of royalists, under Lieutenant-Colonel Marrow, sent over from Ireland by the Duke of Ormonde, and who had landed near Mostyn. In this year also, Flint castle was closely besieged by the parliamentary forces under Sir William Brereton and Sir Thomas Myddelton, to whom it was at last surrendered on honourable terms, when the garrison was reduced to extremity. In March 1645, after a month's close siege, Hawarden castle was surrendered, by the king's order, to the parliamentary commander, Major-General Mytton. The same officer, in July of the following year, captured, after a short siege, the castle of Rhuddlan, which until then had been held by the royalists; and in August retook the castle of Flint, which had again fallen into their hands.

Flintshire is in the diocese and archdeaconry of St. Asaph, and in the province of Canterbury: the total number of parishes is thirty-two, of which eleven are rectories, twelve vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the five hundreds of Coleshill, Maelor, Mold, Prestatyn, and Rhuddlan. It contains the small city and newly-created borough of St. Asaph; the borough and sea-port towns of Flint and Rhuddlan; the newly-created boroughs and market towns of Holywell and Mold; and the boroughs of Caergwrle with Hope, Caerwys, and Overton. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire; and one representative for Flint and the seven other boroughs conjointly: the county member is nominated and elected at Flint, as also is the member for the boroughs: the polling-places under the late Reform Act are Flint and Rhuddlan. This county is included in the Chester circuit: the assizes and quarter sessions are held at Mold: the county gaol and house of correction, or bridewell, are at present at Flint; but a new county gaol, together with county courts, are about to be erected at Mold: there are twenty-four acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £25,513, and the expenditure to £25,428, of which £20,990 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The principal portion of Flintshire, though its boundary towards Denbighshire is extremely irregular, approaches in form to a narrow parallelogram, stretching along the south-western side of the river Dee, in its near approach towards the sea. The detached part of the hundred of Maelor (anciently called Maelor Saesneg, or "English Maelor," to distinguish it from the territory on the opposite side of the river Dee, called Maelor Gymraeg, or "Welsh Maelor," now included in the hundred of Bromfield, in Denbighshire,) is somewhat similar in form, but is broader in proportion to its length: this division extends into the spacious and fertile plain which also occupies the northern parts of Shropshire, the whole of Cheshire, and the southern parts of Lancashire; yet, nevertheless, its surface is varied by several fine heights, commanding rich and extensive prospects in every direction. The main body of the county is much diversified in feature, but its scenery, though frequently bold and striking, seldom assumes the character of wildness which prevails in other parts of the principality, where the mountains are of greater elevation. Some of the hills have on one side steep declivities; but they generally descend in gentle slopes into fertile vales, watered by pleasingly meandering streams. From the shores of the Dee the country immediately rises in fine swells, overspread with rich corn-fields and pastures, to the distance of three or four miles. Beyond this fertile tract, in the vicinity of Halkin, and nearly parallel with the distant shores of the river, runs a mountainous ridge, the upper parts of which have a sterile and dreary aspect, though containing valuable minerals; but the lower parts are agreeably varied with well-wooded dingles, through which the mountain streams find their way into the Dee. The north-western extremity of the county is flat and uninteresting, particularly towards the sea, but is highly productive of corn and grass. Eastward of the rich Vale of Clwyd, which extends north-eastward out of Denbighshire to the shore of this county, rises the elevated ridge of the Clwydian hills, the detached summits of which, named Moel Arthur, Moel Venlli, and Moel Vamma, are conspicuous objects at a very great distance. This chain commences at Dyserth, near the æstuary of the Dee, and passes through the parishes of Cwm, Tremerechion, Bôdvri, and Ysceiviog, to the valley of Nannerch, beyond which, the hills increasing in altitude, it soon enters Denbighshire, but runs for several miles south-eastward along the border of Flintshire towards the head of the Vale of Clwyd, where it forms a junction with the Llandegla and Brÿn-Eglwys hills. Heath, or ling, is the chief produce of the higher parts of these mountains, which can only be crossed through the ravines, called bwlechs, the roads through which ascend about two-thirds of the height of the mountains, excepting in the deep opening near Bôdvri, through which passes the road from Holywell to Denbigh. Strong and fertile argillaceous soils occupy those parts of the Vale of Clwyd which are included in this county, and the rich maritime districts in the northern part of it, and form some of the best wheat soils in North Wales, perhaps not inferior to any in Britain. The soil of the higher hills, the substrata of which are argillaceous, is shallow, and is composed of a mixture of clay and gravel, in which the former predominates. Light soils and free loams abound in various places, more particularly in the small valleys opening from the higher hills. Bordering on the great æstuary of the Dee lies a considerable tract of sandy land; and the soils above-mentioned are in some places variously intermixed with each other. Below the limestone hills there is an abundance of valuable marly soils, formed by the decay of that stone. A part of the Vale of Clwyd has its soils tinged by a reddish sandstone of loose texture.

In the mining districts agriculture is much neglected; but the fertility of the other parts of the county fully counterbalances this deficiency, and renders the agricultural produce of Flintshire adequate to its consumption. Upon light soils the Norfolk rotation of crops is most common; viz., first, wheat; second, turnips; third, barley; and fourth, clover: elsewhere the courses are very various. All the ordinary kinds of grain are cultivated: the wheat crops are most abundant in the maritime districts of Prestatyn, in the northern part of the county, where the returns average about nine or ten, and are occasionally fifteen, times the quantity of grain sown. Oats and barley are always mown, and sometimes wheat; but the latter is most frequently cut with the sickle. Peas are occasionally grown, but not to the extent that they formerly were. Turnips are sometimes cultivated, and potatoes commonly. The common artificial grasses are, red clover, rye-grass, and trefoil, the first sometimes for seed. Lucern is grown on about two hundred acres of the low sandy tracts bordering on the æstuary of the Dee, between Flint and Chester, and on a much smaller scale in several other situations: the produce in the first-mentioned place, when mown for fodder, is frequently very great. In the eastern parts of the county the grass lands are chiefly applied to the purposes of the dairy, the produce of which, in cheese and butter, is exported in great quantities to Chester: part of the cheese is like that of Cheshire, and the rest like that of Gloucester. The Vale of Clwyd, and the lands bordering on the Dee, in this county, comprise the greater part of the pastures of North Wales that are rich enough to fatten cattle. The artificial irrigation of meadows is generally practised in convenient situations. The most common manure is lime, which is obtained in the greatest abundance in almost every part of the county, and is frequently burned in sod-kilns on the field to be manured: marl is also used near places where it is found. The kind of plough in most common use is the "Lummas plough," which much resembles the Rotherham. The cattle of Flintshire are of a good size and superior kind, and of all varieties of colours: those bred in the maritime district, at its northern extremity, and thence along the borders of the Dee towards Cheshire, are remarkable for their aptitude to fatten. On the hills the sheep are of the common small highland breed; but in the enclosures are found various foreign breeds and crosses, more especially the South Down and Leicester sheep. In the dairy district the offal of the dairy, and the range of grass or clover fields, support numbers of hogs during summer, which, when they have cleared the stubbles after harvest, are sold off: they are generally of a middle size, have short ears, round and deep chests, and are commonly spotted, though sometimes all white. The draught horses of all kinds are for the most part bred within the county: they are generally either black or bay, strong, active, well made, and from fifteen to sixteen hands high. Various extensive plantations of timber trees occur in different parts of the county, and are sometimes of remarkably flourishing growth: some of the oak, sycamore, elm, ash, and bay trees in the woods near Bôdryddan, the seat of Mrs. Yonge; Mostyn, the seat of the Hon. Mr. Mostyn; and Downing, the seat of David Pennant, Esq., are of uncommon size and magnificence.

Although the waste lands are still of considerable extent, more particularly on the hills of Buckley and Halkin, yet they have been greatly lessened by various enclosures. Fen's heath, on the border of Shropshire, and Threap Wood, an extra-parochial waste, also in the hundred of Maelor, still remain open. In the year 1732, an act of parliament was procured, enabling the mayor and citizens of Chester to recover and preserve the navigation of the Dee; and another, in the year 1740, incorporating what has since been called "The River Dee Company," the latter of which, by the said acts and former ones of the 17th and 26th of George II., received, as a recompense for the expenses incurred in recovering and preserving the said navigation, a grant of all the white sands, or such as were then unproductive of herbage, within the æstuary of the Dee, from the walls of Chester to the extremity of Wirrall, on the Cheshire side, and to the Point of Air on that of Flintshire. One of the first acts of this company was to purchase, from the lord and freeholders of the manor of Hawarden, six hundred acres of waste marsh land, through which they cut a new channel for the Dee, by means of which, and several embankments made in the years 1754, 1763, 1769, and 1790, they gained three thousand one hundred acres of the sands, which are now covered, even the inner sides of the embankments, with good crops of corn, and lucern and other grasses: the whole of this redeemed tract has been incorporated into the township of Sealand, in the parish of Hawarden. There are yet between one and two thousand acres of unenclosed marshes on the æstuary of the Dee, in this county, the principal portion of which is in the vicinity of the towns of Flint and Holywell, and consists of land of the richest quality. Some of the principal enclosures have been, that of Saltney marsh, containing two thousand two hundred acres, under an act passed in 1778; that of Hope, comprising three thousand five hundred acres, under an act obtained in 1791; that of Mold, containing about four thousand acres, under an act passed in 1792; that of Kîlken, containing two thousand four hundred acres, under an act passed in 1793; and that of Ysceiviog, Nannerch, and Whitford, comprising about three thousand five hundred acres. In the parish of Llanasa, by an act passed in 1811, sixteen hundred acres of peculiarly rich land have been enclosed, of which twelve hundred were recovered from the sea, by an embankment, at an expense of £4000, which was defrayed by the freeholders. The waste of Mynydd Tegengle, in the parishes of Whitford and Ysceiviog, has also been enclosed; and the proprietors within the franchise of Rhuddlan obtained an act, in 1807, for the enclosure of their portion of the rich tract called Rhuddlan marsh. This great level, lying near the town of Rhuddlan, between St. Asaph and the sea, contains about twenty-seven thousand acres of a rich sandy loam, and extends westward into the adjoining county of Denbigh. The sea having made some destructive encroachments on Tywyn Abergele, a neighbouring waste, the proprietors of Rhuddlan marsh, to secure their own lands from inundation, at the end of the last century and the commencement of the present, formed, under the provisions of an act of parliament, an embankment varying in height and breadth, according to the force of the tide which it was designed to resist: five hundred acres were appointed by the act to be sold, towards defraying the expense incurred in forming this embankment, which it was estimated would cost, together with drainage, no less than £13,500. Coal, obtained from its own mines, is the common fuel of this county; but peat is burned in some places, and that which is obtained in Fens Moss, in the hundred of Maelor, is so soft as to require to be cast in moulds before it can be used: when it has dried and hardened, it becomes highly inflammable, and the moulded pieces are sold by the hundred chiefly to the people of Whitchurch and Wem, in the adjoining county of Salop.

The mineral productions of Flintshire are of great variety and importance, when compared with the small extent of its surface, and consist chiefly of coal, lead-ore, and calamine, with limestone, freestone, and various other kinds of stone. By far the greater part of it is included in the limestone tract of North Wales, the northern part of which enters the parish of Mold from the eastern part of Denbighshire, and in its progress north-westward occupies the western parts of it, and passes by Kilkenny, Halkin, Ysceiviog, and Caerwys, to the east of Tremerechion and Cwm, and to the west of Holywell, Whitford, and Llanasaph, including the whole of the parishes of Newmarket, Gwaenyscor, and Meliden, and terminating on the sea-shore, at Dyserth, in a bold promontory facing the north-west. To the east and north of the limestone tract are valuable coal measures, the geological position of which is over the calcareous beds, from which they dip, first eastward, towards the plain of Cheshire, and afterwards north-eastward, under the æstuary of the Dee, forming what the miners call a trough, and rising again on the Cheshire side of that river, in the peninsula of Wirrall. The coal tract extends from the parish of Llanasaph, or Llanasa, opposite the Point of Air, south-eastward through those of Whitford, Holywell, Flint, and Northop, into that of Hawarden, opposite to Chester. The thickness of several of the coal seams is remarkably great, being surpassed by none in the kingdom, except those near Wednesbury in Staffordshire; and few places in the island possess so great a quantity of coal within the same distance of the surface. A pit at Bychton, near Holywell, six hundred and fourteen feet deep, is sunk through twenty-seven different strata, of which twelve consist of coal varying in thickness from one to fifteen feet. The first of these is of the kind called cannel coal, which is also found in the Mostyn and Leeswood pits: at Bychton it is three feet thick, and rests immediately upon a bed of common coal, six feet thick: a stratum of the same species, fourteen inches thick, occurs at the depth of about three hundred and fourteen feet: the aggregate thickness of the whole series of seams is sixty-four feet eight inches, being equal to about one foot of coal in every nine feet depth. The dip of the strata of the whole formation is very considerable, varying from one yard in four to two yards in three. Although the thickest seam, towards the north-western extremity of the district, is as much as fifteen feet, yet at Hawarden, near Chester, it is only twelve feet. The strata alternating with the beds of coal consist chiefly of freestone and a dark-coloured shale, the latter of which decomposes on exposure to the atmosphere. The collieries of this county are mentioned in an official document so early as the reign of Edward I.: they formerly supplied Dublin and the northern coasts of Ireland, but the external demand has much diminished, and the measures are consequently worked on a much smaller scale: this change in the trade is attributable to the opening of numerous pits in Cumberland and Lancashire, more conveniently situated for the approach of ships; for the Dee, which was formerly navigable close to the shore of the parish of Whitford, has changed its deep channel to the opposite side of the æstuary, and at present only sloops and small brigs can approach within two miles of the same place. The principal coal mines are in the vicinities of Northop, Mold, Flint, Bagillt near Holywell, and Bychton and Mostyn in the parish of Whitford. The calcareous strata of the south-western side of the county afford lime of excellent quality, and in many places assume the appearance of marble of different kinds, susceptible of a high polish: a variety of the latter, of a deep grey colour, when calcined and mixed with a certain quantity of common lime, forms an excellent cement for works under water. On the eastern side the limestone strata change into a mixed siliceous stone, of various degrees of fineness, called chert; beyond this occurs a dark-coloured friable shale, and, afterwards, freestone of excellent quality for building, with subjacent coal strata: the chert is used in the manufacture of porcelain and delf ware, large quantities of it being quarried and sent to the Staffordshire and Shropshire potteries. The change in the nature of the strata is more particularly abrupt and remarkable in the Vale of Nannerch, one side of which is formed by limestone rocks, and the other by ledges of shivery shale; and in the dingle to the south of the mansion of Talacre, where the coal measures end, one side being freestone of the finest quality, and the other chert and limestone, the metalliferous strata of the country. The chert is seldom above forty yards deep, but the limestone is of unknown depth, and both, in common with the shale, abound with ores of lead, calamine, and another combination of zinc, which, in some processes, serves as a substitute for calamine, and is called by the miners "black-jack."

Flintshire is thought to produce as much lead-ore as all the rest of Wales; but it is very difficult to ascertain the precise quantity, some being exported for the purpose of blending, and other ores imported for the same purpose, while the registers of the custom-house at Chester make no clear distinction between the produce of this county and that of Denbigh. Most of the works are called "Rakes," and are carried to various depths, from twenty to one hundred and fifty yards. The veins run in opposite directions, from north to south, and from east to west; but the ore obtained from those running in the former direction is of inferior quality, as it contains no silver, or so small a quantity as not to be worth extracting. The ores are of various kinds: the common lamellated "potters' ore," so called because it is used in glazing earthenware, yields, on an average, from fourteen to sixteen hundred-weight of lead per ton; the brown, or grey, lapideous ore, called by the miners caulk, yields from five to eleven hundred-weight per ton; and "gravel ore" is of nearly the same quality as the potters' ore, and is found in what the miners call flats, that is, loose strata of sand and stones, and consists of masses, rounded by attrition, of various sizes, from that of a hazel nut to pieces weighing several tons. The quantity of silver contained in these different ores is very various: when, on assaying, they are found to contain ten ounces per ton, this quantity is considered worth the trouble and expense of extracting; sometimes the produce is sixteen ounces per ton. Some of the richest and most productive mines are those in the vicinities of Halkin, Kilkenny, and Mold, the great Holywell Level, and Milwr mine, to the east of Holywell, which now yields more than any other in the county. Talar Gôch mine, at Dyserth, which belongs to the see of St. Asaph, the Earl of Plymouth, &c., affords rich ores of both lead and zinc. The working of two large and valuable lead mines at Llŷn y Pandy, near Mold, has been greatly obstructed by the waters of the river Alyn, in the subterraneous part of its course. Near the sites of ancient British smelting-hearths, fragments of lead-ore have been collected, to the amount of many tons. Lapis calaminaris is raised in large quantities, more particularly in the eastern part of the limestone district, being generally found in a matrix of limestone, or chert, more especially the former, in which it is peculiar to the kind called "flummary stone:" its colour is various, being occasionally yellow, green, red, brown, and black: it is also of various texture and solidity, some being reticulated like corroded bones, and one kind resembling indurated wax: all that is not required for the Holywell brass-manufactories is sent by inland water carriage to Cheadle and Macclesfield, and by water to Bristol. The other ore of zinc, called sulphate of zinc, blende, or black-jack, is also very abundant, and is sometimes raised to be used in the making of ingots and bell-metal, or to be reduced to speltre, or regulus of zinc: it has naturally a blueish grey metallic appearance. A north and south vein, running through the parishes of Mold and Kilken, and consisting chiefly of fluor spar, breaks every vein that it crosses, without being itself interrupted or deranged by any, for which reason the miners have given it the name of the "gallop-hell vein." Barytes, united with vitriolic acid, occurs at Cevn Meiriadog, near St. Asaph, and with carbonic acid, between St. Asaph and Holywell, where it is the matrix both of the sulphate of zinc and that of lead. Marl, which appears to be a deposit of dissolved limestone, abounds in all the valleys contiguous to the limestone tract: clayey marl is most abundant in the eastern part of the county, and that of an indurated quality near the centre of it, in the neighbourhood of Flint. Petroleum, or mineral oil, is often found in the limestone strata, and is used for medicinal purposes: by the Welsh it is called menyn y tylwyth teg, or "fairies' butter." Varieties of the carbonate of lime, such as regularly formed spars, stalactites, and coarse mineral agaric, are found at Fordden, near Caerwys; and amethystine spar exists on Halkin mountain. The principal extraneous fossils are impressions of leaves of the fern species, found in the collieries of Leeswood, in the parish of Mold, and in the black shale incumbent on the coal in other works of the same kind. A great portion of the mineral districts, formerly constituting part of the royal possessions, was alienated from the crown, in the reign of Charles I., in favour of Sir Richard Grosvenor, who obtained a grant of all the mines, or rakes, of lead within the hundreds of Coleshill and Rhuddlan, which, prior to that period, had been divided into different lots, and let out on leases for a term of years. Although the surface of the extensive waste called Halkin Mountain is commonable land, yet its vast mineral treasures are, by virtue of this grant, the property of the present Marquis of Westminster, as descendant of Sir Richard.

A great part of the population of the county is engaged in raising its mineral treasures, whilst several are employed in manufacturing its metallic ores. On the stream which runs from Holywell into the æstuary of the Dee are, extensive works for the manufacture of culinary utensils, and other articles of brass; and various copper-works, at which are manufactured copper plates, or sheets, for the bottoms of ships, and for exportation to China, to be used in the drying of teas, also copper bolts, nails, rudder bands, braces, &c., and copper wire: the copper used in these works is chiefly obtained from the Parys Mountain and Mona mines, in Anglesey; and numerous vessels are employed in the carriage of the raw and manufactured articles, the latter of which are shipped for Liverpool. Flintshire also contains four extensive cotton-manufactories, situated on the Holywell stream, and belonging to the "Holywell Cotton Company," in which about one thousand persons are employed: there is a fifth at Mold, but it is not at present in operation. Near Coed-Eulo, in the parish of Hawarden, are various extensive potteries, where are manufactured considerable quantities of coarse earthenware, which is chiefly sent coastwise, as far as Swansea, or exported to Ireland; and fire-bricks and tiles, from clunch, a species of indurated clay, which is here found in vast beds: some of the bricks, called bearers, weigh from one to two hundred-weight, and are used for lining the lead smelting furnaces, in which they are set, not in mortar, but in a cement formed of the same kind of fire clay, as that of which they are composed. The Nottingham brown earthenware, and other species of pottery, are made near Mold. At Bagillt, near Flint, the manufacture of ropes for shipping, and for the use of the colliers and miners, is carried on. Sal ammoniac is extracted from the offal of the Chester slaughter-houses, on Saltney marsh, near Flint; and pyrolignous acid from brushwood, at Hope, for the use of the cotton dyers. Notwithstanding that this county possesses so considerable an extent of sea-coast, its harbours are small, and its maritime commerce comparatively unimportant. At the mouth of the Clwyd is the port of Rhuddlan, at the Vorryd, where small vessels lie to take in corn, timber, and other produce of the interior; and more grain is shipped at this place than at all the other ports of North Wales collectively. The vessels trading to and from the brass and copper works, near Holywell, are loaded, or their cargoes discharged, on the shores of the æstuary of the Dee, at only a very short distance from them. A few small vessels also trade to Flint; and, when the weather permits, small packets sail from that town every day for Parkgate and Chester. On the shore of the township of Coed-Eulo a strong pier, or jetty, was constructed, about the commencement of the present century, which, projecting into the channel of the river Dee, forms a place of shelter in case of adverse winds, or boisterous weather, for vessels trading to Chester. Great quantities of limestone, quarried in the hills about Caergwre, are burned on the spot, and, for the most part, conveyed into Cheshire. Most of the wool produced in the county is sold, at Chester, to the clothiers of the North of England. The chief exports, however, are, ores of lead, zinc, and copper, and manufactured copper and brass, chert for the English potteries, fire-bricks, butter, cheese, and bacon. The chief article of importation, besides ordinary shop goods, is that of copper, from the Isle of Anglesey, to be manufactured near Holywell.

The principal rivers are the Dee, the Clwyd, and the Alyn. The Dee first touches this county in its course northward along the eastern confines of Denbighshire, where, for several miles, it bounds the detached portion of it on the west : almost immediately below Chester it reaches the main body of the county, through a low marshy portion of which is carried its modern artificial channel, which terminates within four miles of Flint, in the great æstuary of the old channel: this extends from within a few miles of Chester, north-westward, to its termination in the Irish sea, between the extremity of Wirrall, in Cheshire, and the Point of Air in Flintshire, forming the north-eastern boundary of the latter county throughout its whole length: this river is navigable for vessels of considerable burden up to Chester; and at high water its æstuary forms a noble arm of the sea, but at its ebb it dwindles into a narrow and insignificant stream, winding its way through vast dreary wastes of sand and ooze. The Clwyd enters the western part of the county from Denbighshire, near Bôdvari, and, pursuing a north-easterly course, soon reaches St. Asaph, immediately below which city it is joined, from the south-west, by the powerful stream of the Elwy: hence, gradually increasing in breadth, it flows majestically through the rich marsh of Rhuddlan, by the ancient borough of that name, about three miles below which it falls into the Irish sea, through a small æstuary opening northward, and bounded on the east by the north-western extremity of Flintshire, and on the west by the north-easternmost point of Denbighshire: this river is navigable up to Rhuddlan quay for flat-bottomed boats of about seventy tons' burden, and at its mouth forms a port, which is frequented by small coasting vessels. The Alyn enters across the southern confines of the county, and takes a northerly course in the vicinity of Mold, round which town it makes an extensive sweep, and turns southward through Hopedale; afterwards, pursuing an easterly direction, it quits Flintshire near Caergwrle, in its further progress to the Dee: near Mold this river has a subterranean passage for the distance of rather less than a mile. Excellent materials for the making and repairing of roads being every where abundant, those of Flintshire are for the most part very good. The mail-coach road from London to Holyhead, by Chester, enters the county from the latter city, and runs the whole length of it, passing through Northop, Holywell, and St. Asaph, to Abergele in Denbighshire. From Northop a branch passes through Caerwys, and rejoins the main line at St. Asaph; while from Holywell there is another branch through Newmarket and Rhuddlan, which again reaches the main road at Abergele, in Denbighshire: from Northop a third branch passes through Denbigh, and regains the main road at Aberconway.

This county contains numerous interesting relics of antiquity. Various remains of the Romans, such as coins, hypocausts, fibulæ, &c., have been found in the vicinities of Flint, Caergwrle, Caerwys, and Holywell. In the neighbourhoods of Flint and Caergwrle are found great quantities of scoria, supposed to be the refuse from Roman smelting-hearths. On the hill called Garreg, near the village of Whitford, on the æstuary of the Dee, is a circular tower, conjectured to have been a Roman pharos, or lighthouse. In a field below the town of Caerwys stood formerly a stone, bearing a Latin inscription, which was removed to the gardens at Downing; but a tumulus yet remains near its former site, and there are various others scattered in the vicinity. In the neighbourhood of Hope may be traced, in several places, the remains of two ancient roads, one pointing towards Hawarden, and the other towards Mold. Roman intrenchments are yet visible in the vicinity of Bôdvari, the ancient Varis, and in one or two other places. Truman-Hill, and several other heights in the neighbourhood of Hawarden, are crowned with British encampments; and on Moel Arthur, a lofty summit of the Clwydian hills, is a strong fortification of British construction. On an elevation opposite to that on which are situated the ruins of the castle of Caergwrle is a British fortified post, called Caer Estyn, formed by a ditch and rampart. In the parish of Whitford there is a singular monument, consisting of an ancient sculptured obelisk, twelve feet high, called Maen Chwyvan, or "the stone of lamentation:" near it are several tumuli, called Y Gorseddau, or "the Sessions." Another curiously ornamented column, of unknown antiquity, stands in the cemetery of Dyserth. Various remains of Offa's Dyke are yet visible in this county, through the whole of which, with the exception of a short distance of about three miles, its course has recently been traced, from the place where it enters, near Hope, to its termination near Prestatyn. Nearly parallel with this ancient line of demarcation extends a similar work, called Wat's Dyke, which also traverses the entire county, in a direction from north-west to south-east. Commencing on the shores of the Dee, below the abbey of Basingwerk, it passes through "the strand fields," near Holywell, and by Cevn y Coed, Nant y Flint, Coed y llŷs, Brŷn-moel, Northop mills, Monachlog near Northop, and Mynydd Sychdyn, beyond which it enters Molesdale, near its lower extremity, and runs along the side of it by Hopechurch to Rhŷdin, beyond which it almost immediately enters the eastern part of Denbighshire, across which it pursues a southerly course, nearly parallel with Offa's Dyke. By all early historians these two lines of demarcation have been confounded with each other; and respecting the formation of Wat's Dyke there is no authentic record, and hardly even a conjecture. At the time of the Reformation there were, at Basingwerk, a Cistercian abbey; and at Rhuddlan, a house of Black friars: the famous monastery at Bangor-Iscoed was entirely in ruins at the time of the Norman Conquest. There are yet extensive and curious remains of the abbey of Basingwerk, and some smaller ruins of the house of the Knights Templar at the same place. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the cathedral and parish church of St. Asaph; in the church of Kilken, which is chiefly remarkable for its fine carved roof; and in those of Hanmer, Mold, and Overton. An ancient and curious chapel adjoins St. Winifred's well, at Holywell. In this border county, so often the scene of conflict between the encroaching power of England and the patriotic valour of the Welsh, the fortified residences were numerous. There are extensive and picturesque remains of the castles of Caergwrle, Dyserth, Ewloe, Flint, Hawarden, and Rhuddlan. Mansions of rather ancient erection and antiquated appearance are numerous: the most remarkable are, Bôdryddan, the residence of Mrs. Yonge; Golden Grove, that of Captain Morgan; Mostyn, that of Edward M. Lloyd Mostyn, Esq; Nerquis Hall, that of Miss Gifford; Pentre-Hobyn, that of T. Trevor Mather, Esq.; Plâs Têg, that of — Roper, Esq.; and Rhual, that of Fred. Philips, Esq. Among the modern seats most worthy of notice are, Bôdelwyddan, the residence of Sir J. Williams, Bart.; Bronwylva, that of Sir H. Browne; Brynbella, that of John Price, Esq.; Bryn y Pys, that of F. R. Price, Esq.; Cevn, that of Edward Lloyd, Esq.; Downing, that of David Pennant, Esq.; Emral, that of Sir Richard Puleston, Bart.; Gredington, that of Lord Kenyon; Gwernhayled, that of P. Lloyd Fletcher, Esq.; Gyrn, that of J. Douglas, Esq.; Halkin Castle, a seat of the Marquis of Westminster; Hanmer Hall, that of Sir John Hanmer, Bart.; Hawarden Castle, that of Sir S. R. Glynne, Bart.; Leeswood, that of I. W. Eyton, Esq.; Pengwern, that of Lord Mostyn; Talacre, that of Sir Edward Mostyn, Bart.; the Palace and Deanery of St. Asaph; and the Vicarage-house of Northop. Most of the better class of houses are built of the freestone of the coal measures. Although farm-houses and their appendages upon improved plans are common, yet many are extremely mean. The cottages are generally clean and comfortable, and built of the substantial materials of the district. The common fences are quickset hedges, for making which great quantities of hawthorn-sets are grown by nurserymen. The farmers and labourers are generally allowed to enjoy the advantage of superior family fare to that of the same classes in the other counties of North Wales. In those parts of Flintshire which adjoin Cheshire, servants hired by the year begin their term of service on the 1st of January; in other districts, on the 1st of May. At Rhuddlan, at the lower extremity of the Vale of Clwyd, labourers formerly met together on the Sunday morning, and were hired by the neighbouring farmers for the following week; but this is now done on the Monday morning, and the wages given at Rhuddlan regulate those of the two hundreds of Rhuddlan and Prestatyn. On the banks of the river Alyn, in the domain called Rhŷdin, near Caergwrle, are two saline springs, formerly much resorted to for the medicinal properties of their waters, which were considered particularly efficacious in the cure of scorbutic affections. At the bottom of the hill on which stands the town of Holywell is St. Winifred's Well, one of the most powerful springs in the island, emitting about one hundred and twenty tons of water per minute: the strong ebullition caused by this discharge keeps in continual suspension pebbles of an ounce in weight: the stream issuing from this fountain enters the æstuary of the Dee at a marshy spot, at the distance of one mile and two hundred and thirty-four yards from its source, having in that short course given motion to eleven mills of complex machinery: the supposed healing efficacy of this copious spring, and its pretended miraculous origin, formerly attracted numerous pilgrims to Holywell, and the legend connected with it is related in the account of that place.

FLORENCE (ST.), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Tenby, containing 350 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on a gentle eminence in the centre of a fertile vale, sheltered on one side by the northern declivity of the Ridgeway between Pembroke and Tenby. The village forms one of the most cheerful and interesting objects in the delightful ride from Tenby to Pembroke. Many of the cottages, which are grouped in pleasing clusters around the church, are of ancient appearance, and coeval with the castles in the vicinity, having been built by the first generations of the Flemings who settled in this part of the principality, in the reign of Henry I., by permission of that monarch, when driven from their own country by an inundation of the sea. Attached to the cottages are spacious gardens, and the lands in the immediate vicinity are more richly wooded than in almost any other part of the surrounding country. The scenery is agreeably diversified, and the whole appearance of this interesting spot is highly picturesque. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's: the former is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £16.12.1., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge; the latter, which is discharged, is rated at £4.18.4., is endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector: the bishop formerly collocated to the vicarage. The church, dedicated to St. Florence, is a massive cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square tower: on the north side of the altar is a mural tablet of brass, with a Latin epitaph, in choriambic verse, to the memory of Robert Rudd, A.B., formerly archdeacon of St. David's, who was ejected from his benefice in the reign of Charles I., for his adherence to the cause of that monarch, and died in October 1648. There is a place of worship for Independents. In connexion with the established church is a Sunday school, supported by subscription, which is attended by nearly all the children of the parish; and a school, supported by the dissenters, is held in a school-house belonging to the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £126.7.

FORCHAMMAN (FORCH-AMAN), a hamlet in the parish of ABERDARE, within the limits of the new borough of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. This hamlet takes its name from the Amman stream, which here falls into the river Cynon, on the right bank of which it is situated. The population is almost exclusively agricultural. Aberhaman House is a pleasing mansion, surrounded by well-grown trees, and seated in a vale between the road leading to Aberdare and the river Cynon: it was for centuries the seat of the family of Matthews, and was sold by a descendant to the late Anthony Bacon, Esq., of Benham, in the county of Berks.

FORD, a chapelry in the parish of HAYSCASTLE, hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest. The population is included in the return for the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of — Knox, Esq. This chapelry comprises a small tract lying at the north-eastern extremity of the parish, on the western bank of the Cleddy river, where it is joined by another small stream, and on the high road between Haverfordwest and Fishguard.

FORDEN, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Montgomery, containing 856 inhabitants. The Danes are said to have stationed themselves in this neighbourhood in the year 894, and to have been driven from it by the Saxons, after a long siege and severe conflict: their encampments are still visible on the Long Mountain and near Buttington. This mountain, called by the Welsh Mynydd, or Cevn Digoll, is partly included in this parish, and is remarkable as the scene of the last struggle of the Welsh for independence. After the death of Llewelyn, the inhabitants of North Wales rallied under the banner of his illegitimate son, Madoc, who assembled a considerable army, and obtained signal victories over the invaders, at Carnarvon, near Denbigh, at Knockin, and again in the marches: at length, having ventured hither to engage with the united forces of the lords marcher, his troops were routed, after an obstinate conflict, in 1294. Upon the same mountain, Henry Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., mustered his partisans from Shropshire and North Wales, and found every man who had promised to support him true to his appointment; on which account the Welsh have called it Digoll, signifying "without loss." The House of Industry for the united district of Montgomery and Welshpool is situated in this parish: this district, which is about eighteen miles square, comprises the parishes of Montgomery, Welshpool (except the township of Cyfronnydd, which supports its own poor), Berriew, Llandyssil, Llanmerewig, and Forden; and the townships of Cletterwood and Hope, in the parish of Buttington; those of Leighton and Trellystan, in the chapelry of Wolstonnyend, otherwise Wolston; that of Aston, in the parish of Lydham; and that of Castlewright, in the parish of Mainstone; all in the county of Montgomery; and the parishes of Worthen and Chirbury, in the county of Salop, and of Churchstoke, in the counties of Montgomery and Salop. These places were united, and formed into one entire district, for the better relief and employment of the poor, by an act passed in the 32nd of George III.; and certain persons described therein were incorporated, under the style of "The Guardians of the Poor of the parishes of Montgomery and Pool, and the parishes, chapelries, and townships united therewith, in the counties of Montgomery and Salop," some of whom were appointed directors, and certain regulations were established for effecting the purposes of the act: additional powers were granted to the corporation in the 36th of George III., and again in the 5th of George IV. The management of the interests of the establishment is vested in twenty-four directors, chosen from the body of guardians, eight of whom retire annually, and are succeeded by others: there are also honorary directors, besides the bailiffs of the boroughs of Montgomery and Welshpool. The domestic concerns are managed by a steward and matron, under the superintendence of a committee, which meets once a week: there are also a chaplain, treasurer, clerk, and other officers. The building, which is capable of affording accommodation to one thousand persons, is a plain substantial edifice of brick, erected in 1795, at an expense of upwards of £12,000: it stands within a plot of ground measuring thirty acres, and occupies three sides of a square, of which the front is three hundred and sixty feet in length. There is a neat chapel, in length fifty-seven feet and a half, and in breadth thirty-six feet, with a burial-ground attached. The male inmates able to labour were generally employed in husbandry, upon a farm belonging to the institution, and the females in knitting; but the farm was given up about three years ago, and at present there are but few inmates, a new system of relieving the paupers in their own houses having been adopted, keeping in the house only such as are unable to labour: there is a school for the children. The sessions for the lower division of the hundred of Cawrse are held at the Church House at Forden, twice a year.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Wardens of the Grocers' Company, to whom the great tithes belong. The church, which is situated about half a mile to the west of the road from Welshpool to Montgomery, is built in the ancient style of English architecture, and was enlarged in 1830, with the addition of one hundred and seventy sittings, one hundred and ten of them free, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels granted £100: fifty free sittings had been previously provided. The font, which is of marble, and of an oval form, was presented to the parish, in 1794, by Richard Edmunds, Esq., at whose expense also the arms of England, exquisitely carved in wood, coloured and gilt, were put up on the north side of the chancel. This church was, for between three and four centuries, the burial-place of the family of Devereux, Viscounts Hereford, whose estate of Nanteribba is situated in this parish. There is a place of worship for Independents. Edward Lewis, in 1675, devised £20 per annum, arising from an estate in the adjoining parish of Chirbury in Shropshire, for the instruction of children of that parish and Forden. A Sunday school has been established, in connexion with the church. The sum of £100 was given by a member of the family of Devereux, for apprenticing two poor children annually. There are various remains of antiquity in the parish. In the township of Thornbury, near the banks of the Severn, are vestiges of a Roman rectangular encampment, called the Gaer, from which the course of an ancient road may be traced, in the parishes of Llandyssil, Llanmerewig, Newtown, and Penstrywed, to Caer-Sws, formerly an important Roman city, in the parish of Llanwnnog. That ancient line of demarcation, Offa's Dyke, passes through the townships of Hem and Wropton; and within two hundred yards of it, near Nanteribba, on the road from Welshpool to Montgomery, rises a vast conoidal rock, upon which, on clearing away the surface, about the middle of the last century, the remains of a fort were discovered: it appeared to have been of a square form, probably with a round tower at each angle, of which part of the south-eastern one still remains: the walls are about three feet high, and seven feet seven inches in thickness, and the area within is nine feet in diameter. The base of the rock is surrounded by a trench, cut through it, leaving only a narrow entrance to the fort. The history of this place is involved in total oblivion: it was probably a fortification of considerable importance, as it commanded the line of Offa's Dyke, and the vales of Severn, Montgomery, and Chirbury: at a short distance from it there is another intrenchment. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £395. 15.

FOREST, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $10\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Hay, containing 134 inhabitants. This hamlet consists of the southern portion of that elevated range, called the Black mountains, which separates Brecknockshire from Monmouthshire and a detached district of Herefordshire. Talgarth mountain, in this hamlet, is two thousand four hundred and forty-five feet above the level of the sea; and upon another elevated hill near it, termed Gader, or the Chair, are loose stone circles, evidently Druidical, shaped as an irregular triangle, with a large stone for an apex, the whole about sixty feet in circumference. Other similar constructions are found within a short distance on the southern declivity of this mountain. The remains of Dinas castle are also situated in this hamlet. They occupy the summit of a detached and conical hill at the foot of the Black mountains, and consist at present of little more than the foundations, the castle having been destroyed, as is supposed, by the natives of Sir David Gam's party, in opposition to those of Owain Glyndwr's. This hamlet is wild and dreary in its aspect, affording, in general, only scanty herbage to the mountain sheep.

FOREST, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANYCRWYS which is in the upper division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from Lampeter, containing 226 inhabitants. There are traces still discernible, in two places near the small river Twrch, of the Roman road called Sarn Helen, which passed through this hamlet, at a short distance from the church, in a direction from Loventium, now Llanio in Cardiganshire, to the station at Llanvair ar y brŷn, near Llandovery.

FOREST, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDINGAT which is in the higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Llandovery, containing 206 inhabitants, who are exclusively employed in agriculture. It is situated on the left bank of the Towy, and occupies a part of the district lying between that river and the Brân. A bridge crosses the Towy here, and the road from Llandovery to Trêgaron passes along its left bank. This hamlet is in general well wooded.

FOREST, a hamlet in the parish of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, partly within the limits of the new borough of that name, and partly in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet forms a mountainous and partially wooded district between two branches of the river Tâf, at the western base of which runs the road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil, after crossing the bridge over the eastern or Bargoed Tâf: a rail-road also passes from that town along the left bank of the Tâf Vawr river, and, after crossing it, joins the canal opposite to the Quakers' Yard, in the parish of Gellygaer.

FREYSTROP, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. by E.) from Haverfordwest, on the road by Pembroke Ferry to Pembroke, comprising the divisions of Higher and Lower Freystrop, and containing 636 inhabitants. Within the limits of this parish is situated Clareston, an elegant modernized mansion, the seat of George Clayton Roch, Esq., which was originally the residence of the family of Powel, and came by marriage to the ancestors of the present proprietor; it is pleasantly situated, and the grounds are well laid out. The lands are almost entirely in a state of good cultivation, and the soil is tolerably fertile. Culm is found in abundance, and is principally worked on the estates of Sir Herbert Packington and Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Barts., and shipped, for the supply of the neighbouring districts, at Hook Quay on the river Cleddy. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5.13.9., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural feature. There is a place of worship for Methodists. A spring, the water of which crosses the turnpike road, and is strongly impregnated with iron, is called by the villagers the Red Water, from the colour of its deposit. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £117.7.

GAER, a township in the parish of CASTLE-CAER-EINION, but within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool, locally situated in the lower division of the hundred of Mathraval, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W.) from Welshpool. The population is returned with the parish.

GARN, a joint hamlet with Derwydd, in the parish of LLANDEBYE, upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is included in the return for the parish. It lies on the right bank, and near the head, of the river Loughor.

GARN, a township in the parish of LLANVAWR, hundred of PENLLŷN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish.

GARTH, a joint township with Ystrad, in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the banks of the river Teivy, containing, with Ystrad, 110 inhabitants, who are exclusively engaged in agriculture.

GARTH, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVABON, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 577 inhabitants. The parochial church is situated in this hamlet, which forms the western portion of the parish. It has much elevated ground, rising above the left bank of the Tâf, the western base of which is skirted by that river and the canal and road from Merthyr-Tydvil to Cardiff, which run within a few yards of each other. The river and canal are crossed by bridges on the road to Aberdare; and immediately adjoining, the canal is conveyed over the Tâf by a well-executed aqueduct. Many respectable residences lie scattered in different parts of the hamlet. A rail-road extends from the canal here across the road, near the Navigation House, and up the vale between this hamlet and the parish of Gellygaer, to some collieries in the neighbourhood.

GARTH, a hamlet in the parish and newly-created borough of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. It extends close to the town of Merthyr-Tydvil, the road from that place to Abergavenny passing through it over Blaen Rumney common, and is principally inhabited by the numerous workmen employed at the extensive manufactories in the former town, and the coal mines in its neighbourhood. The remains of Morlais castle, a more detailed account of which is given in the article on the parish, and the modern mansion of Cyvarthva castle, with its park, are both situated in this hamlet, which is well wooded on the banks of the Lesser Tâf. Immediately below the ruins of Morlais castle this river, which foams impetuously over its rocky bed, is crossed by Pont Sarn, a picturesque bridge thrown over a chasm fringed with underwood, thirty feet in breadth. In the limestone rock a little above this bridge is a hollow, called Dryford cavern, into which a spring falls from above, and in times of flood flows over, forming a picturesque cascade.

GARTH, a township in the parish of GUILDSFIELD, hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Welshpool. The population is returned with the parish. It lies contiguous to the village of Guildsfield, on the south-west, and a part of it is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool. There are many respectable residences in different parts of the township, the principal of which is an elegant modern mansion, erected in the early style of English architecture, by the late Rev. Richard Mytton, at an expense amounting to nearly £100,000.

GARTH-BEIBIO, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, on the road from Welshpool to Machynlleth, Dôlgeley, &c., 9 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llanvair, containing 342 inhabitants. This place derives its name from Garth, a ness, or promontory, and Peibio, the name of some chieftain, of whom nothing is known. The parish contains about one thousand six hundred acres of land enclosed and under cultivation, and nine hundred acres unenclosed: it is situated between the rivers Twrch and Banwy, which unite just below the church: peat is procured within its limits. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is an ancient structure, dedicated to St. Tydecho. Near it is St. Tydecho's well, constructed for a cold bath, the water being considered efficacious in rheumatic and other disorders: formerly every one who bathed in the well, or drank the water, dropped a pin into it, and it was deemed sacrilege to take any of them out. Divers bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor, but they are of very small amount. There are several cairns in the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £91. 12.

GARTHBRENGY, or GALLT-BRENGY, (GARTH-BRENGI), a parish partly in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, and partly in that of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Brecknock, on the road to Builth, containing 163 inhabitants. This small parish, which constitutes a prebend in the Collegiate Church of Christ at Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Honddŷ, in a retired part of the county, the scenery of which is pleasingly varied; the banks of the Honddŷ present many wooded knolls, which have a beautifully picturesque appearance. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Garthbrenvy in the Collegiate Church of Brecknock. The church, dedicated to St. David, is situated on an eminence, which is overlooked on the north by a mountain of loftier elevation: it is an ancient structure, with a tower at the western end, containing four small bells: the body consists of a nave and a north aisle of equal breadth: the roof is panelled, and the interior is appropriately arranged for the use of the parishioners. There is neither parsonage-house nor any glebe land attached to the living: the tithes of the parish are appropriated to the prebendary, by whom they are let at a reserved rent. Sir David Gam, who so gloriously distinguished himself in the battle of Agincourt, was probably a native of this parish, in which he passed the early years of his life, on an estate called Peytyn-gwyn, the mansion on which was burned to the ground by Owain Glyndwr, during the insurrection headed by this chieftain, who justly regarded David as his personal enemy. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £75. 18.

GARTHELI, a chapelry in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 216 inhabitants. This chapelry contains several respectable residences, and is situated on elevated ground above the Vale of the Aëron, with the Meiric brook flowing into the Teivy at the bottom, over which the prospects are pleasing and picturesque. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Perpetual Curate of Llandewy-Brevi. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £51. 5.

GARTHEWIN, a township in that part of the parish of LLANVAIR-TALHAIRN which is in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Abergele. The population is returned with the parish. It lies on the western bank of the small river Elwy, and contains an elegant mansion of its own name, the seat of R. W. Wynne, Esq., a younger branch of the Wynnes of Melai, which commands a beautiful view of the rich but narrow vale of Elwy, environed by well-wooded hills, stretching out before it: the park is nearly three miles in length, and abounds with full-grown oaks.

GARTHGARMON, a parochial chapelry in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Llanrwst. The population is returned with the parish of Llanrwst. This chapelry, which comprises a considerable extent of rugged and barren hills, contains lead-ore, but the works for procuring it have been discontinued of late years. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The chapel, dedicated to St. Germanus, is of very ancient foundation: the present edifice was built in 1789, near the site of a former chapel, which had fallen into decay, and the burial-ground at the same time was considerably enlarged. Thomas Wynne, Esq., of Llwynon, in 1677, gave to the minister a house called Llannerch Côch, with land, garden, and out-buildings, requiring him to teach ten poor children in the chapel; but there is no evidence on record that his injunctions were ever complied with. In addition to this, the minister receives a stipend of £20 per annum from the incumbent of Llanrwst, pursuant to act of parliament; although, as regards the performance of ecclesiastical rites, the chapel is entirely independent of the mother church of Llanrwst.

GARTHGYNYD (GARTH-GYNNUD), a hamlet in the parish of GELLYGAER, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 129 inhabitants. This hamlet occupies a portion of the bleak and barren elevated ground between the rivers Romney and the Bargoed Tâf.

GELLIDEG (GELLI-DÊG), a hamlet in the parish and newly-created borough of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the right bank of the Tâf Vawr, and is principally inhabited by the workmen employed at Merthyr-Tydvil. The Cardiff canal passes along its eastern boundary, close to, and parallel with, the Tâf Vawr river; and there are some well-wooded enclosures scattered over its surface.

GELLUDIE (GELLI-DDÛ), a joint hamlet with Cynnullmawr-Llwynswch, in the parish of LLANDAROG, upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (E. by S.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated on the right bank, and near the source, of the Gwendraeth Vechan river; and to the north lies the splendid demesne of Middleton Hall, the numerous beauties of which contribute greatly to adorn the scenery, and are viewed in harmonious design from this place. At Porth y rhŷd there was formerly an ancient chapel.

GELLY, a hamlet in the parish of VAINOR, hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. by E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 248 inhabitants. This hamlet, the name of which signifies "the Grove," is situated on the right bank of the Tâf Vechan river, and exhibits some pleasing and well-wooded scenery. The parish church is situated within its limits; and there is a rustic bridge called Pont Sarn, crossing the Lesser Tâf, over a chasm thirty feet in height.

GELLYGAER (GELLI-GAER), a parish in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. E. by S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 1825 inhabitants. This extensive parish derives its name, signifying "the fortress of the hazel grove," from an ancient fortification contained within its limits, which by some writers is supposed to be of Roman origin; and this opinion is in a great degree confirmed, not only by the form of the camp, but also by numerous remains of masonry, and other vestiges of Roman occupation, which may still be discerned near the spot. Though apparently of considerable importance in ancient times, little is known of the early history of this place, prior to the Conquest. Soon after that period, the Norman settlers, upon whom Robert Fitz-Hamon had conferred the various tracts of country which he wrested from the Welsh in this part of the principality, attempted to extend their possessions; for which object, about the close of the eleventh century, they invaded the province of Gower, expecting to make an easy conquest of it. To oppose this aggression, the Welsh rose in great force, and, encouraged by some previous successes, gave the invaders battle, and gained a decisive victory over them. The Normans, defeated in this attempt, and intimidated by the increasing numbers of the Welsh, had recourse to England for assistance; and being reinforced by Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, and other English commanders, they returned to the attack. The Welsh, feigning a retreat, drew the enemy into the interior of the country, where the mountainous inequality of the surface gave them a decided superiority; and turning round upon the Anglo-Norman forces, at Gellygaer, defeated them with prodigious slaughter, and compelled the few that escaped from the field of carnage to seek shelter in their fortresses. The parish is beautifully situated at the eastern extremity of the county, bordering on Brecknockshire and Monmouthshire, from which it is respectively separated, on the north-east and east, by the river Rumney, which forms its boundary on those sides: on the west and north-west it is bounded by the rivers Bargoed Tâf and Clydach, by which it is separated from the parish of Merthyr-Tydvil. It extends nearly fourteen miles in length, and is almost four miles broad, and comprises about thirty thousand acres: on the south-west, a small portion of it is intersected by the turnpike road from Caerphilly to Merthyr-Tydvil. The surface is boldly varied with abruptly rising hills, skirted with woods of stately and luxuriant growth, and numerous rocks of precipitous elevation: the southern extremity of it is flatter. Though occupying an elevated situation, the parish is, notwithstanding, surrounded by mountainous ridges of greater elevation, and of diversified appearance. Its scenery is strikingly varied, combining features of picturesque beauty and romantic grandeur; and the views from the higher grounds, though limited by the circumjacent mountainous ranges, embrace many interesting objects. The prevailing soil is gravelly: the lands are but very partially enclosed, and only a small portion of them is arable, the farmers relying more upon the feeding of sheep and the increase of their live stock, than upon agriculture. There are numerous extensive tracts of waste land, comprising some thousands of acres, which are common to the parishioners, for depasturing their flocks; and many acres of peat, which supply them with fuel. The parish abounds in different places with iron-ore, coal, and slate. In the hamlet of Brithdir are the Bute Iron-Works, so named from their being situated on the estate of the Marquis of Bute. They are very extensive, and the buildings are justly considered superior to any of the kind in Europe, being erected after Egyptian models: the furnaces and engine-houses are faced with stone curiously wrought and dressed: the expense of their erection is estimated to have been £80,000, and not less than three hundred men are employed in the various processes and departments of the manufacture. Behind these works are inexhaustible mines of iron and coal, which latter is procured chiefly for the supply of the company's works: in these from four to five hundred men are constantly employed. There is also an extensive and valuable slate quarry, which is in full operation, and affords constant employment to a considerable number of men. Very extensive iron-works are carried on at Rumney, near the north-eastern extremity of the parish. Facilities are afforded for the conveyance of the produce of these various works, to their several destinations, by two tram-roads, one of which, passing through the Vale of Rumney, continues its course to the sea at Newport in Monmouthshire; and the other, from the collieries on the west side of the parish, extends a distance of nearly three miles, to the Glamorganshire canal, between Cardiff and Merthyr-Tydvil.

The parish is divided into five hamlets, which jointly maintain their poor; one rate extends over the whole, which is raised on an old valuation, averaging about one-fifth of the rack rents. It is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests, established by an act passed in the 49th of George III., for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, and held at Merthyr-Tydvil, on the second Thursday in every month. The living is a rectory, with Brithdir annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £20. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, dedicated to St. Cadocus, is a neat plain structure, with a square tower, and contains an ancient font of the eleventh century. There are two places of worship for Particular, and one for General, Baptists. Edward Lewis, Esq., of Cilvâch-Vargoed, in this parish, in 1715, bequeathed seven tenements, now producing conjointly £191. 6. per annum, and also the interest of £1600, for the support of a master to teach fifteen poor boys of this parish, and for clothing and apprenticing them; for the endowment of a lectureship in the parishes of Bedwellty and Mynyddyslwyn, in the county of Monmouth; for the relief of such of the poor as do not receive parochial aid; and lastly for a periodical distribution of bread. A Sunday school, conducted on the National system, has been established within the last five years. There are some remains of the ancient camp of Gelly Gaer, from which the parish takes its name, consisting of a redoubt of earth and stones, enclosing a quadrangular area, and commanding the avenue leading to the village. Roman bricks, tiles, domestic utensils, fragments of pavement of considerable size and of artificial materials, and other relics of antiquity, are frequently dug up at this place. On the mountains are two upright stones, about nine feet in height, supposed to have been originally placed there as landmarks to some cairns in the vicinity, the stones formerly composing which are now scattered, and the stone coffins which they covered exposed to view. One of these stones is near Brithdir chapel, and the other is on the side of the mountain road to Merthyr-Tydvil: the latter bears an inscription which is now nearly obliterated, but when entire was read Deffro da i ti, "a joyous or blessed resurrection to thee." Llancaeath, in this parish, was the residence of Colonel Prichard, an officer in the parliamentary army, who is said to have entertained Charles I. at this house, when that monarch, travelling through this part of the country, lost his way between Trêdeggar and Brecknock. It is now together with other estates formerly belonging to that family, partly the property of Lord Dynevor, and partly that of J. M. Richards, Esq., through descent by marriage with the daughters and coheiresses of Colonel Prichard, and by purchase. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £477. 10.

GENOL, a joint hamlet with Wen, in the parish of LLANSAWEL, lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (N.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the parish, of which this hamlet comprises the middle and eastern portions, where the vale of the Cothy expands into a somewhat level tract. It is united with the hamlet of Wen for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £182. 5.

GEORGE (ST.), county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See KEGIDOCK.

GEORGE'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Cardiff, containing 252 inhabitants. This parish is principally distinguished for the remains of an ancient castle, which, together with the manor and lordship of St. George, was granted by the Norman Fitz-Hamon to Sir John Fleming, one of the knights who assisted him in the subjugation of this part of the principality. The village is pleasantly situated on the southern banks of the river Ely, and in the vicinity of a wide and elevated tract of common land, commanding one of the most extensive and richly varied prospects in South Wales. Near it is Coedriglan, the seat of the Rev. John Montgomery Trahearne, a spacious and substantial mansion of red brick, situated on the declivity of a steep eminence, in the centre of an extensive pleasure ground: the surrounding scenery is strikingly beautiful, and the views from the eminence on which the house is built are extensive and finely diversified. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7. 5. 7½., and in the patronage of Llewelyn Trahearne, Esq. The church, which is not distinguished by any architectural peculiarity, contains several ancient monuments in the early style of English architecture. A parochial day school for the gratuitous instruction of children, and a Sunday school, are supported by the rector and the family at the neighbouring mansion of Coedriglan. The Rev. Theodoret Basset, in 1576, bequeathed £140 for the relief of labourers and poor housekeepers not receiving parochial aid, but the greater part of this sum is now lost. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £91.

GILESTON, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Cowbridge, containing 62 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the Bristol channel, is said to have derived its name from the family of Giles, whose mansion formerly stood near the church; but as this edifice itself is dedicated to St. Giles, it is equally probable that it has taken its name from this latter circumstance. The parish is very small, containing only three hundred and forty-one acres, and forming a manor of the same extent. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 6½, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. John Edwardes, who, by marriage with the heiress of the family of Willis, successors to that of Giles, is proprietor of this manor. The church is a small and very ancient structure of stone, with a tower which projects curiously beyond the line of the nave, and appears to have been built subsequently to the rest of the edifice: it is kept in the best repair, and the churchyard forms part of the ornamented grounds of the rectory-house, which is delightfully situated within a mile of the sea, of which it commands an extensive view: the grounds are laid out with great taste, and the church forms an interesting and picturesque feature in the surrounding scenery. The coast in this part is particularly dangerous, and the sea frequently assumes an appearance of terrific grandeur, forming a striking contrast to the rural tranquillity of this sequestered spot. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £22. 9.

GLADESTRY, a parish in the hundred and county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Kington, containing 385 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Gwyddel, and is intersected by a cross road from Hay to the borough of New Radnor. The old enclosed lands are in a good state of cultivation: in 1810, an act of parliament was obtained, in conjunction with the parish of Colva, for the enclosure of a common lying partly within the limits of each. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 19. 4½, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small neat edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and one aisle, with a tower surmounted by a low spire, and containing five bells. A small school in the village, for the gratuitous instruction of the poor, is supported by the principal occupiers of land in the parish. Mrs. Cassandra Davies, in 1635, bequeathed land producing £5 per annum, and an annual benefaction of £1, secured upon the turnpike trust, to the poor of this parish not receiving parochial relief; and the sum of £50 was also bequeathed by an unknown benefactor for the relief of poor housekeepers. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £296. 1.

GLAMORGANSHIRE, a maritime county of SOUTH WALES, bounded on the north by Brecknockshire, on the east by the English county of Monmouth, on the south by the Bristol channel, and on the west and north-west by the bay and county of Carmarthen. It extends from 51° 23' to 51° 48' (N. Lat.), and from 3° 7' to 4° 17' (W. Lon.); and comprises an area, as estimated by Mr. Cary, in his Communications to the Board of Agriculture, of six hundred and sixty square miles, or four hundred and twenty-two thousand four hundred acres. The population, in 1831, was 126,612.

The territory now constituting Glamorganshire, during the remotest periods of its known history, formed an important part of the province first called Gwent, and then Essyllwg (the latter name having been subsequently, by the Romans, softened into Siluria), which, in the opinion of most antiquaries, also comprehended the whole of Monmouthshire, and parts of the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, and Brecknock: the names Gwent and Essyllwg, which are nearly synonymous, and signify a beautiful and agreeable region, seem, indeed, to have been both in use at the period of the Roman invasion and conquest. The ancient British rulers of this district were held in high respect by their cotemporaries, and were repeatedly called to the command of the confederated armies of the island, when it became necessary, for mutual defence, to unite against foreign invaders. But their history is involved in great obscurity until the invasion of Britain by Julius Cæsar, when the reigning prince of this territory appears to have been Llyr Llediaith, who was succeeded by his son Brân ab Llyr, whose principal residence was at Dindryvan, now Dunraven, on the coast of this county. Publius Ostorius Scapula, who succeeded to the command of the Roman forces in Britain in the year 50, having secured all the country to the east of the Severn, directed his operations against the Silures (for so these invaders called the inhabitants of Essyllwg), who for nine years successfully opposed the Roman power, under the command of the son of Brân, the celebrated Caradawg, Caradoc, or Caractacus. This intrepid leader, whose astonishing bravery and military skill stemmed for a while, amid numerous difficulties, the advancing tide of Roman conquest, having removed the seat of war to the country of the Ordovices, which included nearly the whole of North Wales, and the western portions of Shropshire, was defeated by Ostorius in a decisive battle, in which his wife and daughter were taken prisoners, and in consequence of which his brothers shortly after surrendered themselves to the Roman commander, overawed by whose power, Caractacus himself was shortly delivered up by the queen of the Brigantes, to whose court he had fled for refuge. According to a manuscript preserved in the Harleian Collection at the British Museum, Brân ab Llyr also shared the captivity of his family, and was conveyed with them to Rome, where he was detained as a hostage for the peaceable conduct of the valiant Caractacus, who is said to have been permitted, with his wife and daughter, to return immediately to Britain. After remaining at Rome for seven years, Brân at length received permission to return to his native country; and having, during his stay in Italy, been converted to Christianity, he was the means of introducing that religion into Britain, and on that account was called Vendigeid, or "the Blessed:" he died about the year 80. On the fall of Caractacus, the Silures were subjected, with little further opposition, by Julius Frontinus, who employed himself in constructing military posts in every part of their country, and connecting them by roads, the principal of which was that crossing the county from east to west, and called, after his name, the Julia Strata, or Via Julia, to which latter appellation is sometimes added the adjunct Maritima, to distinguish it from a more northern branch of the same great line of communication, called, from the more elevated regions which it traverses, the Via Julia Montana. The chief Roman stations contained within the limits of Glamorganshire were, Tibia Amnis, supposed by some to have been situated on the bank of the Tâf, at or near Cardiff, but by others at the village of Caerau, three miles westward from that town; Bovium, supposed to have been at or near the present village of Boverton, to the south of Cowbridge; Nidus, at Neath; and Leucarum, at Loughor: Caerphilly has been erroneously conjectured to be the site of the Bullaem Silurum of Ptolemy. Almost the only record concerning this part of Britain, under the Roman dominion, that has been transmitted to us, is a confused list of the names of the native princes, or reguli, whom the conquerors allowed to hold an authority little more than nominal, but to whom reverted the entire dominion on the final withdrawal of their forces from the island. Of these, Tewdric flourished towards the middle of the fifth century, and is said to have erected the first church at Llandaf: in his efforts to maintain the independence of his territory, he defeated, on several occasions, parties of invading Saxons, in a conflict with whom, near Tintern, he was at length mortally wounded, and, expiring near the field of battle, was interred on the spot, on which a church was afterwards built, according to his previously expressed desire; and the place was called, after his name, Merthyr Tewdric, since corrupted into Matherth. His son and successor, Meurig ab Tewdric, a man of great valour and wisdom, was the father of that Arthur who is now regarded by the Welsh writers as the hero whose exploits form so distinguished a feature in the British annals, and who succeeded Meurig in his dominion. About the year 517, Arthur was elected by the states of Britain to exercise sovereign authority over them, as other princes had been in times of danger; and by his superior abilities and bravery he continued successfully to oppose the encroaching power of the Saxons, until discord arose between him and his nephew Mordred, and, in the civil war which ensued, both these chieftains were slain in the battle of Camlan, in the year 542. Arthur was succeeded in the government of Siluria, or Gwent, by his son Morgan, a wise, generous, and humane prince, who at first held his court at Caerlleon, the ancient capital of his little dominions, situated in the modern county of Monmouth; but the Saxons, after Arthur's death, making frequent irruptions into this country, Morgan, for the sake of greater security, removed the seat of government westward, residing sometimes in the vicinity of Cardiff, and sometimes at Margam, in this county. In consequence of this, the western part of the ancient Siluria, which was still governed by Morgan in person, received the appellation of Morganwg, signifying "the country of Morgan;" and the ancient designation of Gwent became restricted in its application to the eastern portion of this little principality, over which Morgan placed one of his sons, as lieutenant, or viceroy. Morganwg also was, and still is very often, by its native inhabitants, designated by the synonymous appellation of Gwlad-Vorgan, or Gwlad-Morgan, of which the present name of Glamorgan is a corruption. The ancient Gwlad-Vorgan was bounded on the east by the river Usk, and on the west by the Nedd, or Neath; and although the present limits of Glamorganshire were fixed by the act of union passed in the 27th of Henry VIII., yet that part of Monmouthshire lying westward of the Usk is even still popularly understood to form part of Glamorgan, while, in like manner, the western part of the present Glamorganshire (the ancient Gwyr, or Gower) is regarded as being included in Sir Gaer, the
